PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Imprisonment of a Member

Mr. Speaker: I have received a letter from the resident magistrate of the Belfast petty sessions informing me that Mr. Peter Robinson, the hon. Member for Belfast, East, has been sentenced to a period of imprisonment of 30 days. I shall cause the text of the letter to be published in the Votes and Proceedings and in the Official Report.

Following is the letter:

Dear Mr. Speaker

Peter Robinson, Member of Parliament for Belfast, East was convicted by me at Belfast Petty Sessions on 8 December 1987 of using a mechanically propelled vehicle without a licence under the Vehicles (Excise) Act (NI) 1972 contrary to Section 8(1) of the said Act. I fined him £75 ordered him to pay arrears of duty of £100 and £3 for costs within 28 days.

As those sums have not been paid Mr. Robinson was today committed to Prison for a period of 30 days.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Air Traffic (Safety)

1. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority on the safety regulations for flights over London, Glasgow and Manchester.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Paul Channon): The regulation of air safety is the responsibility of the Civil Aviation Authority. The chairman keeps me informed on important issues.

Mr. Wray: Does the Secretary of State agree that we have had two near misses in the past fortnight and 365 near misses since 1986? Obviously, many complaints have been made to the Civil Aviation Authority, and air traffic controllers have complained about the reporting system. Does the Secretary of State agree that the skies have become like the A74, in that they are overcrowded, and will he consider extending the vertical and horizontal space?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman overlooks the fact that in recent years the number of risk-bearing air misses for commercial air transport has been decreasing, not increasing. That is important. We must not be complacent, but nor must we overreact. It is important to understand these incidents and to keep them in perspective. The near miss that occurred yesterday was between a PanAm Boeing and a BCal BAC 1-11. The BCal aircraft was in level flight at 25,000 ft. and the PanAm was descending from 31,000 ft. to its cleared altitude of 26,000 ft. Preliminary indications — I emphasise that they are preliminary — are that the pilot of the PanAm aircraft descended further than the controller intended. The controller noticed this and took immediate remedial action — I stress that: immediate remedial action. Naturally, the incident will be investigated.

Mr. Higgins: I accept what my right hon. Friend has said, but is he satisfied that everything is being done to encourage the reporting of these events so that we have reliable statistics? On the question of capacity, is there not an argument for having more routes, especially across the Channel, so that traffic can be more widely spread? In particular, will my right hon. Friend investigate the restrictions placed by the Ministry of Defence on Channel flying?

Mr. Channon: As my right hon. Friend knows, he and I are in discussion with the Ministry of Defence about that latter point. I do not want to raise his hopes, but obviously we shall investigate that.

It is important that the House should understand the procedures. The CAA chairman has initiated discussions of the air miss reporting and investigation system and he has invited my officials to participate. It is an extremely sensible idea and I hope that the House will welcome it.

Mrs. Ray Michie: Does the Secretary of State accept that my right hon. Friend the leader of the Liberal party was not being alarmist when he last raised this matter on 8 February? Does he accept that we are seeking a proper investigation into what is going on? One does not want to be alarmist, but I, too, fly regularly up to and down from Scotland — [Interruption.] Flying frightens the living daylights out of me. Many people are seriously worried. If there is so much traffic in the south-east, why does the Secretary of State not accept that more planes should fly out of Prestwick, for example?

Mr. Channon: I am longing for more planes to fly out of Prestwick and every other provincial aerodrome, including Scottish ones. The more traffic that can be encouraged to do that, the better. I think that that is common ground between us. I hope the hon. Lady realises that the number of near misses on the form of transport that she is now using is going down, not up. That is the point that I must make the House understand. With respect, her right hon. Friend's speech last autumn— I cannot understand why people keep referring to it—was alarmist and irresponsible and did not take these factors into account.

Mr. McCrindle: With the incident over Essex at the weekend coming only two weeks after he announced an inquiry into the severe air miss of a couple of weeks ago, will my right hon. Friend consider extending the range of that inquiry within his Department to include the more recent incident? Taking our cue from him, and trying to keep a balance between those who wish to be alarmist and those who wish to be complacent, may we ask whether the time is not on the horizon when individual inquiries into individual incidents should be replaced by an inquiry into the whole issue of air traffic control, so as to bring some sort of reassurance to the many who fly and those who live under flight paths?

Mr. Channon: I understand my hon. Friend's views, and I listened to what he said this morning. The present signs are that the incident to which he referred was not a risk-bearing air miss — I told the House why a few moments ago. It is the chief inspector, not I—I have no power to change this without legislation — who by law decides what the AAIB is to investigate. It is right that he should not be under political pressure from Ministers. An inspector's investigation of the incident over Lydd on 6 February is under way. Any safety recommendations that emerge about air traffic control systems from the investigation will be reported to the CAA without delay.

Mr. Alfred Morris: Does it not make matters worse for the south-east that large numbers of northerners must still travel down to Heathrow and Gatwick to reach destinations abroad for which there should be scheduled services from Manchester? What recent action has the right hon. Gentleman taken further to develop the regional airports?

Mr. Channon: The right hon. Gentleman knows better than anyone — we discussed it recently — that there are now a substantial number of new international destinations from Manchester. I hope that we shall have formal discussions with the Americans before long. I am at one with the right hon. Gentleman in wanting opportunities for Manchester airport, and many other provincial airports, to expand. That will be good in itself and will help to ease congestion in London.

Mr. Colvin: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is important to differentiate between reported air misses and risk-bearing air misses? It is clear from what he said that it is four times safer to fly today, in terms of reported air misses, than it was 10 years ago. Following on from what he said about risk-bearing air misses, the figure for 1986 was only 16, while the figure for 1977 was 45. There again, there has been a massive improvement. Does he agree that it is wholly inconsistent with the dedication and skill of air traffic controllers for a small minority of that profession to try to make political capital out of the present circumstances?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend has put his finger on the right point, especially in the first part of his question. Trends in risk-bearing air misses have been markedly downwards in recent years. That is precisely the point. I hope the House realises that, as a result of that, air journeys in the London area have been proved safer in recent years than they were in the past.

Mr. John D. Taylor: Does the Minister realise that many flights from the three main regional airports, Glasgow, Manchester and Belfast, do not leave on time because of chaos in London? Even if they leave on time, they cannot land because of chaos there. As one-hour flights now require one and a half hours, will the Secretary of State stop passing the buck to the Civil Aviation Authority and accept the responsibility for the increasing chaos at London airports?

Mr. Channon: I am not passing the buck. The CAA has the statutory duty by law, as passed by this House. That is why I must reiterate where the statutory duty lies. I am considering a number of points about Belfast flights which concern the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues.

As for the general issue of delays at airports, the most important duty must be for the CAA and controllers at airports to ensure that safety is paramount, even if it causes delay from time to time.

Mr. Jessel: May I remind my right hon. Friend that there has been no major crash at Heathrow since about 1972? As there are 300,000 flights per year, that is a very impressive record. However, near misses are alarming for people beneath the flight path and I hope that the inquiry will be extremely thorough.

Mr. Channon: I endorse what my hon. Friend said about the large number of flights from Heathrow and the very good safety record there. That is why I urge the House to understand what is going on and to appreciate the extraordinary good record of pilots and air traffic controllers, all of whom ought to be congratulated.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Does the Minister not recognise that he has become so complacent at the Dispatch Box that he has degenerated into using claptrap? What on earth is a non-risk-bearing air miss? If it is not risky, why is it reported? To talk like that does not help the situation one little bit. The time has come for the Secretary of State to get all the interested parties together to have a proper investigation into air safety. The Secretary of State may think that people are not worried, but I can tell him that they are, and that they will be especially worried at Easter when there will be much more traffic in the air than there is now.

Mr. Channon: Untypically, the hon. Gentleman has asked a ridiculous question. All incidents and sightings should be reported, whether they contain a risk or are non-risk bearing. Preliminary indications in the incident at the weekend are that there was not a risk. Quite rightly, air statistics have been compiled like this for a great many years, including the years when the hon. Gentleman's party was in office. I cannot understand why he makes that ridiculous attack.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that within controlled air space aircraft in a position where they ought not to be should properly be reported by other aircraft using the same air space? In that situation there is not necessarily any risk, but it comes into the category of an air miss. It is unfortunate that Opposition Members do not understand the difference between the genuine concern about what ought to be done and the fact that there is a need, perhaps to satisfy the public, for some alternative to the Civil Aviation Authority investigating itself. That may well be one of the ways of alleviating risks. I do not accept that there is an increasing risk.

Mr. Channon: I agree with my hon. Friend's first point about air misses. I thought that that was common knowledge throughout the House, and I am amazed that it is not. My hon. Friend asked about air miss reporting and investigating systems. As I have told the House, the CAA chairman has initiated discussions about that matter. My Department will participate in them. It is an extremely good idea and I hope that the House welcomes it.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have allowed a rather long run on that question and I think the House will understand if we now proceed rather more rapidly.

Safety Standards

2. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to review the enforcement of transport safety standards by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The safe movement of people and goods is one of my top priorities. Effective enforcement of safety standards is part of that and I keep it under constant review.

Mr. Davies: I should like to return to yesterday's near miss, because the Secretary of State has said that on the one hand it was a near miss and on the other hand no safety implications were attached. Secondly, he said that in any event it is not his responsibility. That is completely unsatisfactory. Does the Secretary of State not understand that when hundreds of lives are put at risk there is a clear need to investigate, not only the original individual circumstances, but the system of reporting that allows such events to take place? Will he give an undertaking that he will launch a thorough and open investigation, not only of individual cases, but of the system of reporting?

Mr. Channon: I have already answered that point twice and I do not know why the hon. Gentleman wants to return to it. He has completely distorted my original answer. The whole House knows that if there is a sighting, or any other incident that should be reported, it must be reported. The vast majority of incidents that are reported are not risk bearing. Surely that must be understood by the House. It seems from preliminary reports that yesterday's incident was such a case.

Mr. Ashby: In matters of transport safety, does my right hon. Friend think it right that the Civil Aviation Authority should investigate itself? Does he also think it right that when the authority produces a report, it produces it to itself? Does he not think that he should be the recipient of that report and that it should be the sort of report that can be debated in the House?

Mr. Channon: In general, air miss reports are widely circulated. I see them because my civil aviation safety adviser wants to discuss them, and it is he who receives the reports from the CAA. Therefore, I have answered my hon. Friend's point. As for the air miss reporting and investigation system, I have told the House four times that the CAA chairman has initiated discussions. I very much welcome that.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Secretary of State not realise that for all inhabitants of London his replies will not be satisfactory? Following the point made by his hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby), unlike sea or rail safety standards, which are the responsibility of the Secretary of State and which are open and visible, that for the Civil Aviation Authority is not visible or open. The CAA is judge and jury in its own court. Surely that is wrong and we need legislation to change it.

Mr. Channon: As I have said, the CAA chairman has initiated discussions. The House says that the situation is unsatisfactory. I do not wish to politicise the issue, but I must point out that when the Labour Government were in office there were non-risk-bearing air misses. It is important that the House should understand that this is not a new situation.

Mr. Tony Banks: It is getting worse.

Mr. Channon: It is not getting worse. In 1978 there were 119 non-risk-incidents. Traffic has increased since then. For some reason the House will not accept that incidents can be non-risk-bearing. In fact, the numbers of no-risk misses are lower than they were in 1978. So this is not a new phenomenon, and the preliminary reports of the recent incident reveal that there was no risk.

Channel Tunnel

3. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has had any recent meetings with representatives of the Anglo-French Channel tunnel construction consortium.

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend the Minister of State last met senior representatives of Eurotunnel and their contractors Transmanche Link on 15 February.

Mr. Dykes: Will my hon. Friend confirm that when that brilliant project, which is going so well and was recently warmly endorsed by the Prime Minister, is completed, as soon as possible in the early 1990s, it will be the best way to allay the anxieties of people who worry about air misses between London and Paris?

Mr. Channon: Certainly, it is a brilliant programme and it will be completed in the early 1990s. We shall take every step to ensure that it is completed to the highest safety standards.

Mr. Anderson: Is the Minister not concerned about the disparity in Chunnel-related investment on each side of the Channel? The French are spending at least £1,200 million on the Paris-to-tunnel rail line, while British Rail is spending only £400 million on the total infrastructure. Will the Minister take shelter behind saying that this is a matter for the board, or will he take the lead and say that it is a matter of national concern with enormous regional implications, and that the Government will do something about it?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman has misunderstood one point. The Channel tunnel is a comparatively small part of the French investment. The French are investing in a high-speed rail system linking them with Brussels and, eventually, Cologne and Amsterdam, and they are spending vast sums of money on that at the moment. British Rail has been asked to study the adequacy of investment by June this year, and it will report then. As the House knows, BR has put forward many investment proposals during the past few years, all of which have received approval.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

4. Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 25 January, Official Report, columns 23-24, what estimate has been made of the percentage of heavy goods vehicles from abroad which are overloaded, in the light of the 24 per cent. of weighed vehicles which are found to be overloaded; and what actions he proposes to reduce this figure.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): A series of surveys carried out between 1980 and 1986 showed that 20 per cent. of foreign goods vehicles selected on a random basis were overloaded by more than 5 per cent. We propose to install weighbridges at Ramsgate and Immingham, the two major ferry ports which lack them. Consultations are also being held with selected port authorities about testing automatic equipment for weighing incoming lorries.

Mr. Chapman: Will my hon. Friend accept that the fact that one in five incoming vehicles is found to be overweight is a matter of deep concern? As the maximum penalty on a successful prosecution is only a £200 fine, should not, at the very least, magistrates courts be encouraged to impose the maximum fine?

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There must be effective deterrents. We must be able to catch and deter them. Overweight lorries are unsafe, they are cheating and they cause more damage to the roads than they pay for. I agree with my hon. Friend.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the Minister satisfied with the situation that police forces, for understandable reasons, are not taking action when they know that the drivers will soon be out of the country, and possibly will not return for prosecution? There is a problem, and it is becoming an increasing worry.

Mr. Bottomley: [illegible]erloaded vehicles are prohibited movement until the lo[illegible] is adjusted, and that is one of the ways in which it cannot pay lorry drivers to overload. We need to use both deterrence and enforcement, as well as trying to ensure that the enforcement strategy is such that people find that it is not worth their while cheating.

Mr. Sayeed: Following the point made by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), does it not make sense to seize part of the cargo of overweight lorries, take a lien on it and not hand it back until the fines are redeemed?

Mr. Bottomley: It would be right for us to go on considering effective ways to reduce this bad problem.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Will the Minister confirm that one of the problems identified after the sinking of the Herald of Free Enterprise was the danger posed by overloaded lorries on ferries? The Minister's complacent response to this problem will not do. What will the Government do, both in negotiations with foreign Governments and at British ports, to ensure that it is virtually impossible for lorries to risk life at sea by coming to this country overloaded?

Mr. Bottomley: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the last sentence of my initial reply.

Merchant Fleet

5. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received concerning the future of the British merchant fleet.

Mr. Channon: A policy document from the General Council of British Shipping, a leaflet from the National Union of Marine, Aviation and Shipping Transport Officers, and about 45 letters from members of the public.

Mr. Wallace: Will the Minister accept that in spite of the admittedly helpful measures in the Merchant Shipping Bill, which is passing through the House, there is still considerable anxiety about the state of our merchant shipping, not only because of the dramatic decline in merchant tonnage, but because over the past 10 years the pay rates for seafarers have gone down considerably in comparison with rates paid in comparable occupations on land? With the Budget looming, has the Secretary of State made, or does he intend to make, representations to the Chancellor of the Exchequer about having special tax arrangements to encourage the replacement of ships or the undertaking of heavy repairs? Will the Secretary of State also promote special tax and social security arrangements for seafarers, as is done in other EEC countries?

Mr. Channon: As the hon. Gentleman knows, taxation is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not for me. I am grateful for what the hon. Gentleman said about the Merchant Shipping Bill measures. Yes, the fleet is slimmer, but it is more efficient, and company success should not necessarily be judged by the number of ships. The important point is to improve efficiency on sea and on land and open up new trade.

Mr. Irvine: When did my right hon. Friend last receive representations about the size of the merchant fleet from the Ministry of Defence, and what was the nature of those representations?

Mr. Channon: All letters from the Ministry of Defence are confidential, but I cannot recall one on that issue. I have already answered the question raised by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace). If my hon. Friend is asking for taxation measures, I must point out that that is entirely a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Transport Supplementary Grant

6. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport by how much transport supplementary grant will be increased in 1988-89 vis à vis 1987-88.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: By £11 million—6 per cent.

Mr. Jack: I note my hon. Friend's reply, but he will know of the concern in Lancashire over this year's transport supplementary grant application. Will he do all that he can in the financial year 1989-90 to ensure that the projects in the transport planning programme for Lancashire, which his Department has seen, are adequately funded, as they contain many much-needed road improvements, particularly in west Lancashire and my constituency of Fylde?

Mr. Bottomley: I will do the best that I can for my hon. Friend, as I would for any other hon. Member. It is worth recognising that if everyone knew how well Lancashire did on occasion, I would face much more pressure from around the House.

Mr. Flynn: Is the Minister aware that large lorries cause at least £200 million worth of damage annually to roads, and the effect of the increase in the weighings of lorries by 50 per cent. at ports, to which the Minister referred, will mean that only 1·5 per cent. of lorry movements inwards and outwards from Britain will be subject to weight checks? In view of the damage caused by lorries to our roads, is it not about time that the Government stopped being permissive and started getting tough?

Mr. Bottomley: I shall try to bear that in mind when considering the transport supplementary grant next year.

Mr. Soames: I thank my hon. Friend for the courtesy and help that he has always shown to West Sussex with regard to transport supplementary grant, but is he aware of the very serious problems that exist on the roads, particularly around Crawley and beyond, caused by the M25? Will he assure the House that he will do all that he can to confer the same benefits on my constituency as he intends to confer on the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack)?

Mr. Bottomley: I congratulate my hon. Friend on managing to get me to visit Sussex to see the work that is going on and the work that needs to be carried out. I hope to visit Sussex next week, but I am not sure whether I will be spending much time in his constituency.

Mr. Speaker: Mrs. Fyfe to ask question 8.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): Mr. Speaker, would it be in order for me to answer question 7?

Mr. Speaker: That would not be in order, because I have already notified the Government Whip that question 7 has been unstarred. We will have question 8.

Commuter Services

8. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department has commissioned any studies on the economic impact of the provision of rail commuter services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Transport and Road Research Laboratory has published or collaborated in a number of national and international urban transport studies.

Mrs. Fyfe: What did the Minister tell the Bank of England's City commuter services group, which reported to him that a survey of 5,250 employers revealed that more time was lost from work because of delays and cancellations than through sickness or any other cause?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Lady is complaining about delays.

Mr. Snape: There have been delays here.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Lady has complained about delays and the reliability of trains. There is great interest at the moment in Network SouthEast, and reliability on these services has improved from 98·5 to 98·8 per cent. of trains running. Reliability and punctuality have improved. If the hon. Lady can give me a specific area of anxiety in Scotland, I shall write to her.

Mr. Snape: This is not fair on the Government. Is the Minister aware that groups as diverse as the transport users' consultative committees, the Railway Development Society, Transport 2000, the Confederation of British Industry, the TUC—I wonder whether the Minister has found the right page for this answer yet—the Evening Standard commuter club and the Monopolies and Mergers Commission have complained recently about the "inadequacy, strain and danger" and overcrowding on British Rail services? Why is it that when Ministers find the right page, we receive only platitudes written by civil servants? Why has the chairman of the British Railways Board received a knighthood for being the most incompetent public servant in the country? Why is the ever-greedy road lobby the only group to be delighted by the incompetence of the hon. Gentleman and his fellow Ministers?

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his supplementary to question 7. New quality standards were set and accepted by British Rail last July. Punctuality, reliability, cleaning, overcrowding, inquiry delays and queueing for tickets are all covered by the standards. Those matters have been accepted by the chairman of British Rail. In the last six months of last year there was an improvement in punctuality and reliability on the Network SouthEast commuter services.

Mr. Yeo: Is my hon. Friend aware that the commuter service from Manningtree is very important? Despite a rather erratic record of reliability, that service is used by an increasing number of my constituents and others elsewhere in East Anglia. Is he further aware that a great shock was caused when, following the construction of a large new car park at the station, British Rail announced its decision to eliminate most of the InterCity services? At the next meeting with British Rail's management, will my hon. Friend prevail upon it, if he can, to adopt more business-like practices and not to treat its customers as an inconvenience?

Mr. Mitchell: I shall be seeing the sector director of Network SouthEast this evening, and I shall draw that point to his attention.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: If the Minister seriously wants to receive complaints from Scotland, is he prepared to accept dossiers from Scottish Members of Parliament, who can all cite extensive cases of the problems faced by our commuters? Does he accept that one of the major problems facing commuters in Scotland is the poor quality of the rolling stock and the fact that the upgrading, being so slow as to be ineffective, is hindering economic recovery?

Mr. Mitchell: I am aware of the improvements that have occurred in ScotRail. If the hon. Lady is referring to section 20 services, she must refer to the passenger transport authority concerned.

Motorway Repairs

9. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received about the speed with which motorway repairs are undertaken.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Various representations have been received which urge speedy completion of repairs. We aim to minimise delays by careful programming, improved traffic management and greater use of lane rental contracts which give an incentive for early completion.

Mr. Knox: Will my hon. Friend explain why it appears to take so long to effect motorway repairs?

Mr. Bottomley: It now takes between 30 and 40 per cent. less time than before lane rental was introduced. It is important to organise the work properly and to ensure that it is carried out efficiently and effectively. We are seeing substantial improvements. We are extending the use of lane rental contracts. We will not see such an improvement in time because lane rental is now being extended to some of the more complicated roadworks. I should like to see it on other roads as well as motorways.

Mr. Grocott: Is the Minister aware that part of the M54 to Telford has been under repair almost since the day it was opened? The Minister let us know recently that some inquiries were taking place into long-term but permanent remedial work on the motorway. Can he tell us how those inquiries are proceeding?

Mr. Bottomley: It would be simpler for me to write to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hoyle: Does my hon. Friend accept that his reply is completely complacent? I ask him to come with me and drive on a Friday from London to my constituency. A journey that used to take four and half hours now takes six and a half hours because of the miles and miles of coned-off A1 from Rotherham, north, which adds about one and a half to two hours to a journey. If the Minister had to pass through that in order to get to work, he would damn soon get rid of some of the cones.

Mr. Bottomley: If I were going to my hon. Friend's constituency on a Friday night, I would go by train. It is worth remembering that some of the roadworks are to improve and expand the network, and I think that that is generally welcomed. It is also worth saying that if it had started in 1975, rather than in 1979, the roads would be in a much better state than they are now.

Electrification

10. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent discussions he has had with the chairman of British Rail concerning the electrification of the rail network and other matters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend last met the chairman of British Rail on 11 February. A variety of railway matters were discussed.

Mr. Hughes: When the Secretary of State next meets the chairman, will the Minister ensure that he reminds him of the need for the early electrification of the London to south Wales main line? Will he also tell the chairman what provision the Government are making for our local authorities to ensure that they are able to provide for local halts, such as that in Magor in Gwent, which are so urgently needed?

Mr. Mitchell: The answer to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question is no. It is for British Rail to come forward with proposals for electrification where it considers that to be appropriate. I have had no application from British Rail in respect of that line.

I shall write to the hon. Gentleman on the matter of smaller stations.

Mr. Sackville: Will my hon. Friend say what progress has been made on assessing the possibilities for an improved rail service linking the Channel tunnel with Manchester and the north of England?

Mr. Mitchell: British Rail is required by section 40 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987 to prepare a plan by the end of 1989 setting out its service proposals. It intends to consult widely in preparation for the plan, but it is too early yet to say exactly what it will entail.

Mr. Snape: Will the Minister join me in congratulating the north-west group of Labour Members on their success in persuading British Rail not to take the nonsensical decision to abolish sleeper services to Manchester and Liverpool and to run empty sleeper trains in one direction? Does he not think that that shows the effectiveness of my hon. Friends from the north-west?

Mr. Mitchell: It was not only Opposition Members who were responsible for making representations on that matter. I am delighted to hear that the hon. Gentleman is now converted to approving of the chairman of British Rail and his activities.

Rail Services (Quality)

12. Mr. Haynes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the chairman of the Central Transport Consultative Committee to discuss the quality of rail services.

Mr. David Mitchell: I met the chairman of the CTCC in September 1987 to discuss quality of service and other matters.

Mr. Haynes: The Minister is not talking about quality; he is talking about inequality. Why is his Department cutting £3 million a day from financial support for British Rail when people are moaning and groaning all over the country? I want to know when we shall get our proper service from Mansfield and Ashfield to Nottingham to catch the London train. Is the Minister aware that I want to travel on that train, see the beautiful countryside in Nottinghamshire and read what the local papers are saying about me? What will he do about that?

Mr. Mitchell: The key to the standards of service that the hon. Gentleman would like to see is investment. The Government have approved any worthwhile investment proposals put forward by British Rail. My in-tray is empty, and I shall be happy to have it filled again.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

"Stalker" (Prosecution)

55. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Attorney-General when he now expects to reach a decision on whether to prosecute Mr. John Stalker under the Official Secrets Acts in respect of his book entitled "Stalker".

The Attorney-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I refer my hon. Friend to my answer of 11 February to my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden).

Mr. Greenway: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that Sir John Hermon, Chief Constable of Northern Ireland, said on television yesterday, and will say again today, that Mr. Stalker is thoroughly immature and that his book is a tissue of lies? Should not the public, therefore, treat Mr. Stalker and his book with the contempt that they deserve?

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend expresses himself with characteristic robustness. I am not responsible for the views expressed by the Chief Constable or, indeed, by anybody else. Naturally, the Government deplore any breach of confidence of the kind to which my hon. Friend refers.

Mr. Archer: Does the Attorney-General agree that, in respect of decisions about prosecutions, he is accountable to this House, and only to this House? Although there may be difficulties about disclosing particular facts, does he agree that that accountability should be made a reality, either through a Select Committee or another acceptable channel? Has he directed his mind to that question, and would he care to make a statement?

The Attorney-General: I am accountable to this House. That does not need to be made a reality. It is a reality.

Mr. Cormack: Does my right hon. and learned Friend know whether the book is a tissue of lies, or a breach of confidence? Surely it cannot be both.

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend speaks as though these things are mutually incompatible and as though the entire book, or any book, is wholly consistent in falling into one category or another. That is not always the case.

Mr. Rees: Is the Attorney-General aware that I agree that, although the Stalker book obviously contravenes the Official Secrets Act 1911, he is right not to prosecute? Will he consider other circumstances in the background to the case in which it is alleged that, while the report was being undertaken, details were passed to a journalist in Manchester? Will he speak to the Northern Ireland Office and the Home Office and suggest that, in the light of his investigations and these worrying allegations, senior officers who are put in to investigate other police forces should be given instructions on how to carry out those investigations?

The Attorney-General: The right hon. Gentleman speaks with much authority and experience. I shall undertake to ensure that his observations are referred to my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland and for the Home Department, who plainly have an interest in the matter.

Mr. Fraser: Was one of the Attorney-General's considerations that it might have been in the public interest for the public to have the right to know Mr. Stalker's conclusions on his investigations in Northern Ireland? If the right hon. and learned Gentleman's conclusion not to prosecute was based on that consideration, will it apply similarly to any civil proceedings?

The Attorney-General: It falls to me to take into account, in my criminal jurisdiction, all relevant circumstances. The hon. Gentleman has referred to one of them, but all of them have to be considered and a right and sound judgment has to be reached at the end. That I endeavour to do.

Mr. Anthony Cavendish (Memoirs)

56. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Attorney-General what has been the cost hitherto of his actions against various publications in relation to Mr. Anthony Cavendish's memoirs.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): The total amount of costs expended to date in the actions, relating to the Cavendish memoirs, brought against The Sunday Times and The Observer, is £157.

Mr. Dalyell: Wherein lies Mr. Cavendish's alleged breach of security?

The Solicitor-General: Mr. Cavendish, as a former member of the security service, owes a lifelong duty of confidentiality. It is to establish and enforce that lifelong duty that the actions were brought.

Mr. Dykes: Why is Mr. Cavendish being treated more lightly and generously than Mr. Peter Wright?

The Solicitor-General: He has not been treated in any substantially different way as a matter of principle.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: If, in pursuing further action against Mr. Cavendish, consideration has to be given to the expenditure which may be incurred, will consideration also be given to the abortive expenditure which has already been incurred in the Court of Session in Scotland?

The Solicitor-General: Matters in Scotland have not yet reached their conclusion, and therefore it remains to be seen whether they are or are not abortive.

Mr. Favell: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that a prerequisite of joining the secret service is the ability to keep a secret?

The Solicitor-General: I agree.

Mr. Fraser: Do I understand from the Solicitor-General's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that there was no breach of security – that there was only a breach of confidentiality?

The Solicitor-General: The action was brought to enforce the lifelong duty of confidentiality.

Alleged Government Subversion (Prosecutions)

57. Mr. Allen: To ask the Attorney-General what recent consideration has been given to initiating prosecutions in relation to offences concerning alleged attempts to subvert the Government of Lord Wilson; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Member to the Prime Minister's statement of 6 May 1987, in which she said that this matter had been investigated by the then director general of the security service; that no evidence or indication had been found of any plot or conspiracy against Lord Wilson by or within the security service; and that she did not propose to institute any other inquiry into the matter.

Mr. Allen: The Attorney-General will be aware that allegations have been made by a senior former MI5 operative — Mr. Peter Wright — in his book "Spycatcher". Will he now stop his inactivity in this matter, because many people feel that by not having a further inquiry the right hon. and learned Gentleman is condoning the security service acting as the second team, or back stop, to the Conservative party?

The Attorney-General: I do not go along with what the hon. Gentleman has said at all. In matters of this kind it is for the Director of Public Prosecutions to decide what, if any, action is to be taken in the face of any evidence, however presented, relating to the commission of any possible offence.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: Are these not just about the most damaging allegations that can be made about Crown servants – that they tried to destabilise a legally elected Government? For public confidence, is not the best way forward to have an independent inquiry into these matters? We had Lord Franks' inquiry into the conduct of the Falklands war. Surely such an inquiry would lay to rest the public's anxiety, because people would then know that public servants are there to help, not undermine, the country's institutions.

The Attorney-General: That point was made to the Prime Minister – no doubt it was made by my hon. Friend – when she made the statement to which I referred in my original reply. As the ultimate prosecuting authority in England, Wales and Northern Ireland, I am not responsible for whether there should be public inquiries. The Prime Minister is, and she dealt with the matter fully and to the satisfaction of the House in the answer that she gave in 1987.

Prosecution Policy

58. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Attorney-General when he last met the Director of Public Prosecutions to discuss prosecution policy.

The Attorney-General: Last Thursday morning.

Mr. Winnick: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware of the immense harm done to Anglo-Irish relations by the statement that he made two weeks ago, in which he said that there would be no prosecution of RUC officers? While a later statement was made on the issue only last week, the fact remains that immense harm has been caused to Anglo-Irish relations. Would it not be wise to look again at the decision?

The Attorney-General: This question relates not to the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland, but to the DPP for England and Wales. The point raised by the hon. Gentleman by way of a supplementary question has no bearing on it, but if it had, my answer would be no.

Mr. Gow: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the decision not to prosecute was made, not by him, but by the DPP for Northern Ireland?

The Attorney-General: That is entirely true, as I made clear in my statement on 25 January.

Mr. Cryer: Has the Attorney-General discussed with the Director of Public Prosecutions the possibility of prosecuting Chapman Pincher? All the information produced by Peter Wright in the book "Spycatcher" had been provided for Chapman Pincher. Is it not hypocritical of the Attorney-General to wax lyrical about a lifelong duty of confidentiality for members of MI5 when he knows full well that information has been provided to Chapman Pincher with the approval of the Government and Government officers? If Peter Wright and others are open to prosecution, should not Chapman Pincher, as the Government's mouthpiece, be subject to prosecution as well?

The Attorney-General: The hon. Gentleman is probably aware that nearly a year ago I announced that the prosecution of Mr. Chapman Pincher would not be in conformity with the code for Crown prosecutors.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

International Fund for Agricultural Development

61. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he is planning any meetings with officials from the International Fund for Agricultural Development to discuss investment policy; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Chris Patten): No, Sir.

Mr. Smith: In view of the good track record of the International Fund for Agricultural Development in investing in agriculture for the benefit of those who need it most — the rural poor — will the Minister give an undertaking that Britain will contribute to the next replenishment of IFAD funds? Will he consider making a larger contribution than we have made in the past, so that this country can give a lead in obtaining adequate resources for a viable level of work from this invaluable organisation?

Mr. Patten: As the hon. Gentleman probably knows, we have committed about £47 million so far to IFAD, including £7 million for the special programme for Africa. We are playing, and will continue to play, our full part in the negotiations about the next replenishment. I was pleased to be able to discuss that issue, among others, with the president of IFAD — who does a splended job — as recently as last November.

Commonwealth Schools (Textbooks)

62. Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to provide textbooks for schools in Commonwealth developing countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: This year we expect to spend about £1·3 million from the aid programme on textbooks for schools in developing Commonwealth countries. I am also considering support for some interesting proposals to provide textbooks no longer needed in British schools to developing countries.

Mr. Hannam: I thank my hon. Friend for his helpful reply. Can he tell us whether the Ranfurly library is involved in the project? Can he also give some details of which countries are being considered for assistance?

Mr. Patten: The Ranfurly library service, which does such a magnificent job, is centrally involved in the proposals, which are being discussed with Rotary and the British Council. I very much hope that the scheme will get off the ground. If it does, it is intended to cover all developing Commonwealth countries.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Is the Minister aware that, in addition to the provision of textbooks, many developing countries welcome the provision of audio-visual aids, and that the British Council, which is doing splendid work in many countries, would be able to assist if more resources were made available?

Mr. Patten: Through the aid programme we have been making more resources available to the British Council, which has been doing a superb job in helping to manage our technical co-operation and training programme. Of course, audio-visual aids have an important part to play in education in developing countries, as do books, which is why we have increased spending on the books presentation programme.

Public Service Pensions

63. Mr. Stanbrook: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received asking the Government to rectify the anomaly whereby all public service pensioners receive credit for pre-appointment war service except where that public service was overseas.

Mr. Chris Patten: Over the past few years there have been many representations from the Overseas Service Pensioners Association and its members, primarily through constituency correspondence. The Government have also taken note of early-day motions tabled by my hon. Friend on this matter.

Mr. Stanbrook: Is my hon. Friend aware that one early-day motion has been signed by no fewer than 245 right hon. and hon. Members, asking the Government to rectify this anomaly as soon as possible? Is it not a fact that the anomaly concerns only a small amount of money and that the number of people involved is small, and is getting smaller in the natural course of events, as most of them are elderly? Is it not a matter of honour for the Government to rectify this anomaly? Will my hon. Friend press for funds to enable him to do justice to these deserving people?

Mr. Patten: I think I am right in saying that the matter relates to between 5,000 and 6,000 pensioners. The estimated cost — it is only an estimate — is about £6 million a year. We are keeping the matter under careful review. I am afraid that, so far, the Government have not felt able to accommodate this extra commitment. I am sorry to have to tell my hon. Friend that I cannot add anything substantive to what my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs — the Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar) — said in the debate last July.

Ghana

64. Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what United Kingdom contribution will be made to the Ghanaian Government programme of action to mitigate the social costs of adjustment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The United Kingdom helped the Ghanaian Government to draw up their programme of action to mitigate the social costs of adjustment — PAMSCAD. Following the recent conference on the programme we shall be discussing with the Ghanaian Government ways in which we may use our substantial aid to Ghana to contribute to PAMSCAD's objectives.

Ms. Mowlam: As the Minister has previously voiced his support for the debtor nations that adopt programmes like PAMSCAD to help the poor in their own countries, will he say whether, on such an important programme, the Government would consider extra cash outside the bilateral aid that he has mentioned?

Mr. Patten: So far we have contributed almost £50 million for the support of the economic reform programme in Ghana. I envisage our making a further substantial commitment before too long. A health sector mission will visit Ghana in March, and I hope that some of its proposals on the development of primary health care and mother and child health will make a considerable contribution to PAMSCAD, which is so valuable and such a model for other countries.

Bilateral Aid (Country Programmes)

65. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in adopting the recommendations of the second report from the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs on "Bi-Lateral Aid (Country Programmes)."

Mr. Chris Patten: The Government welcomed the second report from the FAC, and its reply (Cm. 225) is a detailed response to the Committee's recommendations.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Minister agree that it is unfortunate that the Department of Overseas Development has many millions of pounds at its disposal for the assistance of what are, in effect, industrial exports? Although some of those exports may have a development element, would it not be better if the sums spent for that purpose were deducted from the Pearson targets or any other percentage related specifically to overseas aid?

Mr. Patten: I thought that our response to the FAC on that point was overwhelmingly convincing.

Comic Relief

68. Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government will match, pound for pound, the money raised by Comic Relief.

Mr. Chris Patten: I should like to congratulate the organisers of Comic Relief on their magnificent effort. We attach great importance to the work of the voluntary agencies. That is why we have increased, by 50 per cent. to £9 million next year, the support of the joint funding scheme, which matches pound for pound the cost of agreed projects.

Sir Russell Johnston: That is not exactly an answer, as the Minister knows.

Mr. Skinner: Of course it is an answer, but it is a lousy one.

Sir Russell Johnston: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) as always. Will the Minister specifically match pound for pound the amount raised by Comic Relief and give a Government commitment, which would surely have a positive effect on any future voluntary efforts, to match pound for pound the money raised for overseas aid in this way?

Mr. Patten: If we were to do what the hon. Gentleman suggests—I accept that it might be a headline-making gimmick—it might limit the amount of money that we provide to the Horn of Africa. So far, taxpayers' generosity has exceeded that of those who contributed so magnificently to Comic Relief. As taxpayers, we have contributed almost £36 million to the relief operation in Ethiopia. When I was in Sudan recently I announced an extra £15 million worth of support for Sudan, in addition to the £10 million that we made available just before Christmas.

Miss Lestor: I acknowledge the contribution that the Government have made to Ethiopia and other areas. Does the Minister agree that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) was asking for extra money—not that the Government should merely match what has already been given—to stimulate interest in this country? Comic Relief—and the little effort that was made here—captured the imagination of thousands of people. Will the Minister reconsider his action, bearing in mind that such action from him, in addition to what is already being given, would help to keep people's minds on the problem and encourage them to give more generously?

Mr. Patten: Of course I welcome the interest that was shown in the contributions to Comic Relief. I repeat that we shall be doing more in Ethiopia and Sudan. We shall be adding to what we have already given from a growing programme. We have increased by 50 per cent. our support for the pound-for-pound joint funding scheme with non-governmental organisations.

Kampuchea

67. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received regarding the provision of development assistance for Kampuchea.

69. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current level of United Kingdom overseas aid to Kampuchea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patten: I have received a number of representations. As I said on 1 February, in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Eccles (Miss Lestor), it would, in the Government's view, be wrong in principle to give development aid to the illegitimate and unrepresentative regime in Phnom Penh. We should nevertheless be prepared to consider providing humanitarian assistance in the context of any internationally organised relief effort. We provided nearly £1·5 million in 1987 to help Cambodians who have sought refuge in the camps along the Thai-Cambodian border.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the Minister agree with the views given in the White Paper that was produced by Oxfam, specifically regarding Kampuchea? Does he agree that, if people are living in poverty and if there is infant mortality and problems of personal health, they are entitled to our aid and assistance without any regard to the political views that a minority in those countries might express?

Mr. Patten: I do not agree with Oxfam on this matter. I agree with the 116 countries, in addition to the United Kingdom, which have endorsed the position taken by the United Nations General Assembly.

South of Scotland Electricity Board (Coal Imports)

3.32 pm

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the decision of the South of Scotland Electricity Board to allow tenders for the importation of coal."

It is a specific matter as it refers to the two coal-fired power stations in Scotland, at Cockenzie and Longannet.

It is important because the coal from the Lothian coal field—from the pits at Monktonhall and Bilston Glen—goes to Cockenzie. The Clackmannan coalfield, which is based largely in my constituency, with mines at Castlebridge and Solsgirth, is dedicated exclusively to the production of coal for Longannet power station. The latter is known as the Longannet complex, and all the coal output is dedicated to the station. It is taken there by conveyor belt from the underground face to the furnaces.

The importation of coal from abroad, which is purchased on the spot market at prices which may, in the short term, be lower than those charged by British Coal, will result in the closure of the Scottish coalfield, the loss of 4,000 jobs directly and many thousands indirectly.

The matter is urgent because the closing date for tenders is today. Last Thursday my hon. Friends and I met the Minister of State, Scottish Office, but he refused to intervene.

The Scottish Office is responsible for the operation of the SSEB. The buck stops at the Secretary of State for Scotland. That is why he should be called to account today, before the electricity board makes a decision that would have dire consequences for the Scottish economy and is due more to the rush to privatisation and the personal aggrandisement of a few than for the protection of the consumer, the continuity or supply or the jobs of my constituents and those of my hon. Friends.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the decision by the South of Scotland Electricity Board to seek tenders for the importation of coal and its consequences on the Scottish coalmining industry."

I listened with care to what the hon. Member has said but I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20 and I cannot, therefore, submit this application to the House. No doubt he will find other ways of bringing it to our attention.

Master of the Rolls

3.35 pm

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether you could give the House some advice on the rules in "Erskine May" about hon. Members criticising judges. The matter arises out of an early-day motion, of which you will be aware, in the names of myself and certain of my hon. Friends in relation to the Master of the Rolls, Sir John Donaldson, after his judgment in the "Spycatcher" case. I subsequently wrote to the Prime Minister about this matter, and then, to my surprise, I received a letter from Sir John Donaldson. I had copied my letter to the Prime Minister to Sir John Donaldson. He wrote to me and told me that he had written to the Prime Minister. Sir John Donaldson, the Master of the Rolls, has gone outside what he said in the court and, as it were, entered the affray.

As I understand the rules of the House, we may attack judges only by way of an early-day motion, but if a judge were to go outside the courts—for example, if a judge were to launch a criticism of a Member of Parliament in relation to his judgment in a newspaper article—the emeritus professor of law at the London School of Economics, John Griffiths, says that that might well place a totally different complexion on things.

I ask you to look at the matter, Mr. Speaker, to see whether, in view of the fact that the Master of the Rolls, Sir John Donaldson, has gone outside the courts by writing to myself and the Prime Minister about his judgment, we may criticise him on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member is quite right to say that it is not open to hon. Members to criticise a judge, except by an early-day motion. He has correctly done that. What he alleges—the possibility of a newspaper article—is pure speculation at the moment. I have no knowledge of that. I shall look carefully at what the hon. Member said.

Mr. Dennis Skinner: (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In reply to my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) you mentioned the possibility of letters, and so on. It is not a question of speculation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the House did not misunderstand me. I was referring to the possibility of an article in the newspapers.

Mr. Skinner: That is exactly the point that I was making. It is not a possibility, and it is not speculation.

The Master of the Rolls, Sir John Donaldson, has brought the matter into the public domain. He wants to have his cake and eat it. We are not allowed to criticise judges on the Floor of the House, because they are not able to criticise Members of Parliament except in a court of law. If judges have the right to attack Members of Parliament outside the courts, we should have the right to attack judges in the House. That is the point that my hon. Friend made. It was not about a speculative effort. It is about the fact that Sir John Donaldson has put it in writing and put it in the public domain.

Mr. Speaker: As I understand it, if I heard the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr.

[Mr. Speaker]

Sedgemore) correctly, the letter was written to the Prime Minister. It is not a question of its being in the public domain.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. What about retired judges, or judges who have gone to the House of Lords? For example, last night I watched Lord Denning in a television programme, "Rough Justice". He said that it is unfortunate that some innocent people are in prison—it is just too bad. Am I not allowed to criticise Lord Denning for making such an idiotic statement? If innocent people are in prison, they should be released. If "Rough Justice", or any other television programme, helps that end, surely it is important for democracy and the rule of law.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows the rules about that, too. Peers—Lord Denning is a peer—may be criticised only by motion.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), did you not make it clear that the letter was not in the public domain? Surely a Prime Minister's letter written, as I understand it, to my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) is in the public domain. This is not exactly a peripheral matter, as some hon. Members seem to think. The Master of the Rolls has gone on record as saying that certain actions that the rest of us might consider illegal are legal in relation to the security services. That is a highly controversial statement, and to say that his letter is not in the public domain is giving the benefit of the doubt away from Parliament.

You, Mr. Speaker, have been the protector of Parliament. Do you not think that, in this context, you should see your role as the protector of the House of Commons against a Master of the Rolls who is doing what no other Master of the Rolls has done in the history of the office?

Mr. Speaker: I have already said that I will look into the matter, and I will do so.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It cannot be correct, as you said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore), that we cannot criticise judges when they make such extraordinary statements. Yesterday Lord Denning appeared on a television programme and engaged in an argument. Any hon. Member should be entitled to make any comment that he wishes about Lord Denning or any other judge.

Secondly, is it not true that, whether they are judges or not, it is perfectly open to Members of this House to criticise members of another place? They must do it in certain ways, but they are entitled to do so.

Thirdly, Mr. Speaker, will you make a statement on the subject to the House tomorrow? Lord Donaldson's judgment was an exceptional event. He said that something that is happening now is beyond the law and he called on Parliament to regularise it. Something is happening that is a breach of the law and he is inviting Parliament to change it. That is not a judge acting as a judge. It is a judge acting as a politician and saying, "We want the matter to be decided by Parliament."

Will you make a statement on those three matters to the House tomorrow? If the rulings were upheld, it would be a grave infringement of the rights of debate in the House.

Mr. Speaker: I have already said that I will look into the matter, and I will do that. As for Lord Denning, the question is whether he was acting in his official capacity, or in another capacity, but I shall look into that matter, too.

European Court of Justice

3.42 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Moving from judges in the United Kingdom to judges elsewhere, you will be aware that the next business on the Order Paper relates to the appointment of judges to the European Court and its extension. Can you advise me whether, under Standing Order No. 102, if more than 20 hon. Members stand in their places, the debate on that document will be on the Floor of the House and will not be referred to a Standing Committee, as the Government wish?

Mr. Speaker: What the hon. Gentleman says is correct, but I am informed that that motion will not be moved.

Local Government Finance Bill (Allocation of Time)

3.43 pm

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton) rose——

Mr. Speaker: May I anticipate the hon. Gentleman? I have not selected the amendment in the names of the hon. Gentleman and several other right hon. and hon. Members.

Sir Peter Emery: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for your statement. However, in procedure, is there not a great deal of difference between debating a matter and testing the support of the House for a matter? On this matter of principle, how can the House reach a decision? On the Education Reform Bill, an exactly similar amendment, which you agreed was in order and which was tabled by members of the previous Procedure Committee, was not selected.

This amendment, which tries to regulate the position, is supported not only by my inferior self, but by a previous Leader of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen), a previous leader of the Labour party, the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), the deputy leader of the Liberal party, the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and other distinguished right hon. and hon. Members. The amendment has not been selected. How, therefore, on this most important matter of timetabling, which is a limitation of Members' rights—there cannot be anything much more important than that—can we ensure that the principle set out in the amendment is not just debatable —we realise that it can be debated—but can be forced to a Division? Surely it is not otiose that we force the Government to a particular point rather than accept their assurances or intentions. Must that not make Members look to you, Mr. Speaker, to ensure their rights against the might of the Government? How can we do that if we cannot vote on the matter?

Mr. Speaker: I imagine that every Business Committee considers a Bill with a view to ensuring that every part of it is debated. That is the object of the Business Committee.

Sir Peter Emery: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May we have that as an official ruling in "Erskine May"? At present that is not the case, and it would be a most important new step if the Business Committee always sought to ensure that every part of the Bill was debated.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter to be included in "Erskine May".

3.46 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): I beg to move,

That the following provisions shall apply to the remaining proceedings on the Bill:

Committee

1.—(1) The Standing Committee to which the Bill is allocated shall report the Bill to the House on or before 24th March 1988.

(2) Proceedings on the Bill at a sitting of the Standing Committee on the said 24th March may continue until Ten p.m., whether or not the House is adjourned before that time, and if the House is adjourned before those proceedings have been brought to a conclusion the Standing Committee shall report the Bill to the House on 25th March 1988.

Report and Third Reading

2.—(1) The proceedings on Consideration and Third Reading of the Bill shall be completed in four allotted days and shall be brought to a conclusion at Ten p.m. on the last of those days; and for the purposes of Standing Order No. 80 (Business Committee) this Order shall be taken to allot to the proceedings on Consideration such part of those days as the Resolution of the Business Committee may determine.

(2) The Business Committee shall report to the House its Resolutions as to the proceedings on Consideration of the Bill, and as to the allocation of time between those proceedings and proceedings on Third Reading, not later than the fourth day on which the House sits after the day on which the Chairman of the Standing Committee reports the Bill to the House.

(3) The Resolutions in any Report made under Standing Order No. 80 may be varied by a further Report so made, whether or not within the time specified in sub-paragraph (2) above, and whether or not the Resolutions have been agreed to by the House.

(4) The Resolutions of the Business Committee may include alterations in the order in which proceedings on Consideration of the Bill are taken.

Procedure in Standing Committee

3.—(1) At a sitting of the Standing Committee at which any proceedings on the Bill are to be brought to a conclusion under a Resolution of the Business Sub-Committee the Chairman shall not adjourn the Committee under any Order relating to the sittings of the Committee until the proceedings have been brought to a conclusion.

(2) No Motion shall be made in the Standing Committee relating to the sitting of the Committee except by a member of the Government and the Chairman shall permit a brief explanatory statement from the Member who makes, and from a Member who opposes, the Motion, and shall then put the Question thereon.

4. No Motion shall be made to alter the order in which Clauses, Schedules, new Clauses and new Schedules are taken in the Standing Committee but the Resolutions of the Business Sub-Committee may include alterations in that order.

Conclusion of proceedings in Committee

5. On the conclusion of the proceedings in any Committee on the Bill the Chairman shall report the Bill to the House without putting any Question.

Dilatory Motions

6. No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, proceedings on the Bill shall be made in the Standing Committee or on an allotted day except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

Motion under Standing Order No. 20: extra time

7. If an allotted day is one to which a Motion for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 stands over from an earlier day, paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings on the Bill for a period of time equal to the duration of the proceedings on that Motion.

Private business

8. Any private business which has been set down for consideration at Seven o'clock on an allotted day shall, instead of being considered as provided by Standing Orders, be considered at the conclusion of the proceedings on the Bill on that day, and paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business) shall apply to the private business for a period of three hours from the conclusion of the proceedings on the Bill or, if those proceedings are concluded before Ten o'clock, for a period equal to the time elapsing between Seven o'clock and the conclusion of those proceedings.

Conclusion of proceedings

9.—(1) For the purpose of bringing to a conclusion any proceedings which are to be brought to a conclusion at a time appointed by this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee or the Business Sub-Committee and which have not previously been brought to a conclusion, the Chairman or Mr. Speaker shall forthwith put the following Questions (but no others)—

(a) any Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) any Question necessary to bring to a decision a Question so proposed (including, in the case of a new

[Mr. John Wakeham]

Clause or new Schedule which has been read a second time, the Question that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill);

(c) the Question on any amendment or Motion standing on the Order Paper in the name of any Member, if that amendment or Motion is made by a Member of the Government;

(d) any other Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded; and on a Motion so made for a new Clause or a new Schedule, the Chairman or Mr. Speaker shall put only the Question that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill.

(2) Proceedings under sub-paragraph (1) above shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

(3) If an allotted day is one on which a Motion for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) would, apart from this Order, stand over to Seven o'clock—

(a) that Motion shall stand over until the conclusion of any proceedings on the Bill which, under this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee, are to be brought to a conclusion at or before that time;

(b) the bringing to a conclusion of any proceedings on the Bill which, under this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee, are to be brought to a conclusion after that time shall be postponed for a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on that Motion.

(4) If an allotted day is one to which a Motion for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 stands over from an earlier day, the bringing to a conclusion of any proceedings on the Bill which, under this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee, are to be brought to a conclusion on that day shall be postponed for a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on that Motion.

Supplemental orders

10.—(1) The proceedings on any Motion made in the House by a member of the Government for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order (including anything which might have been the subject of a report of the Business Committee or Business Sub-Committee) shall, if not previously concluded, be brought to a conclusion one hour after they have been commenced, and paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(2) If on an allotted day on which any proceedings on the Bill are to be brought to a conclusion at a time appointed by this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee the House is adjourned, or the sitting is suspended, before that time no notice shall be required of a Motion moved at the next sitting by a member of the Government for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order.

Saving.

11. Nothing in this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee or Business Sub-Committee shall—

(a) prevent any proceedings to which the Order or Resolution applies from being taken or completed earlier than is required by the Order or Resolution, or

(b) prevent any business (whether on the Bill or not) from being proceeded with on any day after the completion of all such proceedings on the Bill as are to be taken on that day.

Recommittal

12.—(1) References in this Order to proceedings on Consideration or proceedings on Third Reading include references to proceedings, at those stages respectively, for, on or in consequence of recommittal.

(2) On an allotted day no debate shall be permitted on any Motion to recommit the Bill (whether as a whole or otherwise), and Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith any Question necessary to dispose of the Motion, including the Question on any amendment moved to the Question.

Interpretation

13. In this Order

"allotted day" means any day (other than a Friday) on which the Bill is put down as first Government Order of the Day provided that a Motion for allotting time to the proceedings on the Bill to be taken on that day either has been agreed on a previous day or is set down for consideration on that day;

"the Bill" means the Local Government Finance Bill;

"Resolution of the Business Sub-Committee" means a Resolution of the Business Sub-Committee as agreed to by the Standing Committee;

"Resolution of the Business Committee" means a Resolution of the Business Committee as agreed to by the House.

The House will be well aware of the importance of the Local Government Finance Bill to which this motion seeks to apply a timetable. The objectives of the Bill are well known. They are, first, to abolish the injustices of the present domestic rating system; secondly, to make local authorities more accountable and responsive to their electors; and, thirdly, to provide much needed protection for business ratepayers. The Bill will achieve these objectives through the replacement of domestic rates by the fairer community charge, the introduction of a simpler and more stable system of paying revenue support grants to local authorities, and the establishment of a uniform national business rate.

This is not the time or the occasion to go into the details of this measure, but I will make some general comments. The present system of local government finance, where 20 million of the 35 million electorate make no direct contribution to the cost of local services, is not an equitable one, and can lead to irresponsible local authorities of the type that we have so regrettably seen in many of the areas controlled by the Labour party. Moreover, half of local revenue is raised from businesses which are defenceless against exploitation by these same authorities.

Our proposed community charge will introduce the accountability which is currently lacking. All electors, not just a minority, in a local authority's area will have a close personal and financial interest in their council's performance, and will therefore be more concerned that necessary services are provided efficiently. Local democracy should be much strengthened by the Bill.

Mr. Simon Huges (Southwark and Bermondsey): Will the Leader of the House say how businesses will have a greater say after the legislation, given that they will have absolutely no influence on their local rate? Their only influence will be on the Government, and Governments can be just as arbitrary and unlistening as local government.

Mr. Wakeham: Local businesses have no vote and no great influence—[Interruption.] In some areas they may do, and in some areas they do not. We believe that businesses will have more influence through a uniform rate applied throughout the country, which will bring much needed relief to some parts.

Even the Labour party admits that local democracy——

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): The Leader of the House does not seem to understand what the Bill is doing. At present, every local authority has a statutory obligation to discuss the implications of its local budget with the local business community. That obligation is wholly removed by the legislation and there will be no requirement on local authorities to discuss matters with the local business community.

Mr. Wakeham: If some local authorities had exercised their statutory responsibilities and consulted and listened, we might not have got into the difficulty in which we now are. The hon. Gentleman goes right to the heart of the problem. The Labour party admits that local government democracy will be strengthened by the Bill. I quote from the Labour pamphlet, "Labour Councils in the Cold", issued by the Labour Co-ordinating Committee. It states that one of the effects of the community charge would be that "when the local council wants to carry out a programme of service expansion, local people will no longer be cushioned by increased business rates and rate support grant. They will want to know that increased expenditure is well spent".

They will indeed. It is such a pity that the Labour party seems to regard that as a drawback.

Our proposals for replacing domestic rates have long been public knowledge. More than two years ago, the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government", published in January 1986, set out the broad policy now embodied in the Bill. There was widespread consultation on the Green Paper and more than 1,200 responses were received during the 10 months that followed. Separate documents were subsequently published on the community charge, non-domestic rating, the new grant system and the mechanism for appeals.

Moreover, we put our proposals explicitly to the country. Our manifesto for the 1987 general election stated:

"we will legislate in the first Session of the new Parliament to abolish the unfair domestic rating system and replace rates with a fairer community charge."

That commitment was the culmination of a long search for a replacement for domestic rates and was subsequently endorsed in resounding fashion by the electorate. This undertaking was renewed in the Queen's Speech at the opening of Parliament, and the proposals were approved by the House when it gave the Bill a Second Reading by 340 votes to 253.

The House had the opportunity on Second Reading to discuss the principle of the Bill at considerable length, for about 12 hours in all. Since then, more than 72 hours have been spent in Committee in detailed consideration of the community charge alone. So far the Committee has discussed 16 clauses and one schedule, plus five new clauses and a new schedule. More than nine hours were spent debating the 21 non-Government amendments to clause 1, which runs to only five lines. Sixty-seven non-Government amendments were tabled dealing with exemptions from the community charge, set out in clause 2, with 15 hours of debate.

I do not deny that the Bill deserves careful consideration, but so far only 21 clauses, in 72 hours, have received such careful attention.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Can the Leader of the House tell us why it was more than 100 hours before the guillotine was introduced on the Scottish legislation in the last Parliament, and longer before it was introduced on the Rates Bill, of which only six clauses had been debated before the guillotine was introduced? Why is this the earliest guillotine introduced for a local government finance measure, after less time for consideration? Is it because the Government cannot bear to listen to the arguments?

Mr. Wakeham: That is the substance of my speech. Bringing forward the guillotine earlier will ensure that the Bill in total is better discussed in Committee, which is exactly what my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen), my predecessor as Leader of the House, and other right hon. and hon. Gentlemen want.

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): How many Government amendments have we discussed in Committee? I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will acknowledge the Government's inefficiency in drafting the Bill.

Mr. Wakeham: I have no doubt that there were plenty of Government amendments. I have no doubt that they were wise amendments, based on having listened to the debate and having taken notice of it. That shows a proper consideration of the Bill in Committee, which is something that we all want. I hope that I shall set a timetable that will allow further Government amendments, should they be necessary, and time for Opposition amendments, which may not be quite as helpful.

I fear that we do not have available the 400 hours in Committee that would be necessary at the pace that we are going to deal with the remaining 116 clauses and 11 schedules to the Bill. I do not believe that such time would be necessary even if it were available—first, because the essence of our proposals is in part I of the Bill and has already been the subject of wide-ranging debates, and secondly, because I am not wholly convinced that the best possible use has been made of the hours spent in Committee debate. I would not be alone in the House in questioning the worth of discussing eight amendments from the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) which sought merely to amend the name of the community charge, particularly when the hon. Gentleman admitted that their acceptance would not alter his attitude to the Bill.

We have to ensure that there is opportunity for due and structured consideration of all the provisions in the later parts of the Bill. They deal with complex and important issues, such as the revenue support grant and non-domestic rates, which are an integral part of the reform of local government finance. I am concerned today, as I was in bringing forward a timetable motion for the Education Reform Bill, to provide sufficient time for all the issues in the Bill to be properly discussed by this House before it goes to another place. That is the intention of the timetable motion.

The motion would require the Committee to complete its consideration by 10 pm on 24 March. If the Committee continues to sit on the same basis as it has been doing at present, there would be time for more than 80 hours further consideration in Committee. As is customary, it would be for the Business Sub-Committee, which has the important task of allocating the amount of time for discussion of each part of the Bill within the total days available, to decide whether the present pattern of sittings should be maintained or might sensibly be increased. In this context, the amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton and other distinguished hon. Members, although not selected, will be a helpful reminder to the Business Sub-Committee of what is expected of it.

In addition to the Standing Committee's consideration, a further four days on the Floor of the House have been allocated to the Bill's remaining stages. The Business Committee would provide for this time to be used appropriately to allow discussion of all the most important issues. No Leader of the House can consistently introduce timetable motions, each of which is the most generous for 20 years. However, I hope that hon. Members, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton, who are concerned to see proper discussion of all a Bill's provisions in this House, will agree that the generous amount of time provided and the stage at which it is brought forward put this motion in the same class as the one that the House approved three weeks ago for the Education Reform Bill.

to quote a leader last week in a newspaper that has recently proved its devotion to the alliance by splitting itself in half. This is not the old-fashioned guillotine intended abruptly to cut debate, such as we saw 16 times in fewer than three years when the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) was Leader of the House. It is, rather, a carefully planned timetable motion and I am moving it early enough in the Committee stage to ensure that all parts of the Bill receive parliamentary scrutiny. I am sure that the House would not wish another place to be able to complain that this had not been done.

In this case, there is another reason for bringing forward arrangements expediting and structuring discussion of the Bill. It is the task that faces local authorities in implementing it. In little more than 12 months, local authorities will be preparing to canvass their communities for the community charges register and will be getting their registration, billing and collection systems in place. To do this effectively, they need sufficient time for planning.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): As the Bill is apparently the flagship of this Administration, can the right hon. Gentleman explain why his right hon. Friends the Members for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), his hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) and his immediate predecessor as Leader of the House, the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen), are vigorously opposed to the poll tax? As those are just a few of the many Conservative Members who are opposed in principle to the poll tax, how on earth can the country be convinced that this measure is right? Is it surprising that the latest opinion poll shows that over 60 per cent. of people are opposed to the poll tax?

Mr. Wakeham: I noticed that the hon. Gentleman just picked a few names out of a hat in any old fashion. These proposals were very much part of our election manifesto and have been endorsed in the House by a substantial majority. I do not see present any of my right hon. Friends that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. [Interruption.] I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) is present. The vote will show that many hon. Members are in favour of the timetable motion.

We are doing what we can to disseminate information to local authorities, as early as possible, but they cannot implement the charge without the certainty that comes from the legislation and regulations made under it. Many details remain to be prescribed in regulations, and we cannot do that until the legislation has passed through the parliamentary processes. The longer this is delayed, the more difficult we make the task of the local authority practitioners who have the responsibility to their community of making the system work. If time were lost needlessly in Parliament, the local authorities' task would be made unnecessarily onerous.

I commend the motion to the House, in the belief that it provides for measured consideration of the Local Government Finance Bill in the context of the timing constraints within the parliamentary framework, and those outside which I have just outlined. If I may borrow a phrase from the Labour Members:

"the country is crying out for change".

Local electors and local businesses are crying out for a change from an unfair system of local revenue raising, to a more equitable one that will increase local government accountability and strengthen local democracy. The Bill will give them such a change, and the motion will ensure that the remaining clauses of the Bill will be adequately considered and that the community charge can be implemented, as planned, in two years' time.

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): The House could be forgiven for acknowledging that there is a certain predictability about timetable debates. The Leader of the House explains exactly why debate on a crucial issue should be restricted. It is the Opposition's job to explain exactly why debate should go on for considerably longer. It is my job to explain why there should be far more consideration of the Bill, although the House might understand why some Opposition Members adopt a certain ambivalent attitude when we consider what the public at large think about the poll tax.

The Times on 21 January this year stated:

"Tories alarmed at growing opposition to the poll tax".

The figures show that well over two thirds of the electorate are concerned about the effect of a poll tax. Even better, last week, The Independent mentioned

"Strong opposition to poll tax from voters in marginals."

I have to declare an interest. I have a long-standing personal interest in the activities of voters in key marginals. I am delighted to see that, according to the poll in the Local Government Chronicle, a substantial majority of voters in key marginals are wholly opposed to the poll tax, identifying it as an unfair tax. Indeed, many Conservative Members fully appreciate the unfairness of that tax.

The Secretary of State for The Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to one of the conclusions of that particular poll, which stated:

"The Conservatives still hold a clear lead in these key areas."

Mr. Grocott: It refers to Conservative-held marginals. As the Secretary of State will appreciate, 4 per cent. of the electorate were willing to change their vote. It may not be many to him, but it is extremely important to some hon. Members.

I could not have put it better than the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) who said on Second Reading—this is what we shall be telling the country in the months and years ahead—

"Responsibility for the poll tax will now be targeted precisely and unavoidably at the Government who introduced that tax. That tax will be known as a Tory tax."—[Official Report, 16 December 1987; Vol. 124, c. 1141.]

We shall make sure that no one remains in any doubt about that.

It might be in the interest of the Labour party to give the Government some assistance. When the poll tax proposals slip through people's doors, that will be good news for us. However, not for the first time, I ask my hon. Friends to put the public interest before the party's interest and ensure that the Bill is thoroughly scrutinised. If that means some delay, so be it.

There is no doubt about what will be that impact of the poll tax when it happens, whether or not we accept the guillotine motion. There has not been sufficient time to debate the Bill. As has already been explained, only 16 clauses have been debated and we have reached only the first schedule to the Bill.

It should be remembered that there is no precedent for such a Bill in England and Wales, although one exists in Scotland. I am sure that if some of the Conservative Members form Scotland who voted for the guillotine on the Scottish Bill just over a year ago were present today, they would advise their hon. Friends whether there should be another guillotine.

The tax is unique in its scale. Never before has a new tax been introduced which will directly affect 30 million of our fellow citizens. Never before has there been on such a scale a new tax that is unrelated to people's ability to pay or to the quality of services that they receive. Never before has a tax been introduced which is redistributive not in the way that most 20th-century economists understand the term, but in a notion unique to the Tories under Thatcherism—not through a tax system which helps the poor, but through a tax system which redistributes the burden from those best able to pay to those least able to pay. That is a novel concept. Never before has a tax been introduced which will cost twice as much to collect as the system which it replaces.

The poll tax is unique and requires unique parliamentary consideration. It is also unique in the unanimity of opposition to it. It would not be a bad parliamentary principle if the consideration that the House gives to legislation was at least related to the degree of opposition to it in the country. The opposition to the poll tax is unanimous.

Only last Wednesday, my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) asked the Secretary of State for the Environment

"how many letters he has received from members of the public (a) in support of the community charge and (b) opposed to the community charge."

I should have thought that that was a fairly simple question which might have a fairly simple answer. However, the Secretary of State replied:

"A summary of 1,271 responses received . . . was placed in the Library . . . Since then my Department has received a large number of letters commenting on specific aspects of our proposals and requesting further information." —[Official Report, 17 February 1988; Vol. 127, c. 960.]

I bet that he has received further comments and proposals, but he did not give a straight answer to a straight question. The Secretary of State has had an expensive education —I was going to say "a good education". I am sure that he is capable of giving a straight answer to a straight question, but we have not heard how many people are against the poll tax, in terms of the representations received, and how many people are in favour of it.

Everyone is against the poll tax. On a free and secret ballot, I am sure that many Conservative Members would vote against it. All the professionals in local government are against it. In repeated survey of local government finance since the war the poll tax has had hardly a mention as a serious way of financing local government. It appears by a fluke at this very late stage.

Again I quote the right hon. Member for Henley, who on Second Reading said:

"by the time that consultation period on the Green Paper was over, the idea of a poll tax had no friends. It was dismissed by the Cabinet with hardly a backward glance. I wish that I could come to the House and say that I won the argument, but in truth there was no argument."—[Official Report, 16 December 1987; Vol. 1432, c. 1138-39.]

That sums up the view of the right hon. Gentleman, which is shared by many Tories.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that that followed the Layfield commission, which is broadly accepted by both sides of the House as the most definitive analysis of local government finance which did not find it worth considering?

Mr. Grocott: The hon. Gentleman knows that repeatedly, from the Allen committee in the 1960s through the Layfield report, the Green Paper and the report of the Select Committee on the Environment, that proposal has not received any serious consideration. Least of all has it received serious consideration from those at the sharp end — those who will implement it. In my area of The Wrekin, the district council officers have prepared a report on the costs and problems of the implementation of the poll tax, which says:

"On the assumption that 97,000 adults will be liable to pay poll tax, then an additional 760,000 payments could be received, an increase of 370 per cent. It is envisaged that the increase in workload, due to increases in volume and likely problems with collection, will be massive."

That is one district council's assessment of what will be involved.

Mr. Winnick: Is my hon. Friend aware that in the Select Committee on the Environment, on which the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) and I sit, when there was a clear Tory majority in 1981, there was no vote in favour of a poll tax? Does my hon. Friend agree that if there were a free vote in the Cabinet, only two would be in favour of the poll tax — that fanatic, the Prime Minister, and the Secretary of State?

Mr. Grocott: Strange things happen in Cabinets where Prime Ministers are surrounded by sycophants, and that is one of the problems that we face.

No one, particularly those at the sharp end who will have to deliver the system, is in favour of the poll tax. The opposition to it is near unanimous, and the Bill requires parliamentary scrutiny in view of that fact.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Grocott: No, I will not.

There is another reason why it is essential that we debate this proposition more than we would any normal legislative proposal. This measure, rightly called a poll tax, is a threat to our democratic process. That is not true of most taxes. I do not like VAT, but I do not think for a moment that it is a threat to democracy. Can anyone seriously doubt that the imposition of the poll tax will be a serious disincentive to many of our citizens from registering their right to vote in the normal way? We already know that electoral registers are used for many strange purposes. They get sold to finance companies, discount agencies, insurance companies and the rest. Who can doubt that the poll tax man will get his hands on the electoral register? It is inevitable.

I am delighted that the public are in no doubt about what kind of tax this is. In the opinion poll to which I referred earlier, carried out by NOP Market Research Ltd. — a reputable firm — and published in the Local Government Chronicle, 77 per cent. of those questioned referred to the tax as a poll tax. Only 2 per cent.—they must have been brainwashed by the Tories in some way — called it a community charge. Overwhelmingly, the public understand it for what it is. It is a tax on the right to vote. It will be forever known as the poll tax, however much the Leader of the House may resent the fact that we tabled amendments about a change to that name.

So far, no Government spokesman has explained the difference between a tax and a charge. Why do they persist in calling it a community charge? Is it just the doctrine that one expects from a Ministry of Truth trying to pretend that a tax is not a tax? By any definition, this is a tax. I dread the Tory propaganda at the next general election. It may say that since the Government have replaced rates with a community charge, there has been a substantial reduction in taxation.

If the Government are honest about calling taxes charges, why do they not introduce a "pay-as-you-earn income charge" or a "value added charge" as a way to pretend that tax does not exist? We should beware if the Government persist in playing with words in this way. The Prime Minister told us in the general election campaign that the Government would not introduce VAT on children's clothes or on food. I know that some of my hon. Friends do not believe that, but even if we take the Prime Minister's words at face value, she did not say anything about the imposition of a value added charge. Perhaps we can look forward to that.

Such a proposal could come only from a Government composed of a Prime Minister surrounded by sycophants who do not even dare to tell her when all of them know that what is being proposed is absurd. This proposal is the product of a Government who think that they can walk on water, but who deserve to sink without trace. I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends will insist that the poll tax should get the full parliamentary treatment that it deserves, and that is why I hope they will vote against the guillotine motion.

Mr. John Biffen (Shropshire, North): These occasions always have a casual and friendly character about them, and this afternoon is no departure from that tradition. Although the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Grocott) made a speech of some length, and eventually worked himself up to the enthusiasm appropriate for a Second Reading debate, he did not identify the guillotine as the most onerous and most undemocratic imposition upon the House as it deals with one of the most unacceptable Bills that has ever confronted it.

I was pleased that the hon. Member approached the matter in that spirit, because we already know that political hotheads north of the Tweed are talking about non-payment of this tax. Therefore, we are entitled to hear from the Opposition Front Bench right away that such action will have their condemnation, and if they are not prepared to do it formally, the mild and civilised way in which that speech was delivered was a clear sign that they will distance themselves from the activists in Scotland who are proposing to boycott the tax.

I am pleased to have had the chance to sign the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) and I appreciate the order in which the debate will proceed. I hope that on some future occasion we can so arrange our affairs that the amendment, which is in order and has been so adjudged, may be part of our debate in more tangible terms than merely being a matter for discussion.

I shall comment on the terms of the guillotine motion in general. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House on bringing in this guillotine earlier, and on providing rather more time, than has traditionally been the case. This is a welcome evolution, and I hope that it will point to a final conclusion and to the end being sought by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton. That will be to the advantage of the House when dealing with these matters.

In particular, we require all the time that has been mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, because the time already spent has been devoted substantially to the form of the community charge. It has not yet resulted in any major alteration, and that is an oversight which the House must remedy. As ever, in these matters, I travel with some hope, because my right hon. Friend prayed in aid as the precedent for his action today what had been done in respect of the Education Reform Bill. The House will know that, within the last few days, amendments to that Bill have been tabled—amendments of the most far-reaching character, which will have a substantial consequence on the provision for universities.

That is an encouragement to those on both sides of the House who believe that if one decides—it is a decision which I endorsed and voted for on Second Reading—that it is better, in local authority revenue matters, to have a tax on persons than a tax on property, how one elaborates that judgment, that choice and that decision is a matter which belongs properly to Parliament. It is a sector in which the Executive should never be afraid or unwilling to make major adjustments. We have the clear and reasonable example of the Education Reform Bill to inspire us. I say that in the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), who can speak with far more authority than I about the content of the Local Government Finance Bill. Our debate is not so much about the content of the legislation as about the modalities within which the content can be debated.

There is no doubt that many people — I am among them — believe that the idea of a graduated community charge based on Inland Revenue records has more equity and practicability than the proposal before the House. Of course the hon. Member for The Wrekin was right to dwell for a moment on the effects of taxation on the political processes. It was valid for him to claim that certain taxes have become part and parcel of a controversy which has run over time. That tax issue exemplified social and economic judgments that were identified with the political participants. I dare say that that fate will await this tax. It will be several years before its final implication and execution are perceived by the public.

When considering these issues, we are not trying to deal with a short-term battle of consequences in the first half of a parliamentary Session. I remember the great part that many of my right hon. and hon. Friends, who now sit on the Treasury Bench, played in the campaign against the selective employment tax. That campaign was conducted with great skill and eventually that tax foundered in derision and resentment. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment may believe that he is the captain on the bridge of the flagship, but that ship may turn out to be the Titanic.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): The earlier part of the comments made by the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) almost led us to believe that he was supporting the Government's action. He spoke in such a persuasive and emollient manner that, for a moment, even one or two of his former colleagues on the Government Front Bench were deceived. However, those of us who know the right hon. Member, know him better than that.

I can summarise the right hon. Gentleman's speech even more abruptly than he summarised it himself. He was trying to tell the Government Front Bench that only a bunch of blithering idiots could have assembled on a Thursday morning and pushed through such a measure as this in the hope that they could carry it on to the statute book. Nothing so demeaning to the House of Commons or so insulting to the electorate would ever have occurred while the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North was a member of that Cabinet. The sooner they put it right the better. That is roughly what the right hon. Gentleman was saying, although he did not use exactly those words.

Mr. Ridley: The right hon. Gentleman does my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) a disservice. He was a member of that Cabinet.

Mr. Foot: When was the decision taken to carry through the poll tax? No doubt the Secretary of State listened to the discussion, although we have been told that there was hardly any discussion about it in Cabinet. If the Secretary of State will reveal secrets about what happened, I dare say that the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North will be eager to respond to protect his reputation. Indeed, no doubt many other dissenting members of that Cabinet would want the right to put their points of view. If the Secretary of State is so eager to jump to the Dispatch Box to claim that the decision was unanimous, the full truth should be revealed, instead of the partial truth that we have come to expect from the Secretary of State, particularly when he is defending a very weak case, as he is now.

I hope that the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North will not leave the Chamber, because I am about to refer to that part of his speech that appeared to support the Government. The right hon. Gentleman began with some quietening references to the whole question of procedure. He commended the procedure motion on the grounds that it did something much earlier than is normally the case with guillotine motions. He is quite right about the timetable arrangements under which these proposals are normally brought forward.

It is the case that this motion, like the previous guillotine motion that the Leader of the House introduced a fortnight ago, is being introduced earlier than usual in the Session. That is one of the reasons why I am opposed to the motion. The hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) has long advocated making the procedure of these discussions cut and dried. He has advocated timetable motions from the beginning of the proceedings on every Bill. He believes that this is the proper way in which these matters should proceed. I am sorry to see that the hon. Member for Honiton appears to have the support of the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North today. He also had the right hon. Gentleman's support a fortnight ago. The right hon. Member for Shropshire, North carries great influence in the House, and I am sorry to see him joining in this campaign.

I signed the hon. Member for Honiton's motion, not because I am in favour of the general proposition, but because I believe that anything is better than anything that this Government ever propose. Therefore, when they propose such a timetable motion, naturally an amendment of this type would limit it and would have some value if it were carried by the House. I am sorry that we will not have the opportunity to vote on the amendment. It would at least have helped to ensure that proper time was allocated to these different subjects under the normal procedure.

I do not believe that it would be good for the House or for the scrutiny of Bills if there were timetable motions on every Bill. I was opposed to the motion when the Chairman brought it from the Select Committee on Procedure and I strongly supported my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) on that occasion. Although I have been known to favour guillotine motions—I shall deal with that in a moment as it has been referred to, just as I shall deal with the Leader of the House's attitude—I am strongly opposed to this motion.

I have participated in more guillotine debates than has any other hon. Member. Indeed, I have participated in these debates since 1945. Sometimes I have been in favour of them, and sometimes not, but there has never been a guillotine motion that could be justified in the way that the Leader of the House is trying to justify this one.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow West): Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that when he introduced five guillotine motions in one day he used almost exactly the same form or words as those used by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House? Does the right hon. Gentleman recall saying:

"it is a particular illustration of the malice, folly and absurdity into which right hon. and hon. Members on the Opposition side have got themselves that when we exercise those ancient rights it is cheating and when they exercise them it is freedom."? — [Official Report, 20 July 1976; Vol. 915, c.1543.]

Mr. Foot: What I said then was extraordinarily apposite. I would not dream of withdrawing a word. If the hon. Gentleman looks back into history he will see that, as usual, I was stating the case with the utmost moderation. I was trying to restrain my language, while putting my opponents in their place.

Of course I was going to refer to the day when I introduced five guillotine motions. I would not dream of apologising for that. I would be willing to give way to the Leader of the House in a moment. Indeed, I will give way to him now, as he appears eager to speak.

It is 22 February today, and the previous guillotine motion was introduced, I believe, on 1 February. There is a great difference between introducing such motions on 1

February, 10 February or 11 February and introducing them when I introduced mine. If the Leader of the House knows so much about this, perhaps he will tell the House when I introduced those motions. When was it? He is shaking his head. He rebuked me last week and said that I did not know what I was talking about. Before doing that he should have looked up the date.

Those five guillotine motions were introduced on 20 July. That is quite late in the Session. If we had not had the guillotine motions, all those five measures would have been destroyed. There is not the slightest doubt about that. They were five good measures and, as I have said, if it had not been for the guillotine motions, those measures would never have reached the statute book.

Mr. Wakeham: I was taught that fine words butter no parsnips. When the right hon. Gentleman was Leader of the House, he was responsible for 16 guillotine motions in three years. I shall not go into detail, because he can do that. However, in none of those motions did he allow the four days for Report and Third Reading that are contained in this timetable motion. Also, none of them had more than 10 days for the completion of the Standing Committee proceedings, and there are 20 in this motion.

Mr. Foot: I must introduce the Leader of the House to some of these matters. He must try to grasp the point. If one introduces a guillotine motion in July, it is very different from introducing it in January or February.

If one starts to introduce timetable motions in January or February, one is moving towards the principle, advocated by the hon. Member for Honiton, of saying, "Let us timetable all measures almost from the beginning." Therefore, by subterfuge, the Leader of the House is effectively saying that we will have timetable motions on every Bill but that it will not be done by putting to the House a general motion that upholds the doctrine of the hon. Member for Honiton. They are trying to sneak it through and are attempting to distract attention by spreading great misconceptions about what happened on 20 July 1976, even though they did not have the foggiest notion of the date.

Mr. Wakeham: When the right hon. Gentleman was treating the House to a confidential recollection of those days, I thought that he might have told the House that for quite a number of weeks before that date the then Labour Government did not have a majority and were waiting for a couple of by-election results. Therefore, I am not sure that the right hon. Gentleman's arguments are as convincing as he makes out.

Mr. Foot: I can tell the Leader of the House that I recollect the time much better than he does. I had much better reason for ensuring that the calculations were correct. Some people have said that arithmetic is not always my strongest point. However, I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I can count the numbers in the House. There were some quite big commotions before that time.

The critical issue is that Governments have the right, in certain circumstances, to introduce timetable motions. It was right in 1976, and I justified the motions at the time. We had a narrow majority, but that was part of the argument. If we had not introduced those timetable motions, all those measures would have fallen. I would be happy to discuss with the House what wonderful measures they were, although I am not sure that that would be in order.

One of those measures was the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Bill, the purpose of which was to protect jobs. One concerned the dock labour scheme, which again was to protect jobs. Another was an excellent Education Bill, which was supported by a potential member of the Social Democratic party. There was another excellent measure to abolish the tied house for the first time in our history. So good was it that not even this Government have dared to seek to repeal it. I hesitate to mention it, because when they see what wonderful measures are still on the statute book, thanks to the then Labour Government and the guillotine motions, they might be tempted to come forward with measures to remove them.

The problem of the tied house was solved by that Bill. It was a problem that had given rise to great injustices over many generations. It was solved partly because we were determined that the Bill would not be wrecked by opposition in the House or by opposition in the House of Lords. However, I do not want to say anything against the House of Lords now, because it might have a convenient role to play on this squalid measure that the Government are trying to push through by this even more squalid motion.

I hope that the Leader of the House will not come forward again quoting that famous day of 20 July. If he does, I hope that he will get his facts right. I know what a forceful figure he is in the Cabinet and how he bangs on the table and says, "We will not have that." I hope that at the next Cabinet meeting he will say, "No more timetable motions before 20 July." If the right hon. Gentleman will do that, he will do a service to the House as well as change the reputation that he may have about how he tells the Government to deal with the business.

One of the real troubles in the House today is that the Leader of the House has had great experience in the House, but in another capacity. Once a boy scout, always a boy scout, and once a Chief Whip, always a Chief Whip. Chief Whips should be elevated, but only with circumspection. Look what happened to a former Chief Whip, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath). He got into trouble when he got out of his depth. That should be taken to heart by the Leader of the House, and he should be careful before he moves on to higher altitudes. He should be a little more careful in future and he should read up on history.

The right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewksbury (Mr. Ridley) must have a smattering of history from the public school that he attended. I should have thought that at least one of the Ministers would have said. "You cannot have a poll tax. We cannot introduce a measure that brought about the peasants' revolt." Do Government Members not know about the peasants' revolt? Most of them are well-heeled landlords, so they should know what happened. In that revolt, the Government were defeated. They thought that they could get away with a poll tax. The history is all on the record. If there had been any properly educated members of the Cabinet, that history should have been read out when the measure was first introduced.

An excellent pamphlet on this subject was published. A famous poet laureate wrote a book about it. He said:

"It is not to be wondered that this poll tax should contribute to heighten the discontents of the common people, seeing the heavy taxes . . . had been an intolerable burden on them, not lying so much on the nobility and the gentry as on their copyholders and tenants, who repined at these exactions, as impositions upon them without their own consent."

The poll tax was withdrawn and defeated, and the same will happen to this one. The Prime Minister should look at that example. Not even Richard II was fool enough to say that the poll tax was his flagship, which he wished to protect and sail into port. Everyone should know that what happened to him was partly a result of the poll tax that he introduced.

This is a serious matter. One part of the country—Scotland—has had a better chance than the others of discussing the poll tax. It has had a better chance partly because of the way in which the Bill affecting Scotland was introduced. I am not quite sure why the system should be tried out on the Scots in that way. I am not sure which member of the Cabinet said, "Let us see how they take it north of the border. We can try it on them, and if it works we will try it on the others." I cannot understand why they decided to try it on the Scots; nor can the Scots themselves understand why.

As even the Leader of the House should know, at the last general election the poll tax was repudiated throughout the country, as was the Conservative party in Scotland. If the Government proceed to force the poll tax down the throats of the people of Scotland and of the rest of the United Kingdom they will do great injury to the unity of the United Kingdom. There is great hostility to the tax in Scotland. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman goes up there, but I can assure him that were he to do so he would get a hot reception. The preservation of the unity of the United Kingdom should be a predominant interest and, on that ground alone, the tax should be withdrawn.

The poll tax will eventually lead to the defeat of the Government. Whether it leads to their defeat before or after an election rests with them, but if a sufficient number of intelligent Members oppose the tax and exercise their vote tonight, even if we do not win, if the majority is cut to 10 or 15, the effect in the other place will be considerable. That includes the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North, whose advice on the matter, as on so many others, was no doubt unwisely rejected by the Cabinet. The poll tax should be defeated before it is brought to the country. By doing its duty tonight, and achieving that result, the House would be doing a service to the nation.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) or, as I always remember him, for Ebbw Vale. He was in Ebbw Valean form in his speech. It was delightful in its charm and historical references, but in many ways it was entirely out of touch with what is happening in the country and with what will happen in the future when the Bill is enacted.

I do not wish to do as some other speakers have done and conduct a Second Reading debate yet again on the community charge. We are dealing with a timetable motion. I listened carefully to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House when he said that sufficient time would be provided for due and structural consideration of all parts of the Bill. That is part of my contention and what the Procedure Committee has been pressing on the House for many years.

The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent was doing me a disservice when he suggested that I had always advocated a timetable motion since the introduction of the legislation. I did not suggest that, nor did the Procedure Committee, and it would be wrong for the House to have that impression.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): I appreciate that my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), as a member of the Procedure Committee, does not wish to advocate that, but that is precisely what we have had on the Bill. Proceedings in Committee were a great pleasure because of the free-going debate between both sides, instead of Conservative Members sitting like stuffed ducks on the Back Benches. The debate has been good-natured from the start. In the early stages of the proceedings, it was rumoured that there would be a guillotine. As a result, hon. Members felt encouraged to participate in a debate which otherwise would not take place in Committee.

Sir Peter Emery: I am delighted to hear the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) about the pleasures of serving on the Committee. However, nine amendments were tabled in respect of the title of the Bill, so that scarcely seems to represent free-ranging and massive debate about the Bill and associated procedures. We have spent 72 hours on the bill and debated only 21 clauses. As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said, if that pace of jovial exchange continues, we shall need up to 400 hours. I do not know whether my right hon. Friend is right, but I see no reason to contradict him.

Mr. Leigh: Our debates in Committee have not always been so jovial. On one occasion, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) spoke for one hour and 40 minutes on one amendment and repeated himself frequently. I sympathise with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery). Does he agree that, if the motion is passed and 150 hours of debate are granted, the Bill will have been more thoroughly debated than virtually any other Bill before Parliament?

Sir Peter Emery: The Bill will certainly have as long as almost any other Bill before Parliament, but I am not certain whether it will be as adequately debated as I should have wished.

The Procedure Committee is not suggesting that, rather than have the present type of timetable motion the standard motion, with dates and times altered, but otherwise exactly the same as other such motions for a number of years — we should introduce a massive controlling element with all items in the Bill guillotined from the start. The Committee made a helpful suggestion which played very much into the House's way of dealing with legislation.

The only new aspect was that a Business Sub-Committee should be set up, consisting of the members of the Standing Committee, when the Standing Committee was appointed. After 12½ hours of debate, that Standing Committee, presumably with two Whips as members, should consider whether reasonable and proper progress was being made. If so, that would be the end of the matter. However, if one or other side believed that that was not so, the matter should be decided when the date for the Bill to be reported to the House was known. When that date was known, the Bill should be pushed through with help from the usual channels.

The recommendation of the Procedure Committee clearly states:

"The Business Sub-committee of the Standing Committee shall allocate the time so as to ensure that all parts of the Bill can be adequately scrutinised and every substantive proposal of the Bill considered."

Those are the same words as are in the amendment that has not been selected. That does not necessarily mean that the Committee would debate every clause or amendment, but the major and substantive matters would be debated in Committee.

If, after 25 hours, the usual channels were unable to use their influence to obtain proper progress, the business sub-committee will act, as it will in respect of this timetable motion, to set times for debate of the different parts of the Bill in Committee and in the House. We would not, therefore, have to waste another half-day on another timetable motion.

We have already wasted half a day on a timetable motion on the Education Reform Bill, and there is a great possibility that there will be other timetable motions before the end of the Session. Time on the Floor of the House should be spent on matters which are far more important than a rerun of Second Reading, which is basically what we have had today so far. Time could be much better spent debating major issues which hon. Members want debated and for which the Leader of the House can never find time.

When I first came to the House in the 1960s, a timetable motion created great political divisions. Both sides of the House were full, normal relations between the usual channels were all but broken and we debated the motion for a whole day. It was a matter of high dudgeon. All that has passed. The past 20 years have altered everything, and today we have a rather anodyne debate which gets us nowhere and allows the Government to do what we ought to be able to arrange to do through Standing Orders, as suggested by the Procedure Committee. We could then save time on the Floor of the House and ensure that every contentious issue and important aspect of the Bill was properly debated. That is what the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent wants. Indeed, it appears to be what every right hon. and hon. Member wants.

We ought, towards the end of the 20th century, to begin to have a reasonable command of how we use our time on the Floor of the House and in Committee. The sooner we do that, the better it will be for legislation and the more likely it is that the public will know that every aspect of a Bill has been debated properly.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House hopes that all the issues will be debated properly, but there is no assurance that that will happen. I am sorry that we cannot vote on the amendment which I have tabled. With such an assurance, the Committee might have to sit on Wednesdays and Fridays. The House owes it to the people who have to put up with legislation to ensure that every clause is debated before a Bill comes back to the House on Report. I believe that, sooner or later, we shall have to adopt that view.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I agree with the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) and support his amendment, which has been endorsed by two former Leaders of the House — the right hon. Members for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) and for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot). My hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has signed the amendment, and my colleagues and I believe that it would be the right way in which to proceed. Because, however, there will not be ordered debate of the Bill and because of the Bill's nature, I strongly oppose the motion.

Nobody has yet mentioned the salient fact that the Bill has 131 clauses and 12 schedules and that we have spent just over 72 hours in Committee spread over 16 sittings. In an intervention, I asked the Leader of the House to make two obvious comparisons. The first was the equivalent Bill for Scotland, for which the guillotine motion was brought in after 101 hours of debate and after 20 of the 35 clauses had been considered. The second was with the Rates Act 1984, which was guillotined after 18 hours of debate when six of the 19 clauses had been debated.

The Leader of the House said that this time the motion is being introduced earlier so that things can be ordered earlier and all the arguments and issues can be considered properly. Observers of the Committee do not leave feeling that the Government have considered either the arguments or the issues. One of the most amazing statements of all was made on Second Reading, when the Under-Secretary of State said:

"My right hon. Friend made it clear early in the debate that the Committee will be delighted to look at any alternative proposals. I am sure that all alternative proposals will be totally unacceptable." — [Official Report, 16 December 1987; Vol. 124, c. 1184.]

If that is not an example of closing the mind before hearing the arguments, I do not know what is.

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that some of the 72 hours have been spent by his hon. Friend the Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor), who I notice is absent, in what I would call a perambulation around the course and that, at times, he has gone virtually backwards?

Mr. Hughes: I am glad to put on record what my colleagues have achieved. The hon. Gentleman's assertion is untrue, because the one concession that the Government have made has been in response to an amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie). [HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish."] I can provide the column number of the report. It was the only explicit concession that the Minister made, and concerned discretionary rather than compulsory punishment of defaulters by imprisonment. The event was well publicised.

We should consider which parties have moved amendments. Plaid Cymru has moved four, the Liberals have moved 15, Labour has moved 47 and the Government have moved no fewer than 49. It is the Government, whose Bill this is, who have taken up most of the Committee's time and effort. They did not get the Bill drafted properly in the first place, so they are having to change definitions and introduce amendments and schedules to put the Bill in some presentable shape. If the Government had presented the Committee with a properly drafted Bill, they might have had a better case for asking for a timetable motion to be passed.

Mr. Patnick: How many of the Government's amendments have been moved formally?

Mr. Hughes: Quite a lot, because they were consequential. A Bill which is properly prepared, however, should not have to be amended by the Government in the first few sittings. Exactly the same can be said about other Bills. On the Committee presently considering the Housing Bill, the Minister concedes that not even all the ideas have been thought through, let alone the clauses.

We are presented with a fundamental change in the financing of local government. The Bill is long, but the Government are curbing debate much earlier than has been true of other comparable measures. The Government are rewriting the Bill as they go along, and they are not listening to the Opposition's arguments. Indeed, they are not even listening to their own Back Benchers.

When discussing the Government's failure to accept any amendments, the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North used a wonderful phrase—he said that it must be an oversight. It is not an oversight. The Government have clearly determined to accept no substantive amendments. The true motive of the Secretary of State has been revealed in Committee:

"We do not want one group of people making no contribution while others have to pay for everything. We want everybody to feel that they are making their contribution, however small. That is a move away from a two-class society of payers and takers, to a society where we all pay a little according to our means."

If we all paid according to our means, that might be all right. But, although the means of the Secretary of State and his Cabinet colleagues, for instance, are somewhat greater than the means of others, it is Cabinet members who are among those who on all the evidence will benefit the most.

I wonder whether the use of the word "takers" does not tell us something as well. Is it perhaps not true that the Secretary of State views pensioners who rely on the social services to stay alive as "takers", irrespective of the fact that in the past they may have given their all? Does that not apply to any other local services that are of a redistributive nature? The clear implication of the phrase is that the Bill will redistribute resources to the wealthy from the poor. That is why the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North warned the Government that this might be their Titanic.

It is also clearly a party political measure, and the guillotine is a party political proposal. The Leader of the House said that the Bill was intended to deal with the fact that people vote for the wrong party — he actually mentioned the Labour party — because voters do not have to pay. People often vote for the Labour party, or for my party, in areas of the country where they cannot pay. They do so because they know that we are the only people likely to be able to defend them against a Government who seem to think that they and their views and their circumstances do not matter.

It is not as if the Government had been putting forward intellectually wonderful and convincing arguments to detain the Committee, either. On 26 January, the Secretary of State put the following pearl before the Opposition, whom he possibly regarded as swine, and certainly regards as an unnecessary inconvenience. I get the impression that he regards Parliament as an inconvenience in general, and would like to be able to legislate by decree. Happily, however, after only three Thatcher terms, we are not there yet. The Secretary of State said:

"The Opposition also seem to equate the ability to pay with the concept of fairness, as if it were automatic. I do not believe that it is automatic. No one has said that it is unfair that everyone should pay the same vehicle excise duty or the same television licence fee because they are not related to the ability to pay."

The right hon. Gentleman may not have realised that people have a choice as to whether they have a car or a television. They do not have to have those items. But no one has a choice about whether to pay the poll tax. People will have to pay it even if they do not have a home, or do not have an income. Under clause 2, which defines a main or principal residence, the Government have said that it is not even necessary to have a house. Dossers, tramps, vagrants and travellers have no incomes and no homes, but, say the Government, "We shall make them pay." People have not been deceived by the present Administration, and this is their crowning glory.

I accept that, in comparison with the time allowed for other Bills, four days for Report and Third Reading is generous, and to be welcomed. My objection, and that of my colleagues, is the Government seeking to limit so early, and so substantially, the time given for proper consideration of such a momentous Bill. We had considerably more time to consider the Bill that abolished six metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council, although it did not affect nearly so many people.

Mr. Leigh: The hon. Gentleman said that he would deal with this point, but I do not think that he has done so. If the timetable motion is passed, we shall have debated the Bill for 150 hours in Committee. I am not aware of many Bills that have been debated in Committee for that long. By passing the motion at this early stage, we shall ensure that all the clauses are properly debated.

Mr. Hughes: I think that I have answered that point, but I shall repeat my answer. I accept that a Bill should be debated in such a way that all parts of it are debated reasonably. My quibble is not with that notion, but with the total length of time provided. For a Bill of this importance, length and complexity, we are not being allowed enough time. I can draw all the comparisons that are available in the record of parliamentary debate on the subject.

The Secretary of State, on 26 January—obviously, it was a fateful day—also said:

"Support for the present rating system is practically zero."
—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 26 January 1988; c. 96-98.]

According to Public Service and Local Government of October 1987, an opinion poll revealed that 26 per cent. of respondents supported the current system of rates, while only 14 per cent. supported the community charge. If support for the present rating system is "practically zero", support for the community charge is considerably less.

The Local Government Chronicle of 29 January had figures to similar effect:

"Of all those questioned, 45 per cent. would choose to continue with the present rates system and only 21 per cent. would prefer poll tax . . . The only section of the population which favours poll tax over rates is the better off in social class AB, who will in general gain from a flat rate tax."

[Mr. Hughes]

Guess which social class the members of the Cabinet, to a person, belong to!

Despite the Government amendments, the Bill still contains anomalies. Prisoners on remand will be liable for the tax; convicted prisoners will not. Students will receive 80 per cent. relief as of right; student nurses will not. The Bill will legislate against those who care most for the most vulnerable in the community. Already, people are not registering to vote. Today's edition of The Times reports that the electoral register in Kensington and Chelsea contains nearly 5,500 fewer names, and the paper says:

"officials estimate that 3,500 of these have been deterred from registering because they believe the electoral roll will be used to enforce the poll tax."

In Glasgow, where preparations for the poll tax are already advanced, 11,000 names have this year disappeared from the register, against an annual drop in previous years of 3,000 to 5,000.

The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent was right to refer to the only other experience that we have had in England of a poll tax. A book by someone called Marie Louise Bruce tells us:

"By 1381 the peasants had a ready-made bonfire of discontents that only awaited a spark to ignite and this came in the form of a new poll-tax . . . it was impossibly onerous. Nevertheless revolt did not follow at once, the peasants tried a more peaceful means of evasion . . . They lied about the number of adults in their families".

They revolted all right, but first they tried to escape an unfair charge.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): There were no rebates.

Mr. Hughes: No, there were not. But, even without communication or a proper Opposition, they saw through the system of an autocratic Government.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: No; I want to reach the end of my speech.

The fact that the poll tax is not connected to people's ability to pay—except in the case of the very poorest—makes it not just a tax on people's votes, but a tax on their very lives. That is objectionable, but entirely consistent with the views of a Government who value property above people. They are willing to tax people who have little or nothing, but leave untaxed the property of those who have something or much.

Unlike many campaigns of opposition from politicians, the growing opposition to the poll tax will eventually win the day. Unusually, there is already an all-party fleet preparing to set sail to defeat the so-called flagship of the third Thatcher attack — "Flagship Futility", as The Guardian has called it. "Flagship Folly" would be a better title. The Opposition's job—and in the coming year no political job will be more nationally important in Scotland, England or Wales—is to ensure that as many members as possible of all parties and of none who, unlike the present Government, believe in the community and understand the unfairness of the charge, are the vanguard of the great people's rebellion to axe this new poll tax as they axed the last.

Any Government can ignore the community to an extent. But if they limit discussion and steamroller a Bill through the House without listening to the Opposition or conceding to any better arguments from either side, they risk the realisation in the other place that this legislation is a foolish way to proceed and the determination of the public outside to make their views abundantly clear.

The Leader of the House began his speech by saying that the country is crying out for change. If the Government are determined not to change this legislation, they will certainly pay for the consequences.

5.9 pm

Sir George Young (Ealing, Acton): The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) can take this as a compliment if he wishes, but I am sure that the Committee would not have made the progress that it has made if he had been deliberating with us.

There is an element of ritual about these debates, as has been said. As far as I can see, the speeches are kept on word processors and remain the same as the parties change. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House might usefully have deleted the standard sentence, "The country is crying out for change," when he spoke about this piece of legislation, because all the evidence that I have seen shows that the more the country learns about the Bill, the less it is crying out for the change.

Having voted against the Second Reading of the Bill, I do not propose to accelerate its passage by voting for the guillotine. However, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) and my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) have said, the House does not yet have the right procedure for deliberating the Committee stages of a Bill, and I do not propose to vote against the guillotine. Four days on Report seem a generous Government move, and it is only right to put that on the record.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey asked why the Bill was being guillotined at an earlier stage than the equivalent Scottish legislation. I can only assume that the English get round the course slightly more quickly than the Scots. It takes quite a long time to debate a Bill with 139 clauses and 12 schedules and with 44 Members on the Standing Committee. I can accept the mathematical inexorability of the fact that if we continued with our present rate of progress we would be forced at the end of July either to give up our summer recess or to proceed with the legislation.

The more I listen in Standing Committee, the more I think that the Government were right four years ago to dismiss the poll tax. This does not seem a sensible place at which to pitch one's tent and resist, in that this is a procedural motion to enable the Government to have the discussion completed within a reasonable time. It seems sensible on Report, when there are four days for debate, for one to reopen some of the important debates in Committee which have not been satisfactorily resolved.

I do not believe that there has been any filibustering. The more contentious parts of the legislation have been debated in the first two months and, although one hon. Member may have spoken for an hour and 20 minutes, he spoke only once, or perhaps twice, and that should not necessarily be held against him.

Mr. Patnick: Twice.

Sir George Young: It may have been twice, but, if one adds the various contributions, one speech of an hour and 20 minutes may be less than several interventions. One or two of the interventions by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) from a sedentary position cost the Government no few minutes.

Within the rather harsh constraints of policy, Ministers have been as helpful and as patient as they can be in dealing with the debates. That they are not able to give way on the fundamental inequity of the Bill is not entirely surprising. It is important in the remaining days to discuss clause 18, to which I think we shall come later this week, which deals with the system of rebates. If the Government are to criticise alternative methods of raising local government finance in some detail, it is necessary for them to be more explicit about the details of their scheme as they may affect the poor.

So far there has been substantial progress in Standing Committee. Two of my hon. Friends—one of whom is in his place — who voted for Second Reading have several times spoken against some of the Bill's important principles and on occasions voted against or abstained. The Government have stopped referring to the Bill as a community charge and now refer to it fairly often as a tax. At the heart of the argument against the Bill is the claim that it is not a charge, but a tax. I think that five times last Thursday my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State called it a tax. The moment it is defined as a tax, the question of how it is financed produces some very different answers compared with when one talks about a charge.

The debate in Committee has been basically between equity and accountability. Accountability has become slightly blurred at the edges. The impact of the rate support grant on the community charge will be important. If that is not right, community charge payers can legitimately point to the Government as being responsible for the high charge in their area. Within weeks, the Government changed their perception of how much the local authority in my borough of Ealing should spend. Rate capping now reduces the rates by 25 per cent. rather than 42 per cent. If those are the shifts in the Government's perception of what a local authority should spend, they will have a big impact on the community charge. How will the Government be able to argue that the level of community charge reflects local extravagance when there can be such a variation in rate support grant?

Accountability has also become blurred in the debates about households in which the husband and the wife are out of work. The husband will get the benefit, which includes his wife's contribution, and will have to pay on behalf of both. The Government have argued, without success, that many more people will be brought into the community charge net but, in practice, because of the way in which household finances are constructed, there will be little impact.

Some people have been written out of the script. The little widow and the four wage earners who live next door to her have not appeared for many episodes. There is widespread concern about what has happened to them. I suspect that they are not appearing any more because it emerged in another part of our debate that the community charge was not that important a factor because the bulk of local government would continue to be funded through the rate support grant, which was funded by progressive taxation, and the better off would therefore pay far more than the less well-off. Of course, that argument applied directly to the four wage earners who, it transpired, were paying far more than the little old lady next door and, as a result, all five have been written out of the script.

If the little old lady and the four wage earners have been written out of the script, a new character has emerged—the gardener from Selly Oak. He is almost sitting there in the Committee with us. The gardener from Selly Oak, in some pithy and rather earthy comments, asked why he should pay as much as the visibly prosperous Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark). In a nutshell, those earthy comments, by the gardener from either Selly Oak or Solihull, summarised public perception of the Bill.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): If my hon. Friend is referring, not only to the procedure, but to some of the substance of the debate, I imagine that it is in order to ask him a question. In my constituency, in what is locally called millionaires' row, the equivalent of the local tax would fall by two thirds for the average householder, whereas in the poorest road, where people would not be subject to a rebate system, charges for an average household would increase fourfold. Is that a new system that we can commend with enthusiasm to the waiting public?

Sir George Young: The opinion polls give my hon. Friend the answer that he seeks from me. I am grateful to him for his support for the fundamental argument that the community charge is unfair and should be related to ability to pay. In the remaining stages of the Committee I hope that the Government will explain why revaluation is unthinkable for domestic taxpayers, causing widespread turbulence, but is perfectly all right for the non-domestic sector, which has just woken up to the impact of the policy on it and is writing at some length to the Standing Committee.

A procedural motion is not the best time to pitch one's tent and do battle. More, or less, time in Standing Committee will not determine the measure's future. That will be determined by votes on the Floor of the House, by debate in the country as a whole and by the debates in another place. The guillotine motion injects a note of certainty about the dates and timing, and I welcome that and reserve my fire for the battle next month.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): I wish to speak against the timetable motion.

When the Leader of the House was making the business statement last week, he should have said not that the Bill was to be made the subject of a guillotine but that it was to be axed and that it was being rejected altogether. If he had taken note and cognisance of the clear public opposition to the Bill, he would have had second thoughts. He should remember that there is considerable opposition within the Conservative party to this proposal. Those Conservative Members recognise the implications of the Bill and have serious doubts about the direction in which we shall be moving if this legislation is enacted.

On Second Reading there were many abstentions, with some Conservative Back Benchers voting against the Bill. That rebellion would have been far greater but for the fact that those holding office within the Government and those hoping to hold office did not dare to show their true feelings.

The Government claim, as did the Leader of the House, that this measure had the support of the public at the general election in June. It would be true to say that the

[Mr. Peter L. Pike]

Tory party gave the poll tax legislation a very low profile. The Government did not make a major election issue out of it. Much of the public were not fully aware of the intentions of this legislation. However, opinion polls have shown that the more they become aware of it the more they oppose it. It must be remembered that if the votes in England and Wales for those parties who clearly opposed this legislation at the last election had been added together it would have shown that there were more people opposed to the poll tax than were in favour of it.

With regard to Scotland, which is at a more advanced stage in this legislation, the message of the voters was very clear and the Conservative party lost many seats. We have often talked about losers and gainers as a result of this legislation, and it is important that we should have done so. To some degree, this point ties in with the intervention of the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes). The plain fact of the matter is that the majority of losers will be those who can least afford to lose. That must be a serious criticism of the legislation. A large number of the gainers will be those who least need to gain.

The right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) said that changes should be made to the Bill as it is debated to improve its principle, and, to some degree, to rectify the problems that I have already mentioned. I know that it is of serious concern to him that the Bill does not take into account the ability to pay. That point was also made by the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) and other Conservative Members.

I fear that the Government will not take cognisance of those matters during the remainder of the Committee stage. There has been no sign that they accept that problems should be rectified. I believe that the Secretary of State is 100 per cent. committed to the legislation, although former Secretaries of State have opposed it. It has been said that, prior to 1983, the Environment Select Committee expressed opposition to a community charge. It has also been said that the Layfield committee opposed this proposal. Many people who are experienced in the financing of local government have said that it is not the way to rectify the problems with local government finance.

I accept that there are faults and anomalies in the present rating system, and that criticisms can be made of it, but to introduce a system that is worse and less fair is not the way to solve the problems involved. The Government should recognise that fact and axe the Bill.

We should have more time to debate the important, fundamental matters involved in this legislation. Many Government amendments have been tabled, which shows that the Bill was badly drafted. It was said earlier that many of those amendments were moved formally, but it must be remembered that clause 3 has been almost completely rewritten. From being a very short clause in the Bill, it is now a very long one. In addition, an extremely long new clause 4 has been introduced by the Government. The Government have made very important changes to the Bill.

We are aware that the Government originally intended to incorporate provisions in the Bill to enable prison sentences to be passed on those who do not pay the poll tax. Such a measure was not included in the Bill when it was first produced, and at present it is not included. However, when the Minister replied to a debate last week, he made it clear that on Report the Government intended to introduce an amendment enabling a prison sentence to be passed on those who do not pay their poll tax. He made it clear that, unlike other people in prison, they will not avoid their liability to evade the poll tax just because they have been sent to prison for not paying.

By proposing those amendments, the Government have shown that they recognise the complications and difficulties that will exist in collecting the poll tax. It will be difficult to collect and there will be difficulties in compiling the register. The register will change every day, so it will need a mass of workers in town halls throughout the country to keep it up to date as people move from one constituency to another.

The Minister said that registration officers will be able to check with other local authority departments on people who have applied for library cards or grants or who are receiving housing benefit, and check against the electoral register. The Government say that it is not a tax on votes, and I accept that, but the wording that they use makes it clear that if one registers to vote one will become immediately liable to pay the poll tax. However, one does not have to vote to become liable for the tax, because the registration officer will use the electoral roll to ensure that the names shown on it are on the community charge register.

We have debated not only many Government amendments but, at length, two very important principles. The first was the ability to pay; we shall return to that issue during debates on later clauses. I have no doubt that many Conservative Members want to debate that subject at length because there is clear concern about the ability to pay. The other matter that we attempted to deal with was exemptions; we shall want to debate that issue again later in Committee. They are both extremely important issues, and if the ability to pay is not taken into account one must try to give, in a wider way, exemptions to those who cannot afford to pay, if we are to put any sense into this proposal.

As yet, we have not debated the uniform business rate. It is clear that the CBI holds a different view from the Government on this part of the Bill. The National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses Ltd. has written to hon. Members expressing its concern and worries about the implications of the UBR on small businesses if the Bill is not amended.

Many issues must be debated at length. I fail to see that the Bill, even if it is amended, will be good. Although the Secretary of State is committed to the Bill, the Minister, with his legal background, is like a barrister who must defend a case in which he knows that the accused man or woman is guilty of murder, but he deals effectively with his brief, hopes to do well with it, and hopes for better things to come. He will be remembered as the Minister who forced iniquitous and unfair taxation on the people of this country.

If Conservative Members believe that the legislation is wrong and want to see it amended or defeated, I hope that they will support the Opposition and vote against the motion. It is important that the Bill is debated for as long as possible in Committee to try to ensure that, if the Government are determined to use their majority to force it through, regardless of the implications and the fact that it may cost them the next general election, we secure as many amendments as possible to make it work in the best way to minimise damage. We are talking about minimising the damage to society, business and the people who cannot afford to pay taxation. That is why we need more time to debate the Bill and why it is important that the motion is defeated.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): I am grateful for the chance to make a brief contribution to the debate. I hope that the Leader of the House will now consider whether we should have a debate about the procedures of the House, particularly to have a close look at the way in which we handle these timetable motions.

Along with most of my hon. Friends on the Committee, I have sat relatively quietly listening to the arguments by Opposition Members. From the outset it has been clear that Opposition Members are impaled on the horns of a somewhat uncomfortable dilemma. Indeed, the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Grocott) made that point clear when he opened for the Opposition today. Opposition Members are by no means clear whether to shoot the fox or merely graze it as it passes on its way.

If the Bill really is the great Satan, as some Opposition Members tell us, if it is the Achilles heel of the Conservative party, no doubt, in their hearts, Opposition Members wish it good fortune as an important and welcome landmark for a longed-for return to Government Benches, and would not wish to detain the Bill overlong in Committee. That is why we have heard some weasel words today on the guillotine motion. That is also why I would not seek to accuse the Opposition of filibustering in Committee.

It is true that we have spent a considerable time—perhaps over-long — in Committee discussing the position in respect of the names of dead people on the register. In addition, great time was taken in discussing the name of the Bill—time that could perhaps have been spent on more important issues. After all, by any other name, a rose is still a rose. We have gone in detail—often too much detail—through all the key matters that have so far been reached.

We have had lengthy discussions about exemptions. We should restrict the number of exemptions to the bare minimum. I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has been able to say that, in the case of bona fide religious orders in which vows of poverty have been taken—where monks and nuns are outside the system of state support—the community charge will not apply. That is a good example of the reasonableness and flexibility of my right hon. Friend and his ministerial colleagues

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): What does the hon. Gentleman say about those who have not taken vows of poverty, but, by the circumstances in which they live, have had poverty thrust upon them? Would they not be in similar circumstances to those of nuns and monks, who rightly should be considered?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman has almost answered his own point. Such people are covered by rebates. Monks and nuns, who are outside the state support system, have taken vows of poverty and do not receive benefit. They are clearly exceptions to the normal rules.

The principal reason why I support this generous timetable motion is that time will now be specifically allocated to ensure the scrutiny of all parts of the Bill. It may not be widely appreciated outside the House that discussion of clauses relating specifically to the community charge will not really be subject to any guillotine. Only one last substantive issue—rebates—remains to be discussed in Committee, so on the key issue that the Opposition have identified as the most objectionable part of the measure, there will effectively be no guillotine at all.

In spite of the usual head of steam that traditionally accompanies debates of this nature, but which has been markedly absent this afternoon, the Government deserve to secure their business within a reasonable time scale. The Committee has been proceeding somewhat more slowly than its counterpart Committee examining the Education Reform Bill. After all, that Committee reached clause 43 in 88 hours. We have been proceeding at less than half that speed.

Dr. Cunningham: What does that mean?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Member asks what that means. One of the major points that came out of the guillotine debate on the Education Reform Bill——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The House will stick to one Bill at a time. The hon. Member should confine his remarks to the Local Government Finance Bill.

Mr. Mitchell: I apologise for allowing myself to be led up the garden path by the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). It tends to happen a great deal in Committee.

We must ensure that the measure proceeds in an orderly, structured, and rapid way. Those of us who were previously involved in inner-city areas, who saw the way in which businesses were treated by Left-wing authorities in respect of rates, and who saw the consequent loss of jobs and employment opportunities as businesses moved elsewhere or simply folded up, must ensure that time is balanced to allow discussion of all the important clauses, including those dealing with the future of the business rating system.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House why it is that the whole range of the business community, from the CBI, representing big business, to small traders, would rather keep the present system than have the system that the Government are introducing?

Mr. Mitchell: That is untrue. Most would readily agree that what we propose is an improvement on what exists. It depends whether they perceive themselves as gainers or losers. In inner-city areas of the type that I was talking about, one would have great difficulty finding any major business man who does not welcome the proposed changes in the system.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Michael Howard): Does my hon. Friend agree that the CBI has specifically said that, although it has reservations about our proposals, it regards them as a considerable improvement on the present system, and that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) has totally misrepresented the position?

Mr. Simon Hughes: The CBI has made representations. As long as it does not have to pay so much, it prefers the proposed system. The hon. Gentleman and the Minister know that the business community is opposed to the Bill going ahead unamended. That applies in inner cities just as much as it applies elsewhere.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. and learned Friend the Minister made the key point in response to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) — that the proposals are widely welcomed as a major improvement on what we have at the moment.

Dr. Cunningham: How can the hon. Gentleman say that the proposals are widely welcomed? They are opposed by the Institute of Directors, the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses Ltd., and chambers of commerce, including the London chamber of commerce, the biggest one in the country. The Confederation of British Industry has major reservations about the proposals. How can the hon. Gentleman construe that as a wide welcome?

Mr. Mitchell: With respect, the hon. Gentleman sows the seeds of his argument on fallow ground. He talked about chambers of commerce. Is he aware that, for example, the Nottingham chamber of commerce, one of the largest of these bodies in the country, is in favour of the terms of the proposals? The list that the hon. Gentleman trotted out will not stand up. My experience in Islington strongly supports the view that, over the years, local businesses were driven out. More generally, business men welcome the changes that are now coming to pass. The stance of Opposition Members would be easier to understand if they were propounding or supporting some alternative structure or formula for financing local government. They are not doing so.

These matters have now been discussed for years. They formed a key part of our election manifesto. The timetable measure strikes the right balance between useful and welcome scrutiny on the one hand, and unnecessary delays on the other. We should now get on with it.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): The hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) has just displayed the originality with which he makes his contributions to the Committee by saying that a rose by any other name is still a rose. The subject that we are debating is a gross injustice and remains a gross injustice even when it is dressed up in words such as "community charge". That is why the people of Britain are calling it by the more realistic name of the poll tax and the Government have managed to persuade only a tiny number to use their phrase.

The Government are trying to shorten debate in Committee because they are suffering acute embarrassment. Every day that the Committee meets, more of the absurdities, anomalies, rank injustices and sheer incoherence of the Bill are exposed. All that they can do is repeat what a good thing it is for the classes which it is intended to benefit.

Recently, the Secretary of State for the Environment, in one of his infrequent contributions to the Committee, claimed that the community charge would be an excellent thing for just about everyone. I asked him whether he would come to Maryhill and tell the people what a wonderful thing it was. He riposted, "The hon. Lady should come to the Cotswolds." I accepted his invitation immediately, but did he accept the invitation to Maryhill? Not on your life. He dodged it and allowed the Committee Chairman to propose the next business of the Committee.

Not content to leave matters there, I wrote to the Secretary of State accepting his invitation to the Cotswolds, asking him when and where he wished to arrange a meeting, and asking him whether, in return, he would visit Maryhill. Today, I received a letter from the Secretary of State which I criticise in the same way as we criticise the contents of the Bill. He said:

"I doubt if you would be very welcome in the Cotswolds if you were to speak against my constituents getting relief from their excessive rate burdens!"

"Excessive rate burdens" in the Cotswolds? Who is he kidding? I know what I am doing by seeking an invitation to visit the Cotswolds. I know that I will find there rich, greedy people who are looking forward to benefiting from the poll tax, but I also know that I will find rich, unselfish people who do not wish to impose such a burden on their poorer friends and neighbours. Even in the Cotswolds there will be people whom the legislation will not benefit — but they will hear nothing about that from the Secretary of State. Someone must go there, and I am willing to do so any time he wants.

The Secretary of State went on to say in his letter:

"I would not impose such an unpleasant experience on you. I am far too fond of you!"

I am not at all fond of the right hon. Gentleman. Nor are the constituents of Maryhill, which is why, at the general election, Maryhill returned a Labour Member with a majority of 19,500. The Secretary of State is afraid to come to places such as Maryhill to put over his views, because he knows the sort of response he would be likely to get.

The letter continues:

"So shall we call it all off?"

My response is no, certainly not. My invitation stands, and I want to visit the Cotswolds. The final sentence states:

"The place for us to debate is in Committee Room 10."

That is exactly what we want to do. He is the one who is calling off the debate by imposing a guillotine on it, yet he says the place for us to debate is Committee Room 10. Well, I shall have to do that, since he will not come to Maryhill. I am surprised at the right hon. Gentleman's cowardice in this respect. I thought that the man who came to Clydeside to close our shipyards would not be afraid to come to Maryhill and tell us about the poll tax.

I make a bargain with the Secretary of State. I forewarn him about the points that I shall make if someone invites me to visit the Cotswolds. I shall ask people whether they think it sensible that prisoners on remand will pay poll tax if found not guilty, but will be exempted if they are found guilty. I shall appeal to their common sense.

I shall ask the women in the Cotswolds whether it is fair that they will have to pay the same poll tax as their husbands even if they earn nothing or a half or three quarters of what their husbands earn. I shall ask the women whether they think it fair that a wife will be jointly and severally liable for her husband's poll tax, as he is for hers, regardless of her ability to pay. Indeed, some women will have to ask their husbands to hand over the money so that her poll tax can be paid. Talk about a return to Victorian values!

I shall ask the cost-conscious people — the ones who wish to save money on local government — if it is sensible to introduce a system that will cost twice as much to collect as the present system. I shall ask the people who own second homes whether they think it sensible that they must pay the same standard poll tax whether their little holiday retreat is a country mansion or a small home with an outside toilet.

Above all, I shall ask the people of the Cotswolds whether it is right that the well-off farmer should pay the same poll tax as his labourer. I shall ask the City fat cats who travel to London every morning whether it is right that they should pay the same poll tax as the milkman, the postman and the man who sells them their tickets at the railway station.

I shall have a great deal to say when I visit the Cotswolds — if anyone asks me — and I shall be interested to hear whether the Secretary of State intends to visit Maryhill.

5.46 pm

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): I support the timetable motion. For the past 15 years, during which I have been involved in politics, debate has centred on the fact that the current rating system is unfair and must be replaced. That replacement is almost on the statute book, and it is time that we allowed the opportunity for a full debate on it.

The community charge is necessary because many people will benefit from it, including about 2 million single old-age pensioners. It was a surprise to me to hear the Opposition members of the Committee wishing to deny the benefits to those 2 million old-age pensioners.

We have seen much literature suggesting that the community charge is unpopular. But that has been false literature produced by Labour councils, often at public expense, or by local Labour parties.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Why is the Conservative-controlled Association of District Councils completely opposed to the poll tax?

Mr. Shaw: I am fully aware that many organisations, Conservative and otherwise, have reservations about some aspects of the community charge. But whether others oppose it or not, it is certainly true that the current system is unfair and does not treat people properly. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) said, it is unfair to the old-age pensioner living in a house next door to four wage earners. During my four years on a council, I observed the number of households that did not pay fair rates because they had four wage earners in the family.

The Labour party has stirred up opposition to the community charge, and my constituents have written to me quoting Opposition literature. In reply, I have pointed out that, if the community charge is introduced on this year's figures, it is likely to be £151 in Dover compared with £600 or £700 in Labour-controlled areas, such as Brent, Camden and Islington.

Mr. Pike: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Shaw: In a moment.

The key point that I make to my constituents is that it is better to have a well-run borough council and gain the benefit from it than a badly run borough council and suffer the disbenefit. In the Bill we are introducing a system whereby efficient local authorities which care about ratepayers' and taxpayers' money can demonstrate that fact to the benefit of their locality, unlike councils which could not care less.

Mr. Pike: When the hon. Gentleman replied to his constituents, did he point out that over the country as a whole the majority of those who will lose as a result of the legislation are those who can least afford to lose, while a substantial number who will gain least need to gain?

Mr. Shaw: I do not accept that. In Committee we have frequently given the Opposition the facts, statistics and exemplifications from the Department of the Environment which show the large numbers of people who will gain. We have also seen anomalies, but these are less than under the present system of rates.

The Opposition have frequently said that the community charge will be unfair. The Secretary of State in his generosity has given the Opposition the opportunity to suggest alternative proposals, but they have failed at every stage. That is why we have to debate this timetable motion: we cannot get sensible alternatives from the Opposition, yet they spend a great deal of time arguing that these proposals are unfair.

Mr. Dykes: I agree with my hon. Friend that the principal Opposition have not put forward any meaningful ideas so that debates are taking place within the Conservative party and, to a lesser extent, among alliance Members. How does my hon. Friend deal with the awkward point raised by our hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) in this debate and in Committee — that it is all very well constructing a theoretical idea that one can make a direct measurement between the extravagant and the non-extravagant authorities—presumably Tory-controlled authorities are the latter and Labour-controlled authorities the former —with this new system, but as it is most likely, because we live in a wicked world, that the central Government resource allocation input system, now to be called revenue support rather than RSG, will be manipulated by the Department of the Environment through its incomprehensible computer system just as it has been in the past, the whole system will become wholly otiose?

Mr. Shaw: I, too, have severe reservations about the rate support grant system and the way it has operated in the past, but all that we and the Government can do is try over a period to move to a fairer, better system under which the people who pay more will be those who are foolish enough to elect a local council which wastes money. Surely what lies behind amendments to the rate support grant system in recent years is the attempt to penalise the extravagant and to benefit those with good husbandry.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will concede publicly that the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), who represents Plaid Cymru, and my two hon. Friends who represent the Liberal party on the Committee have throughout clearly stated our view that a local income tax is a fairer and more acceptable alternative. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the Government should support that, even if the proposition must come from our parties because the Labour party has not yet decided on its alternative?

Mr. Shaw: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's point, but if he had the benefit of serving on the Committee—I realise that he is employed elsewhere—he would have learned that under a local income tax system, a nurse living in Camden would have to pay 26p in the pound. That is a phenomenal sum. Even if my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer manages to reduce income tax substantially in the Budget, it would take her rate of taxation above 50p in the pound. Local income tax is not a fair or reasonable alternative to the community charge. Time and again it has become clear in Committee that the Opposition have no alternative to the community charge.

[Mr. Shaw]

The motion is about making progress on the Bill and I hope that some of my remarks have shown that it is necessary to do so. Not only is this the only Bill before the Committee but it is the best Bill that the Committee could have. The Opposition have been taking far too long to make their points. Speeches lasting 20 minutes or more are common and 15-minute speeches are the rule. I would not object to that if it were not for the great amount of repetition.

Countless times I have heard the Opposition suggest that people will evade the tax. It shocks me that they can suggest that so many people are keen on tax evasion. [Laughter.] It is staggering. What is even more amazing is the number of Scottish Opposition Members who comment on that. Scottish Members seem to spend most of their time trying to make out that the people of Scotland are utterly dishonest. Indeed, if I were not married to a Scottish lady, I should have severe doubts about what the people north of the border get up to. In time, the Scottish version of the community charge will be seen to benefit Scotland as it will help to control local authority expenditure.

One message comes across in Committee. Not only do the Opposition not want to hear of the benefits from the community charge, but when they appear to listen they do not seem to want to understand. That is a critical reason why we are debating this motion.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): The hon. Gentleman says that we do not listen to the benefits of the poll tax. Can he explain to the 94 per cent. of my constituents who will lose what those benefits are likely to be?

Mr. Shaw: If the hon. Gentleman will arrange for me to visit his constituency, I shall be delighted to explain to his constituents the benefits of the community charge.

It is important to consider the quality of the debates in Committee, particularly some of the statements about the costs of the community charge. We have had wild and extreme estimates, and references to hundreds of millions of pounds of computer costs. The House will be pleased to know that I have managed to obtain more accurate figures which I hope to bring to the Committee's attention in the next few weeks. The Opposition's figures have not been based on fact, nor have they been checked or audited. One often wonders whether the statements are solely for the purpose of playing to the gallery. They are certainly not to further the debate. The timetable motion will mean that the Opposition talk more sense and less nonsense.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) spoke earlier of Government amendments taking time in Committee. There have been many Government amendments to the Bill, but they were sensible, necessary and useful in assisting the administration of the community charge. They were speedily dealt with.

I cannot avoid one aspect of our discussions in Committee. Occasionally, and regrettably, we have heard some intemperate language from the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). Perhaps that was because he was tired of listening to speakers on his own side. I say that because Conservative Members have taken up little time. Our speeches have been brief and to the point.

I believe the Government want to give the Bill a fair chance of being discussed, which is why they have brought in the timetable motion. The House should support it.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): I want to discuss some of the arguments deployed by the Leader of the House when introducing the timetable motion. First, he argued that an excessive number of amendments had been tabled in Committee, especially on the first clause, which is only five lines long. Clause 1 deals with some of the basic principles of the Bill and categorises three different forms of poll tax or community charge that can be levied. So the amendments to clause 1 provided an opportunity to debate the wider implications of the whole measure, and the debate, at that stage, was worth while.

It has also been argued that the time spent on changing the name from the community charge to the poll tax was excessive—but to call the tax a community charge is a fraud. The name "poll tax" is clearly understood and honest, and it allows us to discuss the Bill's general principles. As such, it is well worth full discussion. I am a person who likes discussing words, ideas and principles and I see nothing wrong with that.

It might be well worth while for the Government to consider exactly what the Bill is about. It does two things. It switches wealth from one sector of society to another, in line with principles shared by most Conservative Members, who believe that investment emerges in that way. We disagree with that. Other elements in the Bill concern the excessive powers being given to central Government, carrying on from other legislation that dealt with rate capping and other matters of local government. The Bill is a further extension of provisions that give considerable authority to central Government.

Many of the Conservative Members in Committee need to reflect on whether they are really happy about so much authority being passed into the hands of central Government, and about local government beginning to disappear as an effective force and becoming a mere cypher, acting on decisions that have already been made centrally. Is that healthy for democracy and the dissemination of different views and interests? Is it good for concessions and compromises in society?

The Leader of the House also used the answerability argument, about which we used to hear a great deal in Committee. We used to hear how, as all voters paid the poll tax, their involvement made them and local councils responsible, accountable and answerable. Strangely, some of those arguments have now started to disappear. We had a debate in Committee about joint and several liability. It blew away once and for all the idea that the Bill is in some way about answerability. If, for example, a husband deserted his wife—did a runner, as they say—she would be jointly and severally responsible for payment of the outstanding poll tax moneys.

There is no essential link in the legislation between the payment of the poll tax and the exercise of the vote, and it would be nonsense if there were. Often, the head of the household might pay out the money for the whole household, and presumably, under a system of accountability, he would have to exercise a right to vote several times in line with the moneys he had paid out. Thus, the notion of accountability has begun to disappear; so has the notion that democracy is somehow enhanced by the operation of the poll tax.

It has already been mentioned that the poll tax discourages electoral registration. The Bill may provide for the electoral registrar getting hold of registers that are being compiled and reinstating people on them, but there will certainly be a desire to hide from payment. That will have an adverse effect on the universal franchise. As one of the Ministers has rightly said, this Bill will have a major effect on the franchise—the greatest since the early years of the century, and probably since the 19th century. It is the first move that we have had away from the universal franchise, rather than towards its extension.

Worse, the Bill attempts to fix the results of elections. Pressure will be applied such that Conservative councils will be the only option for election — not merely Conservative councils, but Conservative councils of a particular political flavour, which will keep poll tax levels down. If Labour or alternative parties try to operate, they will be allowed to do so only to the extent that they function in accordance with those same principles. How is that Hobson's choice a democracy? Surely a democracy should allow people to choose between alternatives and offer an avenue through which the poorer members of society can seek redress of some of the imbalances within it, so that money is paid by the wealthy to those who are poor. The Bill tries to exclude from the system an option in the democratic process.

The Leader of the House also used the argument that the poll tax was in the Tory election manifesto, so the Government could go ahead with it. That is one of the most pathetic arguments that could be used. There is no mandate for the poll tax: a mandate requires a full and frank up-front discussion during an election, which did not happen in England and Wales. That is perhaps, to some extent, the fault of the Labour party for not drawing attention to the tax as a major issue, as it should have done. If it had done so, some of the consequences in Scotland would have occurred here, too. The only area in the nation in which the tax has been considered fully and frankly is Scotland, where it was firmly rejected by the electorate. The Labour party was glad to have the opportunity to use the issue to fight an effective campaign there, and I hope we shall soon be doing the same in this country.

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): The hon. Gentleman said that the only place in the country in which the poll tax was mentioned in the last election was Scotland, but I mentioned the community charge many times in my election campaign in June last year, and was returned with a majority of almost 20,000.

Mr. Barnes: It is a matter of degree; the issue was certainly mentioned in the election, and there was some publicity about it in the media, but I doubt whether the hon. Gentleman was the only element that determined the result in his constituency. We all know that elections here are much more presidential than that, depending a great deal on the party platforms that are argued across the country.

Such argument failed to take place in England and Wales on that occasion. Many of us tried to raise the issue in our constituencies but it was swamped by other issues that the Goverment sought to raise during the election. They staged propaganda campaigns about "reds" and raised "white surrender" scares. They were the major items considered during the campaign. It is only in those areas that the Government could possibly claim to have a mandate, but they do not have a mandate for this detailed bit of legislation or for many of the other measures that are passing through the House.

Mrs. Fyfe: Does my hon. Friend agree that the reason why the campaign against the poll tax was so effective in Scotland was that it was coming into force there a year earlier than in England? That concentrated the minds of Scottish people. Likewise, recent opinion polls in England and Wales have shown that people there are becoming more and more opposed to the poll tax.

Mr. Barnes: I agree with my hon. Friend. The immediacy of the issue concentrates people's minds upon it and brings it to the front of their minds, causing them to discuss their own circumstances and the problems that they will face.

There should not be a timetable motion. We need more time to discuss the issue in Committee so that the reality of the poll tax can begin to dawn on some of the Conservative Members. They need to be able to draw together the strands of their alternative position and decide upon the extent to which they will support Opposition amendments. The hon. Member for Acton (Sir G. Young) is seen as the major Conservative rebel, but in some ways he needs to get his act together and decide where he stands on various issues. He supports the idea of excluding student nurses in the same way as university students would be excluded and proposed amendment No. 72 in relation to that. That fell because a Government new clause was introduced.

In the vote on an amendment by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor), which was a substitute for amendment No. 72, the hon. Member for Acton is recorded in the Committee Hansard as voting against. On another occasion an amendment was brought forward under clause 11 by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), and there is no record of a vote by the hon. Member for Acton. He either recorded a no vote or was absent when the vote took place. I confront him with those matters, but if I have got them wrong I shall apologise to him. He has faced three ways on one issue and needs to be much more solid.

The hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) has expressed reservations in the House and is in many ways a pale shadow of the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton in terms of his opposition. Presumably he is adopting a Fabian attitude, and his strategy may be to bide his time until the opportunity is exactly right. Then he will strike and vote with the Opposition on specific amendments. I hope that that is the case.

The hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) is seeking a small poll tax, and his amendment, which is to be discussed later, will move money towards the central Exchequer. If that happens, it will aid the process by which central Government have control and authority over what takes place at local level. It will get over the problem of imbalance and injustice and some of the unfairness of this measure. However, it will not tackle the issue of considerable centralised control. I hope that the hon. Member for Kensington will think of some fall-back position to try to get the best that he can out of his own ideas and values. I have said that in Committee.

The answerability argument has gone out of the window and hon. Members using it in Committee have lowered it considerably. It has yet to dawn on Conservative Members that central Government are operating massive powers. Some Conservative Members are strong advocates of free enterprise and competitiveness and are worried about monopoly control and development. For that reason, they should be worried about the development of centralised control.

The hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) is not in the Chamber and is seldom seen in Committee. She adopts a very anti-state stance and is worried about centralised control. The House Magazine reports that she has on her House of Commons writing paper the legend:

"The state is the great fiction by which everyone seeks to live at the expense of everyone else."

If the hon. Lady thinks that the state is such a fiction and a corrupting centralised organisation, why is she willing regularly to vote for advancing the powers of the Secretary of State? In this measure the Secretary of State and in other measures other Secretaries of State are given enormous enabling powers. The Secretary of State will be something of a municipal Mussolini, but perhaps without the charisma that Mussolini had.

Conservative Members in the Committee need time to think the measure through and time to talk about their ideas before having them discussed in Committee. Labour has embarked on a listening campaign, and I was pleased to listen to the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) because those were the first words that I heard from him. The hon. Member for Gedling made, as it were his maiden speech on the poll tax, and his views must be considered.

My final point is on a matter that was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). It has been said in Committee that a measure is to be brought forward on Report to introduce imprisonment as a fallback for those who do not pay the poll tax. That measure should be brought forward and fully considered in Committee and afterwards on the Floor of the House. I ask hon. Members to vote against the timetable motion.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): As a new Member, I am continually surprised in this place, and this debate is no exception. This is the first guillotine motion debate that I have sat through. I had assumed, apparently wrongly, that I would be confronted by row upon row of indignant Opposition Members shrieking about censorship and the lack of time to deal with the Bill. Instead I see row upon row of total contentment, because I have always found that when people do not turn up it means that they are entirely happy about what is being done. I can only assume that the contentment on the Conservative side is mirrored by contentment on the Opposition side.

One other matter that surprised me is that I seem to be sitting through a Second Reading debate. We have heard all the reasons why the community charge is good or bad, why it should be introduced and the reasons for holding it up. However, we have not had much discussion about the guillotine motion. That is why I agree wholeheartedly with my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) who said that perhaps the Leader of the House might find it useful to look at procedures. We ought to be discussing how we can have a sensible debate during the rest of the time that the Bill is in Committee. I have sat through most of the 72 hours so far and I did not recognise much of a sensible debate. It has been fairly repetitive and nit-picking. I welcome this chance to help impose some sort of structure on the rest of the debate, because some fundamental issues have still to be discussed.

Much has been said about the business rate but not much has been said about the change in the grant system. Eleven years in local government have taught me that the current grant system is understood by hardly anybody. When one does discover a bit about it, one sees that it is something of an absurdity. We must spend a sensible amount of time getting the grant system right. I hope that we shall also put some structure into the Committee from now on and will be spared further ramblings about the rating aspects of grand prix racing tracks and about when full-time cohabitation becomes part-time cohabitation. If we are spared more of that sort of debate, I shall be grateful.

The issues that seem to have occupied most hon. Members do not have much to do with the guillotine motion. The first argument that sticks in my mind is that, because there is no precedent for this legislation, it should be given extra time. But I have heard hour upon hour of discussion about what happens in Scotland. I have heard for hour upon hour from hon. Members representing Scotland. I keep being told that there is a precedent.

We have also been told that we should delay it because everybody is against it. My mailbag, my supporters and my council do not suggest that. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) causes some excitement only by saying that the ADC is against it. The hon. Gentleman knows better than to go beyond that.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I was making the point that every representative body of local government of whatever party is completely opposed to the proposals. The hon. Gentleman's own council may be in favour of it, but no letter has yet appeared in the Library showing that any council is wholeheartedly in favour of it. The hon. Gentleman must accept that no representative group of local government, north or south of the border, supports the measure, and it has been opposed by local government throughout the country.

Mr. Wilshire: In view of the time, I shall not rise to that. I refer the hon. Gentleman to my comments in Committee, which are well reported.

The last argument to which I shall refer is that we have not been listening. I have listened to the best part of 72 hours, I have listened until my ears ache, and I have yet to hear anything to make me change my mind. The measure is a good one, and the sooner it reaches the statute book the better.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): All hon. Members who have spoken have agreed that the Bill, because of its importance, needs thorough and proper scrutiny. As several hon. Members have said, we are not talking only about a personal poll tax. We are talking about a Bill that will introduce a national business tax, under ministerial control. We are talking about a new grant system for the allocation of about £13 billion of public money each year. We are talking about proposals that will give Ministers budgetary control and poll tax-capping powers covering every local authority in England and Wales. We are talking about the future—it is not clear from the Bill whether there is a future—of discretionary expenditure under what is at present section 137, the 2p rate, which is used by local authorities of all political persuasions for local matters such as economic development and the support of voluntary organisations and charities in their communities.

A large number of important issues still have to be considered by the Committee. It has always been, and remains, the intention of the Opposition that such matters should be thoroughly and adequately debated. That is why we have not sought to waste time. In spite of one or two comments to the contrary, it is generally recognised that there has been no deliberate time wasting in Committee by the Opposition.

Conservative Members who have been supporting the timetable motion have not recognised that there has been no White Paper about the proposals. The Government have not published the responses to the Green Paper on the proposals. The Government have consistently hidden that evidence from Parliament and from the Committee. Had that information been published, it might have saved the House and the Committee some time during their consideration of these issues. The Government gain nothing by being secretive. It is precisely for that reason, and for similar related reasons, such as the late publication, or availability in the Committee, of the Government's intentions on students that the Opposition have had to force debates and table amendments to seek clarification from the Government. We make no apology for that. After all, the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said that the Government have tabled as many amendments to the Bill as anyone else.

It is also the case that the longest single speech made in Committee was made by the Minister for Local Government, who spoke for almost two hours in response to a very important group of amendments. I do not criticise him for that. I did not criticise him at the time. He tried, within the limitations of the principles embodied in the Bill, to respond to questions put to him in Committee, and he was right to do so. I am not complaining about that. It may be necessary for the Minister or for the Secretary of State to reply at length in future. If it is necessary, it is a proper and legitimate function in the Committee's consideration of such measures. It was a measure of 131 clauses and 12 schedules when it was published. Now, several new clauses have been tabled by the Government, in addition to all the amendments.

The measure is dubbed the Government's flagship, and as such I should have thought that everyone, including Conservative Members, would welcome a most painstaking scrutiny of it. After all, they would not want to spoil their flagship for want of a little paint and a ha'p'orth of tar. The right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) likened it to the Titanic. I suggest that perhaps it is more likely to end up like the Mary Rose. It may not get through its launch or its maiden voyage. It may capsize under the weight of its own inadequate design.

As I understand the motion, which the Leader of the House commends us to accept, we shall have approximately 70 hours more to discuss the issue. On the face of it, that seems generous. Several Conservative Members have made the point that we shall now have some structured debate and the timetable will guarantee the proper scrutiny of every aspect of the Bill. It will do no such thing. At each stage within the timetable, the guillotine will fall, whether or not there has been proper scrutiny of each clause in that section of the timetable. The timetable brings no such guarantee.

Indeed, 70 hours, when there are still more than 100 clauses and several schedules to be discussed, does not guarantee on average—although I accept that averages are not always meaningful—one hour of consideration in Committee per clause. It is not nearly as generous as the Leader of the House seemed to imply. The procedures of the House simply are not adequate to deal with measures of such a size, nature, complexity, and on which there is a dispute between parties. That seems to have been self-evident for many years.

Several hon. Members who are new to the House have said that this is the first time that they have taken part in a debate on a guillotine motion. I have taken part in a debate on a guillotine motion. I have taken part in several such debates from both sides of the argument, from the point of view of the Government, and from the point of view of the Opposition. I have to confess straight away that political head-standing is rather difficult for politicians, who generally do not make very good gymnasts. I think that it has something to do with the fact that the centre of gravity of most politicians is higher above the waist than it should be for them to perform good balancing feats. In some hon. Members it is too far above the shoulders.

The procedures of the House are not adequate, whatever the Government may say. The hon. Members for Crawley (Mr. Soames) is laughing about centres of gravity. He is the last hon. Member who should be laughing, although I have to concede that his centre of gravity is well down, if I can put it delicately. Perhaps he will be rather better than some of his colleagues at this kind of balancing act. I have no doubt that the Government planned the presentation of this timetable to the House when they were planning the whole of their parliamentary year. Notwithstanding that, the Government have tabled, and will continue to table, a large number of amendments.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) made an entertaining speech, but he could have taken a much earlier historical analogy. If I have learnt nothing else today, I have learnt that I can gain access to the Bible for reference by asking the Clerk of the House for the key and opening the Dispatch Box—something that I have never yet done. Since historical analogies seem to be in order in giving dire warnings to the Government—I hazard a guess that a right hon. Member with an address like "The Old Rectory" knows this already—I can give a much older analogy than the peasants' revolt. Here is a quote from St. Luke, chapter 2:

> "And it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Caesar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed."

We have been along this road a lot earlier than the peasants' revolt, and the outcome has always been the same. Those proposing such taxes have ended up on the losing side. We have seen that most recently in Scotland, and I have no doubt that we shall see it again.

Mr. Dykes: The hon. Gentleman is trotting out rather tired metaphors about ships, gymnastics and now the Bible. When will we hear the Labour party's proposals?

Dr. Cunningham: I thought that I had heard Conservative Members say that this debate was about the timetable and not about the merits of the Bill. I am not speaking about the merits of the Bill, but I would be more than happy to do so when we return to Committee tomorrow morning, as long as the hon. Member will promise me that his attendance will be at least as good as mine when we are discussing these matters—something that he has signally failed to do so far.

I say, most kindly, that my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent is a traditionalist in these matters and his views depart slightly from mine. Having said that, I believe that the proceedings of the House are inadequate, and are regularly demonstrated to be inadequate, and I have some sympathy with the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery). It would be in the interests of the House if time were found to debate the second report of the Procedure Committee in the 1985-86 Session, which sought to bring the attention of the House to these matters. The problem is, and remains, one of inherent conflict between the views and the objectives of the Government and the views and objectives of the Opposition. It will be in the long-term interest of the House to make a serious attempt to resolve these matters, although I do not necessarily agree with everything that the report says.

Hon. Members may be asking themselves why I shall vote against the guillotine motion. It is because, in the end, like all its predecessors, it is being imposed arbitrarily by an Executive which already has too much power over Parliament in these matters — a power that is long overdue for redress.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): The debate has been so relaxed and friendly that there has been time for some merriment. We have had added to the "gardener chappy" in Selly Oak, the municipal Mussolini, from the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes).

We had the delightful speech of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), and that of the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Grocott), who commented on my education, saying that it has been a good education. The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent had a good education himself. He went to Leighton Park school and then on to Wadham, where presumably he learned a little history. He might get it right. When the poll tax was introduced, King Richard II was 14, so we cannot blame him.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) thought that the Bill might turn out to be the Titanic, but at least it could not be as bad as the efforts of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent, who lost four out of his flotilla of five Bills that he guillotined in that one famous afternoon in July, which all turned out to be Titanics.

Mr. Leigh: Is my right hon. Friend aware that on that famous occasion when the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) attempted to poleaxe consideration of five Bills, one young Labour Member said:

"I have not yet had the advantage of being in opposition and I do not intend to be in that position. 'Winner takes all' is an ugly phrase, but that is how the system works. If a party wins a General Election, it is the winner who takes all until the people are again consulted within five years . . . We are considering whether the Government are entitled to see that they carry out what they are mandated to do. That is what a guillotine motion is all about."—[Official Report, 20 July 1976; Vol. 915, c. 1654-55.]

The hon. Member who said that was then the hon. Member for Lichfield and Tamworth, but is now the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Grocott), who led for the Opposition today. Surely people in legislative glasshouses should not throw stones.

Mr. Ridley: That is typical of how these guillotine debates go, but it is not for me in the few minutes that remain to say what will be the right way for the House to debate these matters in the future.

Having spent 72¼ hours considering 21 clauses, including five new ones, and two schedules, including one new schedule, we must make a little more progress. The Bill contains another 115 clauses and 11 schedules, which means that, on the basis of progress so far, we would be sitting until the end of July.

There has been a marked lack of urgency on the part of the Opposition. We have perhaps been too accommodating. The start of the Committee was delayed from 19 January to 21 January because the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) was out of the country. We helped him further with an early finish on 28 January to enable the Opposition to attend a local government conference, at which they continued their fruitless search for a policy on local government finance. Perhaps we should give them another afternoon to pursue that, because they have not yet found one. On Thursday last, 18 February, they asked for the whole of the afternoon session, which once again we gave them. By these means, we lost 13 hours of debate—nor did we receive much progress in return when we did sit.

Mr. Allen McKay: Will the Secretary of State admit that, to facilitate that granting of time, we did not debate the sittings motion?

Mr. Ridley: I am going back to the point that we have not had the progress that we need.

From time to time, when the Committee has been sitting, little progress has been made. The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), perhaps one of those who has spoken for longest, could be described—in the words of one of his friends, the former hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan in the Committee which dealt with the Scottish legislation — as suffering from natural verbosity. Then there was the speech made by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins), which took so long and was so incoherent that the Committee became inquorate and hon. Members had to take refuge in the Corridor outside.

Apart from such long-winded contributions from Opposition Members, the discussion has been amiable and has ambled along, but slowly. The atmosphere has been congenial and the debate has been generally constructive. In response to arguments advanced by various Opposition Members, the Government have willingly taken away a number of points for further consideration covering joint and several liability, register entries concerning deceased persons and remission from payment by the courts on the grounds of poverty.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said that only one such undertaking had been given and that that had been given to one of the Liberal Members on the Committee. However, that is not right. Three or more undertakings were given. Indeed, I must tell the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey that I cannot tell the difference between a Liberal, Welsh nationalist, or Socialist opposition in Committee. There is no difference at all between them.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Ridley: I will not give way.

All the concessions that we offered are important. They are intended to improve the system that we have proposed and I am grateful for that. However, none of the arguments advanced by Opposition Members has in any way dented the principle of our proposals. Indeed, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), whom we welcome to the debate, at times seemed to hope that the timetable motion would be introduced soon, as it was the only thing that would concentrate the minds of his colleagues. Twice in Committee—on 28 January and 2 February—he predicted hopefully and wishfully that the timetable motion would be introduced on 11 February. He was clearly hoping and longing for it and wanted it as soon as he could get it. He will be delighted that it has been introduced now.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): It is a week late.

Mr. Ridley: Yes, the hon. Gentleman would rather have had it earlier. As the debate has borne out, very few hon. Members have been present, and at one point I thought that there was a danger that we might have run out of hon. Members wishing to speak. The opposition to this motion has been as weak, wobbly and wishy-washy as it was in Committee.

Sir Peter Emery: When the timetable motion on the Education Reform Bill was before the House, My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science said that he would try to ensure that all parts of the Bill would be adequately scrutinised and that every tentative proposal would be examined. Will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment give the House the same assurance about the local Government Finance Bill?

Mr. Ridley: Indeed I will. However, principally the Opposition must decide how much time they want to give to each section of the Bill. Their judgment must prevail. They must decide how to divide the time that remains. It is my ambition to satisfy my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery).

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey drew a comparison with the progress of the legislation to introduce the community charge in Scotland. A timetable motion was introduced for that Bill after 101 hours of debate on 20 clauses which provided for a further six sittings to deal with the remaining 14 clauses. The point is that the timetable motion before the House now will allow a further 19 sittings and 83 hours of debate on the remainder of the Bill. By introducing the motion at this stage it is possible to ensure that fuller debate is given to all aspects of the Bill than was possible for the Scottish Bill. We have supplemented that, as has been much appreciated by hon. Members on both sides of the House, because we have recommended four days for Report and Third Reading.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Secretary of State accept that the argument that other hon. Members and I have advanced is that for a Bill of this importance we need to ensure that, if possible, every important matter should be debated and if the Committee believes that it has not unduly delayed matters, it should be allowed to run its natural course?

Mr. Ridley: That will be the case. If we do not waste time, there will be time for all matters to be considered.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin drew attention to the National Opinion Poll carried out last week. I found its conclusions very comforting. Unlike the hon. Gentleman, I do not set much store by these polls. It concluded:

"The Conservatives still hold a clear lead in these key areas."

All those hopes, that the charge would lose the Conservatives political support and would rescue the Labour party, seem to have been dashed. Indeed, in a typically generous passage in his speech, the hon. Member for The Wrekin said that he wanted to put public interest before party interest and he would therefore not hold up the Bill because it was in his party's interests that it should get through as the Conservative party would lose votes. Only a week ago there was a vital county council by-election in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. Campaigning under the community charge, the Conservatives, in the form of Warren Hawksley, won a seat from Labour.

It being three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded to put the Question necessary to dispose of them, pursuant to Standing Order No. 81 (Allocation of time to Bills).

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That the following provisions shall apply to the remaining proceedings on the Bill:

Committee

1.—(1) The Standing Committee to which the Bill is allocated shall report the Bill to the House on or before 24th March 1988.

(2) Proceedings on the Bill at a sitting of the Standing Committee on the said 24th March may continue until Ten p.m., whether or not the House is adjourned before that time, and if the House is adjourned before those proceedings have been brought to a conclusion the Standing Committee shall report the Bill to the House on 25th March 1988.

Report and Third Reading

2.—(1) The proceedings on Consideration and Third Reading of the Bill shall be completed in four allotted days and shall be brought to a conclusion at Ten p.m. on the last of those days; and for the purposes of Standing Order No. 80 (Business Committee) this Order shall be taken to allot to the proceedings on Consideration such part of those days as the Resolution of the Business Committee may determine.

(2) The Business Committee shall report to the House its Resolutions as to the proceedings on Consideration of the Bill, and as to the allocation of time between those proceedings and proceedings on Third Reading, not later than the fourth day on which the House sits after the day on which the Chairman of the Standing Committee reports the Bill to the House.

(3) The Resolutions in any Report made under Standing Order No. 80 may be varied by a further Report so made, whether or not within the time specified in sub-paragraph (2) above, and whether or not the Resolutions have been agreed to by the House.

(4) The Resolutions of the Business Committee may include alterations in the order in which proceedings on Consideration of the Bill are taken.

Procedure in Standing Committee

3.—(1) At a sitting of the Standing Committee at which any proceedings on the Bill are to be brought to a conclusion under a Resolution of the Business Sub-Committee the Chairman shall not adjourn the Committee under any Order relating to the sittings of the Committee until the proceedings have been brought to a conclusion.

(2) No Motion shall be made in the Standing Committee relating to the sitting of the Committee except by a member of the Government and the Chairman shall permit a brief explanatory statement from the Member who makes, and from a Member who opposes, the Motion, and shall then put the Question thereon.

4. No Motion shall be made to alter the order in which Clauses, Schedules, new Clauses and new Schedules are taken in the Standing Committee but the Resolutions of the Business Sub-Committee may include alterations in that order.

Conclusion of proceedings in Committee

5. On the conclusion of the proceedings in any Committee on the Bill the Chairman shall report the Bill to the House without putting any Question.

Dilatory Motions

6. No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, proceedings on the Bill shall be made in the Standing Committee or on an allotted day except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

Motion under Standing Order No. 20: extra time

7. If an allotted day is one to which a Motion for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 stands over from an earlier day, paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings on the Bill for a period of time equal to the duration of the proceedings on that Motion.

Private business

8. Any private business which has been set down for consideration at Seven o'clock on an allotted day shall, instead of being considered as provided by Standing Orders, be considered at the conclusion of the proceedings on the Bill on that day, and paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business) shall apply to the private business for a period of three hours from the conclusion of the proceedings on the Bill or, if those proceedings are concluded before Ten o'clock, for a period equal to the time elapsing between Seven o'clock and the conclusion of those proceedings.

Conclusion of proceedings

9.—(1) For the purpose of bringing to a conclusion any proceedings which are to be brought to a conclusion at a time appointed by this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee or the Business Sub-Committee and which have not previously been brought to a conclusion, the Chairman or Mr. Speaker shall forthwith put the following Questions (but no others)—

(a) any Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) any Question necessary to bring to a decision a Question so proposed (including, in the case of a new Clause or new Schedule which has been read a second time, the Question that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill);

(c) the Question on any amendment or Motion standing on the Order Paper in the name of any Member, if that amendment or Motion is made by a Member of the Government;

(d) any other Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded; and on a Motion so made for a new Clause or a new Schedule, the Chairman or Mr. Speaker shall put only the Question that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill.

(2) Proceedings under sub-paragraph (1) above shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

(3) If an allotted day is one on which a Motion for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) would, apart from this Order, stand over to Seven o'clock—

(a) that Motion shall stand over until the conclusion of any proceedings on the Bill which, under this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee, are to be brought to a conclusion at or before that time;

(b) the bringing to a conclusion of any proceedings on the Bill which, under this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee, are to be brought to a conclusion after that time shall be postponed for a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on that Motion.

(4) If an allotted day is one to which a Motion for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 stands over from an earlier day, the bringing to a conclusion of any proceedings on the Bill which, under this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee, are to be brought to a conclusion on that day shall be postponed for a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on that Motion.

Supplemental orders

10.—(1) The proceedings on any Motion made in the House by a member of the Government for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order (including anything which might have been the subject of a report of the Business Committee or Business Sub-Committee) shall, if not previously concluded, be brought to a conclusion one hour after they have been commenced, and paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

Aircraft (Near Miss)

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It has come to my knowledge in the past 10 minutes or quarter of an hour that there has been a reported near miss off the east coast of Aberdeen over the North sea. It was between a Royal Air Force F4 Phantom aircraft and a Bristow helicopter carrying 30 passengers. The difficulty is that the Ministry of Defence is refusing to give any information, on the ground that it has to wait to see whether the Bristow helicopter pilot reports the matter to the Civil Aviation Authority as a possible near miss. I understand that that has now been done.

I wonder whether you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have received any request for permission to make a statement from the Secretary of State for Transport, who is present —I apologise for not having given prior notice, but the matter has only just come to my attention—or from the Secretary of State for Defence, to whom I have spoken by telephone.

The problem is that during Transport Question Time this afternoon we had a fairly vigorous and vociferous exchange about air traffic control and passenger safety in general. I am astounded to learn that since Question Time there has been an announcement that there are to be severe restrictions on traffic into Heathrow during the summer because of the serious problem.

We are entitled to raise such issues when accidents and near misses of that kind occur, yet the Minister does not divulge such information at Question Time, when he must be aware of it. I do not know how close the aircraft passed. According to one report, they were within half a mile of each other. A Phantom F4 in a steep dive creates a great deal of turbulence and could well upset the flight of a helicopter. I hope that a statement will be made, if not tonight, then certainly tomorrow, because matters are getting seriously out of hand.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): I have listened to the comments of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes). I cannot comment at the moment, but I shall make inquiries of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and Defence and then contact the hon. Gentleman later this evening to decide how best to proceed.

Orders of the Day

Dartford-Thurrock Crossing Bill

As amended (in the Select Committee and on re-committal in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 1

CONSTRUCTION OF THE SCHEDULED WORKS

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, leave out lines 14 to 16.

The purpose of the amendment is to remove from the Bill a requirement that the bridge should be designed so that wind shields are or could be fitted to reduce the effect of wind on vehicles on the bridge to not more than that on vehicles on the approach roads to the present crossing.

The House and the Government are grateful to the Select Committee for the thorough examination of wind shielding and other issues put to it through 20 days of hearings in the autumn. The Government's response to the Select Committee covers disquiet at the way the case was presented on the question of wind shielding. It explains that we are looking at that question and the lessons to be learned from it. I hope that we can now concentrate on the substance of the amendment.

A special tribute is due to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman), who sat through every minute of the hearings. Some of what I shall say will be all too familiar to him and his colleagues. I shall describe the new work commenced since the Committee's hearings as a direct result of the Committee's work and the petitioners' cases.

At paragraph 14 of its special report, the Committee referred to the difficulty that it faced in assessing evidence of a highly technical nature on which experts disagreed fundamentally. That is not surprising. The problem is not new. It arose in connection with the Channel fixed link proposals.

The methods used to calculate the frequency at which winds blow are not claimed to have a high degree of accuracy. Although the methods advocated by Dr. Cook of the Building Research Establishment for the purpose of structural design are very good for forecasting maximum speeds—he says that they are within 5 per cent.—the estimate of the number of hours in a year during which a gust exceeding a given speed will occur has a margin of error of up to 40 per cent. It is not surprising that there are disagreements.

This issue is really about traffic management. It may involve abstruse structural engineering and meteorological theory, but it is fundamentally about the management of traffic in high winds which, in the south-east of this country, are fortunately rare.

We have considered the experiences at certain windy sites in Great Britain. There are three places which have experienced continuing problems—the bridges across the Severn, the Forth and the Humber. At other places, there are sometimes speed restrictions and the odd closure from time to time. An overall strategy does not deal with the problem. The relevant authorities solve the problem at each location. Restrictions imposed range from speed limits through lane restrictions to closure to wind-susceptible vehicles—high-sided vehicles, caravans and the like. Complete closure is very rare. The Severn bridge has been closed completely three times in 21 years. The Forth and Humber bridges do not close.

From the inquiries that we have made during and since the Select Committee hearings, there is a consensus about the wind speeds which cause difficulties to traffic. All those to whom we have spoken in this country with experience of controlling traffic at windy places say that restrictions are considered on wind-susceptible vehicles when gusts of wind reach 50 miles per hour. Some authorities consider restricting the number of lanes in use usually at gusts of about 40 miles per hour, so that vehicles are not blown sideways into others in the adjoining lane. Whether those restrictions are imposed depends on the direction of the wind and traffic behaviour at the time. If the wind is not troubling the traffic, the restrictions are not imposed. The decision is very much one for the man on the spot. In the case of Dartford, that will be the crossing manager, advised by the police. The contract with DRCC—the Dartford River Crossing Company—stipulates that the police decision on this is final.

How often will it happen at Dartford? That is impossible to say with certainty. Some estimates have been made. Annex A of the response shows the results of applying the methods that the petitioners used to calculate how often the wind blows at certain speeds at various sites throughout the country and how often it has been necessary to impose restrictions.

The Meteorological Office has checked the estimates for Dartford against data from four anemometer sites in the Thames estuary. Our estimates for Dartford are of the same order as the Meteorological Office data. We are content about the estimates obtained by the forecasting method. If anything, they could be on the high side.

The annex indicates, as one would expect, that the higher speeds are experienced much less frequently than the lower ones. It indicates that the authorities have not thought it necessary to impose restrictions on wind-susceptible vehicles until gusts of about 50 miles per hour are reached. This appears not to vary with the density of traffic.

There are locations on the list which carry as much, if not more, traffic than this bridge will. One is the Thelwall viaduct.

We believe that the wind speeds at which restrictions have to be introduced—threshold speeds—recommended to the Select Committee by the petitioners—35 miles per hour for lane restrictions and 45 miles per hour for closure to wind-susceptible vehicles — do not accord with experience.

We do not believe that the estimate of hours at which gusts reach a certain speed necessarily translate into hours of restriction. The nearest bridge sites in the list to Dartford are Orwell and Medway. There has been very little trouble there.

It is reasonable to expect that things will be much the same at Dartford. We draw attention in the response to the Mar Dyke viaduct, immediately north of the present tunnels. The petitioners' forcasting method indicates that we might have expected traffic restrictions there. There have been none.

There is a feature of suspended bridges which makes them different from other roads—the presence of pylons or towers which hold up the cables. Mr. Brian Smith of Flint and Neill gave evidence to the Select Committee. He explained to the Committee that, at the Severn bridge, the towers caused problems in high winds because, as vehicles are masked by them from the wind, drivers correct steering only to emerge suddenly into the wind again. I can vouch for that. When I was at the Severn bridge the other day, it was one of the windiest days of the year. I stepped out from behind a tower to be struck by a wind 20 knots faster than it had been in shelter. An official who did the same nearly lost his spectacles. Just over half the incidents at the Severn bridge in the years 1984 to 1986 could be related to that effect.

There is a good case for graded shielding adjacent to the towers at Dartford. We have been told, since the proceedings of the Select Committee, that a similar solution has been adopted at the Little Belt bridge in Denmark with success. This shielding is relatively cheap, about £300,000 and will cause no redesign problems. It will be provided.

Eliminating to a large degree the effects of the towers will make the bridge more like an ordinary exposed stretch of road. It is right and fair to say that the persistency of the county councils led the bridge designers to come up with this idea. It is also being considered for the present Severn bridge. At Dartford, there will be some protection all the way along the bridge from the parapet which will be a metre high above the level of the road surface with 30 per cent. porosity.

That is very different from the Severn bridge where the top of the parapet, below the level of the road surface because of the way in which the bridge is constructed, gives no protection to traffic from wind. If that feature reduces the wind speed at road surface level, even by a little, it will add protection to traffic.

Procedures will be needed for diverting traffic through the tunnels in case of a serious accident or major maintenance, not just because of wind. We are confident that, without causing massive delays, it will be possible to segregate wind-susceptible vehicles from others, as it is at the Severn and other bridges and to divert them.

At Dartford, they will not face a detour of many miles. They will go along a slip road into the eastern lane of the east tunnel in which there will be two-way working on those occasions. There is no evidence that that practice is unsafe. Two-way working in the tunnels is normal practice when one of the Dartford tunnels is closed for maintenance.

Up to 1980, there was only one tunnel which operated with two-way traffic for 17 years, during which 140 million vehicles used the tunnel. Motorists will be informed by signs further back along the M25 when restrictions are in force. Nearer the tunnel, there will be gantry signs showing which lanes are closed. Such signs are common on the motorway network. If wind-susceptible traffic is being diverted, special signs will be switched on. There will be manual supervision of the entire process by the people who operate the crossing. There will not be interviewing of drivers, as there is at the Severn bridge, and any vehicle which appears to be wind-susceptible will be directed off the bridge. On the Kent side, it is practicable to ensure that traffic mixes again safely.

It will be possible to divert all the bridge traffic into the east tunnel if the bridge has to close. It will be for the crossing manager to decide which of those facilities he would use on any occasion. At night, for example, with light traffic, it might be simpler to close the bridge and divert all traffic.

The total crossing offers great flexibility. The bridge provides a fallback if there are problems in the tunnels and the present tunnel management, the police and motoring organisations regard the use of the tunnels as a perfectly practicable and acceptable way in which to deal with problems on the bridge. Some details remain to be settled, and we shall speak again to them and to local highway authorities. It is not possible to do this at any other crossing. Everywhere else, a long diversion is necessary if the bridge cannot be used. That is one of the reasons why the Government are considering wind-shielding on the second Severn crossing.

The Select Committee heard evidence from the petitioners to the effect that the present bridge design could be adapted for £5 million to £6 million and that there will be no more than a few weeks' delay in design. The nature of the adaptation proposed was, in our view, questionable. Substantial last-minute alterations should not be made to a major bridge design without taking great care. That view is now confirmed independently by a Danish designer — Mr. Aksel Frandsen — who has no connection with the Department or DRCC. The full report is in the Library. There is a brief summary of it in the response.

He confirmed that if there is to be full wind-shielding of the kind proposed by the petitioners, there must be a fundamental redesign of the bridge deck. He also confirmed that the delay estimated by DRCC—18 to 21 months — for redesign and extra construction time is realistic, although two or three months might be shaved off with luck. The estimated cost of full shielding varies between £15·25 million and £18·75 million, depending on the design of the bridge in relation to the present toll booths. Nobody can be sure of the exact cost at this stage, but it must be of this order.

Whether the lower or the higher of the two estimates of cost increase is taken, there would have to be amendments to the toll regime provided in the Bill, because it would no longer satisfy the cash flow conditions stipulated. In simple terms, DRCC would not have enough cash in the early years of operation to service its debts to those who are to finance construction of the bridge. To restore the current expectation that tolls would cease after 14 or 15 years and continue for a maximum of 20 years, an increase of about 6 per cent. in the real level tolls would be required.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): How can the Minister calculate that the difference between income and expenditure in the early years will be too tight for the toll regime when DRCC could not give the Select Committee any estimate of its income in the early years or for any given year? Does he have information which has been produced since the Select Committee met, or was there information available which DRCC did not make available to the Select Committee?

Mr. Bottomley: It is generally accepted that calculations were made to get to the 14 or 15-year estimate in the original proposal. I imagine that that was accepted by the Select Committee.

Dr. Reid: I think that the Minister said that the differential would be tight in the early years. I am not talking about the 15-year sum. I am asking how he can tell the House that, in any one of the early years, the income would be insufficient to meet the DRCC's requirements if that company cannot give us its estimate of income in any of those early years.

Mr. Bottomley: I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman has gone through more of this than I have, at least in the Select Committee—I have had it somewhat at second-hand. If we take as the base line the calculation on the original estimated cost and take the flow of revenue before the bridge is open as a given level and add, say, £16 million to the cost of providing the bridge before there can be extra capacity, it is quite clear that the difference between interest payments and revenue must provide a great effect. I do not know whether I put it sufficiently clearly to explain it, but perhaps the hon. Gentleman has another point in mind.

Dr. Reid: No, I have not. I am asking the Minister a simple question. If he does not know the income for any of those early years, how can he tell me whether the bridge will run at a profit, at a loss or how tight it will be? If we do not have that fact in the equation, we cannot assert what the Minister asserted. If, however, the Minister has the information necessary to make that assertion, he must have information which was unavailable to DRCC when the Select Committee met, because the company refused to give us that information.

Mr. Bottomley: I think that the hon. Gentleman may be pushing the point in rather more detail than the debate needs.

Dr. Reid: It is a crucial question, is it not?

Mr. Bottomley: It has been asserted that tolls would have to rise by 6 per cent. in real terms. Whether that is 5·5 per cent. or 6·5 per cent. is not at this point directly significant. The fact that there would have to be extra income to fund the extra spending should be accepted on both sides of the House.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): The general proposition, that if more money is spent more money must be collected and therefore the toll regime may have to be re-examined, is common sense and clear. What puzzles us is that the Minister asserted that, in the early years of the crossing, the toll regime would be too tight to warrent the additional expenditure. My hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) is trying to find out why that information was not available to the Select Committee.

Mr. Bottomley: I hesitate to repeat myself, but the level of income does not affect the assertion that an extra, say, £16 million of costs adds significantly to the capital cost of providing the bridge. In the early years, the debt rises dramatically, as has happened with several other bridges funded by tolls. In the later years, it is less relevant because, if the early years are under control, the later years look after themselves.

To what extent DRCC was able to say it did or did not know precisely what the revenue would be depends on the amount of traffic. If traffic rose at 17 per cent. a year, it is possible to calculate, at any given level of toll, what the income will be. It is also possible to estimate what change must be made to the debts that need servicing by looking at the capital cost. It seems to me as simple as that at that level of analysis. I am sure that if the hon. Gentleman needs to illustrate a case, if he accepts the suggestion that an increased capital sum would be needed for redesign and for wind-shielding, he will be able to argue that in a speech and I shall try to respond to it, but I think that we have probably taken the matter as far as we can at this stage.

It is unlikely to be possible to amend the Bill to provide for this increase without readvertising the amendments and inviting petitions in respect of them. We would have to question whether such a solution offered the best value for money. The Select Committee considered the costs of and the benefits to be gained from wind-shielding. The petitioners carried out some cost-benefit analysis. We have, too.

In our latest calculations, we assume that the estimates of wind forecast in the annex to this response will be borne out in practice and that restrictions would be imposed at the same wind speeds as they are at the Severn. We have carried out a careful analysis of the delays to traffic that that would cause during the next 30 years before and after tolls come to an end. The result was strongly negative, indicating that full wind-shielding was not justified on economic grounds. One of the reasons for that was the substantial cost to traffic in delays while the redesign took place. The capital cost did not match the savings either.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): How recent was the investigation, and who carried it out?

Mr. Bottomley: I think that I might wait until I have heard the rest of my hon. Friend's speech before answering that question.

Members of the Select Committee will be aware that this is not an exact science. Widely differing views were put to the Select Committee and, understandably enough, it made its decision. During the past two months, the Government have had the benefit of thinking through these matters again. In the light of the Select Committee's hearings and taking further advice, the Government have come to a judgment different from that of the majority of the Select Committee and have been confirmed in their view by evidence that is now available. Given all the evidence, we cannot justify the extra cost and delay for the rare occasions on which restrictions will be necessary.

I am content to be held responsible for this decision. I carry the can. We are asking the House to accept the amendment not simply because of the delay and the cost, or to assist the policy of private financing, or because we are the friends of anyone, but because it is right.

Mr. Robert Hughes: We see before us a fascinating example of what happens to Government buiness that is mixed up with the hybrid Bill procedure, but a clause stand part debate might be a more appropriate time at which to discuss whether the procedure is a good one.

Let me first associate myself with the tribute paid to hon. Members who served on the Select Committee—both for their perseverence in the many hours through which they sat and for their close attention to detail. It is clear from an examination of the minutes of evidence that the decision to add the words that the amendment seeks to remove was not made capriciously. The Select Committee members did not do it because they felt a bit upset about getting up early after a bad night; they did it because they had examined the evidence seriously, and believed that there was a serious point to be made.

To be fair, the Minister has conceded that the Select Committee arrived at its decision having weighed the evidence in the balance. It must be difficult, with such technical matters, to decide which experts are giving the best advice. Before we consider that, however, the Minister must answer one or two questions.

We can argue about the quantity and severity of the problems on the Severn bridge, but it is a fact that problems have been caused by lane closures and the restriction of movement by high-sided vehicles because of wind pressures. Given those problems, it is astonishing that, when it was decided to go ahead with the crossing, the effect of wind turbulence on traffic never entered the Department's mind. Apparently the design brief contained no recommendation for an analysis or appreciation of those effects, although everyone knows that wind turbulence is caused by high-sided towers or blocks.

The Minister has described his recent experience at the Severn, when he stepped from behind a pillar and was nearly blown off his feet and either he or one of his officials nearly lost his spectacles. As is no doubt common knowledge among architects, wind breaks sometimes have to be erected in high-rise housing blocks where people walk out of the door and are nearly blown off their feet. There is considerable debate about wind turbulence in technical journals: surely the designers of bridges must know about its effects.

After the hours of debate in the Select Committee, and the responses that it received, it is not good enough for the Minister to tell us merely that the Select Committee has a point, and that the Government will meet that point just so far by introducing partial wind-shielding. That means that drivers of high-sided vehicles would gradually find the pressure on the sides of their vehicles increasing, and be able to control it, without being suddenly blown off course by a blast of wind. The Minister must tell us first why the initial design brief did not examine the problem, and secondly why he is turning down the idea of full wind-shielding.

Mr. Dicks: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that a spokesman for Mott, Hay and Anderson, agents to the Government, said that wind-shielding was just a matter of weather forecasting? That was the emphasis that he placed on the need for a close examination of the problem.

Mr. Hughes: I accept that that was what was said. In that context, the paragraph in the Select Committee report which stated that the Committee was extremely unhappy about the way in which the evidence was presented has even more point.

We must consider the short-term and the long-term future of the bridge. I fully accept the point that I think the Minister is making: the need for the river crossing is urgent and it is long overdue. The present two tunnels cannot cope any longer, and something must be done to relieve the congestion. On the other hand, if the Minister has got it wrong and the bridge will be closed to high-sided vehicles more frequently than he would like to think, so that vehicles must go back down the twin tunnels—one of which, presumably, will have to be closed to traffic going in one direction, so that traffic can move in the other direction — how much delay and congestion will that cause? In a sense, it is a question of what is acceptable.

There is an old saying used by fishermen, and indeed seamen of all kinds: why spoil the ship for a hap'orth of tar? Is it reasonable to accept restrictions, given the problems that might be caused in the future? We are not speaking about five, 10 or even 20 years from now. We should consider the forecasts of increased traffic being generated in London, and the fact that every road improvement scheme seems to generate its own traffic over and above any official forecasts. It is almost a law of nature that any such forecast can be multiplied by x. The traffic generates itself. If the Select Committee's advice is not taken, extra congestion may build up to reach the proportions that are currently generated in the area, possibly for longer than the Minister would suggest.

I appreciate that, when it comes to accepting the advice of experts, in a sense you pays your money and you takes your choice, but a risk is being taken. I do not refer to the safety of the bridge; the safety of the traffic is at issue. The number of days for which the bridge will be closed will affect the amount of disruption that is caused.

Mr. Tim Janman (Thurrock): The projected number of hours of lane closure for the east London river crossing, only eight miles up river, is 25 hours a year. Why does the hon. Gentleman think that the projection for the Dartford-Thurrock crossing of 24 hours a year is likely to be inaccurate?

Mr. Hughes: I believe that long periods were suggested. One figure suggested was 17 hours of lane restrictions a week, which I think translates to 880 hours a year. Other evidence suggests a figure of 550 hours a year, or 10 or 11 hours a week. That might take place in the middle of the night when there is not much traffic around anyway. If there are 17 hours of lane restrictions a week — only time will tell whether that is accurate — hon. Members who were so vociferous in their arguments against wind-shielding may find themselves under heavy pressure from their constituents, who have remained quiet so far because they have not thought it necessary to make a fuss.

Mr. Janman: I asked the hon. Gentleman why he felt that, given the projection of 25 hours of lane closures a year at the east London river crossing only eight miles away, there was any reason to believe that the projection of only 24 hours of lane closures a year at Dartford was inaccurate. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the consultancy firm that projected the 500 hours of lane closures a year at the Dartford-Thurrock crossing projected half that number for a bridge across the Channel?

7.30 pm

Mr. Hughes: I shall not be diverted into a debate about what would happen with a bridge across the Channel. Had that company won the design and provided for no wind-shielding, there would have been one hell of a row, as we all know.

The hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Janman) asked why I should reject the expert advice that there would be 25 hours of lane closures a year at the east London river crossing compared with 24 hours a year at Dartford. I suspect that when we deal with the east London river crossing in detail we shall have the same argument because different experts will come forward with different views.

Dr. Reid: As an illustration, does my hon. Friend accept that the Government's projections for a cross-Channel bridge, which was of similar height and was to cross an exposed channel, referred to lane restrictions which turned out to be less than their predictions for the Dartford-Thurrock crossing?

Mr. Hughes: I accept my hon. Friend's point, but I do not want to be diverted to a debate on the Channel crossing.

There are many views on the exact number of hours of lane closures. I even concede a point which, I recollect, was not made by counsel in closing speeches. Even if there were a maximum of 17 hours of lane closures a week, much of that might be in the middle of the night, when there was not much traffic anyway, so I am almost giving half a point to the hon. Member for Thurrock. I should have thought that, if there were 17 hours of lane closures a week, that should be taken seriously. The Government have done so. That is why they have said that they do not want the words in the Bill. I hope that the Minister said that they will provide partial wind-shielding. At one stage he almost said that the Government would consider doing that. We must get it right.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Partial wind-shielding will be provided.

Mr. Hughes: It will be, provided the House does not reject the Government amendment.

We must consider whether to accept expert advice. All members of the Committee suggested that wind-shielding could be provided by light plastic windshields of sufficient strength to do the job without adding to the weight of the bridge. I am inclined to accept the view that, if wind-shielding is provided—whatever the materials—redesign will be needed because of the effect on the bridge's stability. One cannot get away with saying that wind-shielding can be provided for the whole length of the bridge without affecting the design. If we believe that the wind will affect high-sided vehicles, causing them to veer, it is obvious that wind-shielding will lead to bending stress on the bridge, which must be considered in redesign. I am prepared to accept that if there is to be full wind-shielding there must be a full redesign.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) will pursue the point of the early years of a toll regime versus the later years. I accept that if more capital, and therefore more borrowing, are required, resulting in greater costs, there will have to be a new toll regime. I do not understand why that bothers the Minister. If the product is better and the customer is not diverted as often as he could be, he might be perfectly happy to pay an increased toll for the better service. I do not think that it makes any difference whether the tolls are collected over 20 or 25 years so long as the balance is right.

The Bill says that the crossing has 20 years to get its money back with tolls. If the money is recovered within 15 years, ownership of the bridge reverts to the Department of Transport. If at the end of 20 years the tolls have not paid for the cost of the bridge, it still reverts to the Department of Transport, and the banks or whoever put up the money have to stand the loss. It is a risk. If we overload the cost of the bridge, we should give the company another five years to get its money back or allow it to impose a higher toll to get its money back within the same period. Risk capital is involved.

[Mr. Hughes]

The Minister is in a dilemma. He wants the bridge to be built by risk capital, but he is frightened lest he scare the risk capital away.

Mr. Janman: Although the cost element is important, far more important is the delay, as the hon. Gentleman accurately stated. Does he think it worth delaying a major project, which is urgently needed, for 15 to 18 months simply because there will be 24 hours of lane closures a year, much of it in the dead of night when there is hardly any traffic?

Mr. Hughes: I shall answer that question in my last sentences.

If the toll regime must be changed, that can readily be done. There is the choice whether to increase tolls or give the company a longer period in which to get its money back. We must decide one way or the other. It comes down to whether a delay—a delay of 18 to 21 months may be reasonable; I do not know—is worth having to get the project right. The answer is yes.

I suspect that, if the normal planning procedures had been followed, the bridge would not have been built for another 14 years. The Government have chosen to cut corners by having this legislation considered under the hybrid Bill procedure. They should not cut corners to the extent of arbitrarily deciding that 18 months is too long to wait to get the job right and to ensure that there is not great traffic disruption. It is always difficult to forecast. I suppose that I am safe to forecast that I shall not be a Member in 20 years' time. I have no intention of emulating my predecessor, who stayed here until he was 83, which in my case would be much more than 20 years more in the House.

I am willing to forecast that if the bridge is built according to the design put forward by the Minister, there will be so much disruption and concern that within 15 to 20 years—possibly even sooner—there will be demands for partial wind-shielding to be converted into full wind-shielding, however that is done. Perhaps — I do not know whether I am making a defence for the Minister—bridge design will have advanced in 50 years' time and that will be a possibility.

We have no Whip present. I do not know whether the Minister can say the same for the Government; the danger is that Government business is whipped. Having seen the evidence, and having discussed and thought about it, I do not believe that we should support the Government's amendment. We should do what the Select Committee did and insist on full wind-shielding.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I am grateful for being called because I was Chairman of the Select Committee that examined the Bill. My hon. Friend the Minister has reminded us that it met for more than 20 sitting days. According to my calculations, it was in session for 111 hours. I am grateful for my hon. Friend's words of approbation, and I should like to say how much I appreciated the assistance of my hon. Friends the Members for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman), for Chorley (Mr. Dover) and for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) and the hon. Members for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) and for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway). I note that all the members of the Committee are in their places tonight.

To help the House, I shall make one or two points to show the problems that the Committee faced. As has been said, there was complete disagreement on the basic elements leading to the judgment whether the bridge should have wind-shielding. There was complete disagreement among the experts who were called by the promoters and petitioners. Somebody might say, "You must be a rather naive person if you feel that experts will not disagree." The other Members of the Committee will support me when I say that the disagreement was so fundamental and complete that it caused us great concern.

The disagreement was in three sectors. Although many years ago I qualified as an architect, I am a complete layman in the technical details of bridge design. There was disagreement about the frequency of high winds. There was a 50 per cent. disagreement between the two expert witnesses called by the petitioners. There was more than a 50 per cent. disagreement on the frequency of high winds between the most conservative estimate of the petitioners and the statutes that were given by the promoters. The leading expert witness called by the petitioners — the prestigious Essex and Kent county councils—was none other than Dr. Nicholas Cook, who is the senior principal scientific officer and wind engineering section head at the Department of the Environment's Building Research Establishment. The petitioners therefore called the leading Government expert.

There was complete disagreement about what the delay would be before the bridge was completed. As my hon. Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) said, the petitioners said that the delay would be only six weeks, and the promoters said that it would be about 15 to 18 months. As to the extra cost — my hon. Friend the Minister reminded us of the figures—the petitioners said that it would be about £5·4 million and that there would be no need for a fundamental redesign of the bridge. The promoters said that it would cost between £15,250,000 and £18,750,000 and that it would involve a fundamental redesign of the bridge.

I do not think that the Committee was helped by one or two aspects of the promoters' case—the promoters being the Government and the concessionaires. The promoters were reluctant to give information about the design of the bridge when it was requested by the Committee.

The promoters—I want to put their case as fairly as I can and I hope that, as Chairman of the Committee, I am being impeccably neutral — claimed commercial confidentiality, and they may have been right. However, that begs two questions. The lesser question is, at what point does commercial confidentiality not need to be kept? They had been appointed to build the bridge. For how long do they need to keep that commercial confidentiality, which presumably would go as soon as construction of the bridge began?

The more important question that one should ask—and it is right that the Chairman of the Committee should do so — is, if the promoters are using parliamentary procedures—it is the Select Committee's job to hear the evidence of the petitioners—surely we are entitled, for the benefit of the public, to demand information so that the matter can be properly examined.

Given the scale and technical nature of the petitioners' case, I believe that we should have been given other additional information—not only the information about the design of the bridge—by the promoters. I shall give one example. We did not have annex A, which was attached to the Minister's response and which gave information of wind speeds at 13 major road bridges in Britain and the details of the traffic restrictions that are imposed on them. While a little of that information dribbled out over the 15 days, it would have been helpful to have that table.

Two matters have become apparent to me, and members of the Committee can disagree with me if they wish. I believe that, because of the detail and complexity of the technical evidence, we should have had, from the outset, a technical adviser or specialist who could have guided us and saved a little time. The time that the Committee took had nothing to do with the competence of its Chairman, but everything to do with the pace set by the petitioners' counsel, who I gather was on a rather larger salary than the combined salaries of the Committee. Surely we should have had, from the outset, that technical advice, which the more general departmental Select Committees can call upon. I leave that thought as a possible change that might be made in future procedures.

The fact that the experts would disagree profoundly must have been realised before the Committee met. Even though we took the decision to hear the petitioners' case on wind-shielding on 28 October—at first the promoters said that we had no locus to do so, so we had to take evidence on that — there were six weeks between us making our decision and the end of the Committee proceedings. The promoters were slow to respond, at least.

At best — I must say this to my hon. Friend the Minister — the independent advice that my hon. Friend has since acquired should have been instigated shortly after 28 October at the latest. It is only two months since the Committee reported. Given the time scale of six weeks between 28 October and the last sitting of the Committee, the promoters could have been more ready and willing to provide us with the information that we needed.

Whatever the merits or otherwise of wind-shielding the bridge, it was little wonder that the Committee, by a majority of five to one, took the decision that it did, given these circumstances. As Chairman of the Select Committee, I did not vote. In the parliamentary tradition, I shall continue to adopt impeccable neutrality tonight. When I fall off the fence on to the bridge, whether or not it is wind-shielded, I hope that I shall fall on the right side of it and that it is a soft landing.

Dr. Reid: Much as the Minister would like it, I do not intend to attempt to condense 111 hours of evidence into a 10-minute speech. That is beyond even the abstractive powers of the various hon. Members who were asked to sit on the Committee. It should not be necessary to repeat what took 111 hours to weigh up in the 21 days on which we sat in judgment, but that is what the Government are asking us to do today. Although it was an arduous task to sit on the Committee for 21 days, I note as I look around the Strangers Gallery that there must be some people who are gluttons for punishment. There are one or two familiar faces. Such are the passions that the issue has aroused.

The Minister's contribution was no counterbalance to the tons of evidence that the Committee had to sift during 111 hours. Indeed, if we put on the scales of justice or of rationality the contribution of that 21 days, along with the Minister's case, which, with great respect, appeared to be an anecdote about how his official lost his spectacles on the Severn bridge, we would find the Government's case this time around as wanting as their previous case.

It may be of interest to hon. Members who have remained in the Chamber to know that I have no subjective interest in the matter. The Dartford-Thurrock crossing is not continually in the minds or on the lips of my constituents. It is not a matter of common discussion in the bars of Bellshill or on the streets of Shotts. I have no interest other than the public interest. It is obviously not of ideological interest to me or to my party, as hon. Members can see, judging from the Benches behind me. The proposed wind shield is not even to be constructed of steel, so, from that point of view, no one can accuse me of having a localised interest.

I ask the Minister and other hon. Members to accept that my interest is purely that of any hon. Member who is put on a Select Committee — that is, to pursue the public interest for the best possible reasons and to the fullest possible extent, to ensure that Parliament defends the interests of people outside the House who feel that their interests have not so far been served by the Government. That was the function, approach and philosophy of the Select Committee throughout its deliberations.

In their response to the Committee's report, the Government were fulsome in their praise. They referred to a long and arduous series of sittings spread over 21 days. They thanked us for our full and painstaking examination of the issues, but then said, "By the way, we reject every recommendation except one." That is the handy little recommendation, in which we happened to say that the presentation of the Government's case was abysmal. Of course it was abysmal, but the Government find it handy to accept that recommendation because, in so doing, they can say, "Really, it was nothing to do with the weight of the evidence, it was merely the presentation." The long-term injury for the Government is to mistake the shadow for the substance.

It is true that the presentation of the Government's case was extremely poor, but even if it had been much better, I am utterly convinced that the evidence would still have been in favour of the plaintiffs. The Chairman of the Committee referred to 111 hours and 21 days, of which not less than 15 days were spent on the wind shield issue alone. After 15 days of examination and cross-examination the Select Committee concluded by a majority of five to one in favour of the addition of a wind shield on the bridge.

Why should there have been a five to one majority? Why should an hon. Member such as myself, with no remote connection with the subject and with no subjective interest in the outcome, who supports the need for the crossing, as do other hon. Members, who appreciates the need to relieve as soon as possible traffic conditions and inconvenience in the area, who is aware of the long delays that motorists suffer at present, and who is fully cognisant of the Government's claim that wind-shielding would entail extra delays and costs in the construction programme, decide that there should be a wind shield on the bridge? Right hon. and hon. Members must decide that matter for themselves.

Despite all the resources at their command, the best legal brains that money could buy — apparently, the plaintiffs were more up-market with their QC—and with the assistance of not only the reservoir of talent that resides in the Civil Service but the backing of a major financial and industrial concern and the expertise of the private sector, the Government utterly failed to provide the Select Committee with a case.

Mr. Janman: Is the hon. Gentleman willing to comment on the fact that the QC employed by the petitioners was certainly on a high salary and the projected rate increase in the county of Essex this year is 17·8 per cent.?

Dr. Reid: I cannot comment on rates. I can certainly say that if the QC was on an extremely high salary, and considering the way in which the evidence was presented, he deserved every penny of it. If the matter was judged purely in terms of convincing a Committee, he should have been paid 10 times the salary that the Government paid their QC.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I appreciate that members of the Select Committee will have their say, but it may be helpful if we accept that the way in which the Government presented their case is on trial, not the Select Committee and not any counsel for either side.

Dr. Reid: I accept that. I was merely responding to the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Janman).

We have already paid tribute to the Chairman of the Committee. He conducted himself in an impeccable manner throughout the deliberations. He is not only an impeccable Chairman but an extremely polite man. He said that the presentation of the Government's case lacked something. He said:

"We felt there was a lack of readiness . . . by the Government . . . to make available necessary technical and financial information which would have greatly assisted the Committee".

That was the understatement of the year.

At times the Committee descended into Whitehall farce as the Government became enmeshed in an ever-thickening web of apparent obstruction, which any objective Member could only have concluded was intended to obfuscate the real issue of whether the evidence supported the case for wind-shielding. For example, the famous design plans have been referred to. It may be of interest to hon. Members to know that, when the Committee first referred to the issue, the Government's initial case was that the plaintiffs had no locus.

The Government presented their case, the Select Committee decided against them, and the plaintiffs presented their case. Remember that the Government's case was that there would be undue delays and cost, because any wind-shielding would require a fundamental redesign of the bridge. The problem was that the Government would not release the bridge designs to the plaintiffs or, indeed, to the Select Committee. Therefore, it became impossible to estimate whether the Government were telling the truth. If one does not have the designs, it is difficult how a wind shield will affect redesign. Faced with that, the Committee asked the Government for the reasons.

The first reason that we were given was commercial confidentiality. That rather perplexed the Committee, because, as far as we were aware, the bridge will be owned by the Government. If the bridge is owned by the Government, we presume that the designs are owned by the Government. So we overruled them on commercial confidentiality. But during the arguments on commercial confidentiality, the Government told us explicitly that there was a danger that the designs might fall into the hands of our foreign competitors—especially, and not surprisingly, the West Germans. But despite the threats from the German bogeyman across the Channel, we overruled the Government on that point.

The Government then told us that even if confidentiality did not apply, it would be impossible to produce the designs because they did not exist. They said that it would take four to five weeks to put them together. That raised the obvious question: if the designs did not exist, how could the Government tell us that a wind shield would require a fundamental redesigning of the bridge? A simple question, one might think. Again, we overruled the Government and asked for the designs to be produced at short notice. We were then told that they could not be produced at short notice because the Government had to refer to the designer, the mysterious Dr. Homburg who —surprise, surprise—is a West German. Remember the people against whom we had to protect the designs' confidentiality? It appears that the designers were a team of West Germans.

Faced with that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you might have excused the objective member of the Select Committee for thinking that something was going on. That example sums up all the obstructive tactics that were used. In retrospect, it is easy to see why the Government were so reluctant to produce the evidence. The weight of the testimony and the evidence completely undermined the Government's case.

It is astounding that one of the most telling contributions against the Government's case and in favour of wind-shielding came from Dr. Cook, a Government employee and one of their foremost experts in wind—outside the Chamber, at least—who had not even been consulted on the matter. No one had thought to lift the telephone and say to the Government's top export—[Interruption.] I will not reflect on his future. He may be an export at some stage. No one thought to telephone the top expert in wind and say to him, "We are building this great construction from Dartford to Thurrock. It is a fair old height and a massive size. Do you think we may have problems with wind?" We had the irony of the plaintiffs bringing their case against the Government and producing as one of their most telling witnesses an expert employed by the Government.

The essence of Dr. Cook's testimony was that, contrary to the Government's claim, the site of the Dartford-Thurrock crossing was wind-prone. The hon. Member for Thurrock asked earlier about the evidence in relation to a similar bridge nearby, but the existing basis of calculation of wind, which took into account general wind patterns, was not detailed enough to allow for localised conditions. That could mean that the Dartford-Thurrock crossing would be much more exposed to dangerous winds than a similar bridge, perhaps in the same general geographical area but not in the precise locality. That information could have been obtained by a simple telephone call.

I do not accept the limited wind-shielding that the Minister mentioned. It is a coincidence that out of the blue limited wind-shielding was added to the plans for the bridge within three days of the start of the Select Committee's deliberations. A discussion that had been continuing for some months, with the plaintiffs asking for wind-shielding for more than a year previously, suddenly and miraculously came to a conclusion within 72 hours of the Committee's starting to ask questions about wind-shielding. It was a pre-emptive strike.

Nor can I accept that the wind shield would be a superfluous extra. As the Minister said, it is being actively considered for the second Severn crossing. I cannot accept that the Government——

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Limited wind-shielding is being considered for the existing Severn crossing. Wind-shielding is being considered for the second crossing. It might be helpful to establish that.

Dr. Reid: I thought that that was what I said.

I cannot accept the Government's report, which simply goes through every issue that the petitioners have mentioned and replies to them. It is almost as though the members of the Committee were sitting in a time warp for 21 days. If all that will happen is that the petitioners' questions will be answered in the House, ignoring completely the decisions of the Select Committee, it might as well not have sat. The Government employed all the arguments, bar one, in testimony before the Committee. They acted as defence counsel during the trial, but when the jury found against them, they sacked the jury and said, "We do not like the decision. We will not only be defence counsel, but we shall set ourselves up as jury, judge and final court of appeal."

That not only undermines the Government's case on this crossing but seriously undermines the entire system of Select Committees. Of course, as the Minister will say, the Government are not obliged to accept the decisions of Select Committees. But they are obliged to give more weight to the Select Committee's deliberations than they appear from their response to have done.

The Minister said that the issue is one of traffic management. But that is the point of contention. The Government cannot solve a problem merely by reiterating the assertion on which they based their principal argument. The Committee, having heard the evidence, decided that it was not merely a question of traffic management. The issue before the House is whether high winds will cause the closure of the bridge or the restriction of lanes so frequently as to undermine the reason for constructing the crossing.

Mr. Janman indicated assent.

Dr. Reid: I see the hon. Gentleman nodding. I do not know where he got the estimate of 24 hours. It may horrify him to know that the average estimate of the plaintiffs, which was lower than Dr. Cook's estimate, was 550 hours a year of possible lane restrictions and closures. If the objective is to alleviate traffic problems between Dartford and Thurrock, the hon. Gentleman must ask himself whether, in the eagerness to construct the crossing, the company will not be constructing a white elephant.

I do not accept the argument on costs. The Minister said—he had no evidence to back his assertion, because I asked him, as I asked the Dartford River Crossing Company—that it would be impossible to encompass within the existing toll regime the additional cost of about £15 million to £30 million. He contended that, in the early years, the income would be insufficient, given the extra that would be necessary to pay the interest.

I make two comments on that assertion. First, the Dartford River Crossing Company was asked specifically by me and others to provide an estimate of its income for the early years. If a company cannot provide an estimate of income, it cannot say that that income will be insufficient to meet extra costs. It could not provide such an estimate, and nor could the Minister tonight. He said that if one adds £18 million to an existing bill, it is bound to be more at the end of the day. We are all grateful for that intellectual insight. It is one which the Committee would accept.

Even adding the £18 million and its interest to the existing moneys that have to be collected in tolls—we discussed that evidence in Committee—there is still sufficient leeway without any vast increase within the 20-year toll regime to collect that additional money. On present estimates, without taking into account the wind-shielding, the cost could be recouped in 14, 15 or 16 years. With the additional money it would be a bit of a tight squeeze, but it could be recouped within the 20-year toll regime. In other words, the global sum could be recouped without any major changes in the term of the toll regime.

The question is simple. Is it worth delaying the project for 18 months and paying an extra £15 million to render efficient for the purposes for which it is created a bridge that may last for well over a century? We are not talking about 24 hours a year delay, but 550 or possibly 880 hours. I contend, and the Select Committee contends, that 18 months delay and £15 million are justified for a bridge that will last over a century.

The Minister said that the Government had reconsidered the matter since the Select Committee reported, but I have seen no evidence of that. Indeed, from his response it is clear that, far from having reconsidered the matter, the Government have stuck obstinately to the original decision at the time of the initial tender. I do not know whether it is collective loyalty to the Department and decisions that have already been taken; whether it is sheer embarrassment; whether they are utterly and sincerely convinced that we, as well as their experts and the weight of evidence, are wrong; whether it is from friendship or loyalty to Trafalgar House; or whether it is because the contract has already been awarded.

Parliament, in the shape of the Select Committee, has served the plaintiffs, the public and future users of the Dartford-Thurrock crossing well. Unfortunately, the Government have served them ill. I am sure that the Minister has a marvellous future before him and I agree with one of his statements. He said that he would carry the can. He will indeed. I hope for his sake that we are wrong, because if we are correct—and I believe that we are—it will not be a can that he will carry during his career but a large albatross around his neck.

Mr. Dicks: First, I declare an interest. In 1985 I had an interest in Taylor Woodrow. When I served on the Select Committee I was not aware that Taylor Woodrow had made a bid for the original Dartford crossing, but my interest is registered in the section that deals with Members' interests, and has been since 1985. I was appointed to the Committee by the Committee of Selection, which must have been aware of that background.

I was the only member of the Committee who at the outset felt that the Government's case was correct and that the petitioners had no locus. I felt that we should not listen to the case put by Kent and Essex county councils. How wrong I was. I am pleased to say that, and that my colleagues who decided that we should hear their case were right.

All of us, without exception, want to see this bridge in place, and we were all anxious to deal with the matter as quickly as possible. Had there been an obvious way to do so, we would have taken it, so before anybody says that we set out on this long voyage deliberately to have fun and games at the Government's expense, let me assure them that the opposite was the case. We had hoped to deal with the matter in a few days, but it took 21 days and almost 112 hours.

If one were malicious, one would say that the Government's presentation contains lies, and damned lies, but that would be most unfair. Yet, having noted the lack of details in the presentation, I would not be keen to have the Department of Transport, Mott, Hay and Anderson and Trafalgar House build a bridge with my grandson's Lego.

I have listened to try to find out where the truth lies, but I am left with a great deal of scepticism and anxiety, although it is private money. We are all aware of what is going on. My hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) described well how we had asked for information, but it was not forthcoming, for the various reasons that he set out, until we pressed for it. That was just one of about half a dozen instances that have given rise to my scepticism. I accept that my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) quite properly took a different view, but the longer the Committee sat, the more sceptical most of us became. We were shown evidence and given views which were subsequently changed. We were not absolutely sure what was happening.

8.15 pm

I was concerned that we did not have access to Herr Helmut Homburg—that is a joke in itself. In his profile it said that the laws in Germany during the 1930s were changed to enable him to start his rising career as a bridge builder. We were not able to invite to the Select Committee the man who knew all the technical details and has special information that the Select Committee should have; nor could we question him and find out his thinking. Only by exerting pressure did we manage to persuade the Department to send a telex to Germany asking him what he thought about wind shields. His four or five line reply was that he did not want them "on my bridge". We thought that it was the Government's bridge.

I am a little uneasy about talking about the quality of the people working for the Government, Mott, Hay and Anderson, and Trafalgar House. The project manager, who is a charming gentleman, sat for many hours giving us the benefit of his wisdom. My colleagues discovered his background: he has limited experience, primarily from highway maintenance, he has never built a bridge, and he has no experience of the impact of wind on a bridge. He said that from walking around Dartford and perhaps crossing the Severn bridge he felt in his bones that the position was not too bad. He had a feeling inside him. We are talking a £82 million project. We asked him why he had not approached Dr. Cook, a Government employee with great expertise, for help at the beginning. He had never thought about it. Dr. Cook works in a Department and is paid by the Government.

Mr. Janman: Does my hon. Friend think that that may have something to do with the fact that there is no major estuarial crossing in the world with full wind-shielding?

Mr. Dicks: With great respect to my hon. Friend, not at all. If one is to build a bridge, one should receive the best and most comprehensive advice possible. Essex and Kent county councils brought a witness who was a wind expert —not someone they found, but a man in a Government office. Yet central Government did not bother to ask one of their employees whose salary they pay. Nothing could be more stupid and unthinking.

The project manager—nice chap that he is, indeed a charming man—was not qualified. He did not have the expertise, background or specialisation to handle this project. One wonders how on earth he got the job.

I shall not stop there. I come now to the representatives of the agents. Although the contracts were up for tender for the job, no one was up for tender to be the agents. Why did Mott, Hay and Anderson get the job? The company did another job for the Department of Transport some time ago, so perhaps the Department thought that it was good and would have it back again. There was no competition, and it seemed to me—I am not an expert —that the Department had had a good job done by the company in the past and decided that it would bring it along and use it because it seemed pretty good.

To judge from what we heard from the representative, his evidence was flawed, to say the least. He was unfamiliar with wind-shield techniques and could not distinguish one type from another. He turned to Dr. Cook for advice, but did not appear to like it or bother to follow it up. His attitude to wind expertise, about which he knew nothing, was cavalier and throwaway. He described it as nothing more than weather forecasting. If a leading member of the Government's agents plays down the importance of wind on a bridge, be it the Severn bridge or the Dartford-Thurrock crossing, in such a cavalier manner, it makes one wonder how they came to be the Government's agents and how that man came to be in charge of the presentation.

In order to be fair to the three parties concerned, let us turn to Trafalgar House. It decided to bring along an accountant. He told us about his qualifications as a Fellow of the Institute of Chartered Accountants, so we had hoped for some expertise from him. We asked if he had brought any figures along and he replied that he had not. We asked him how, if there was a delay, he would raise the money. He answered that he did not know how long that would take—possibly six months. We thought he was an accountant, but it turned out that he was not really one. He sounded like a Back-Bench Conservative Member doing what he was told when he was told to do it.

We put in our report and the Government examined it. Chapter 17 of the response says:

"The Government, as promoters of the Bill, assisted by the concessionnaires, presented the case in the way they thought most helpful to the Committee."

Lies, damned lies and statements in the Minister's reply. There is no other way of putting it. If that was what the Government thought was the most helpful way, God help us if they wanted to be obstructive.

"This reflected the obligation the Government felt to safeguard information which the concessionnaires considered would be of commercial value to a competitor."

The only information that the Government wanted to safeguard in their presentation to us was the information that would help us come to a full and proper conclusion in our deliberations. I do not hesitate to say that, and I shall not backtrack on it.

We heard from the Minister in the report, and we heard it again today, that further investigations have led the Government to believe that the Committee was wrong. We sat for 111 hours—21 days. The Standing Committee—God bless the Members and their cotton socks—sat for two hours——

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley): Less than one.

Mr. Dicks: In that case, I do not bless their cotton socks.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): It is perhaps worth while telling the hon. Gentleman that he will strengthen his case if he realises that one of the reasons why the Standing Committee sat for less than an hour was that we did not have the Government's replies to the important points raised in the Select Committee, so there was no point in delaying the Committee at that stage.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We also did not have my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks).

Mr. Dicks: It was a clever move on the part of the Government to keep everyone in the dark until the Standing Committee had risen, and then to deliver their response. The Department of Transport, as we discovered during our deliberations, over-estimated the toll income on bridges in the north—it got that wrong—and under-estimated traffic on the M25—it got that wrong, too. But it was clever enough to ensure that the information needed by hon. Members to make our case conveniently arrived after the Standing Committee has risen.

I wrote to the Secretary of State for Transport on 19 December asking for a full inquiry into how the contract was awarded and how it had progressed ever since. Something about it smelt wrong. I have received an acknowledgment, but yet again there was no answer to the points that I raised, except that the Minister indirectly replied to the Select Committee that the Government had to be careful about these issues because of commercial confidentiality. With great respect to my hon. Friend—I have a high regard for his ability and for what he says and does — that is absolute bunkum. There is nothing to prevent the Government answering the questions that we raised about the way the matter has been handled. It is wrong to use confidentially in this way. The Minister, I, my hon. Friends and, I am sure, the people in the Department of Transport, know that.

The Select Committee sat through all those hours and was painstaking about its questions. We argued among ourselves and delayed each other by asking so many questions. The Chairman was kind and patient, although once or twice he told some of us off. How can the Government listen to what we say and then, in a few days, reject virtually everything that criticised them, except for one bit, as the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) pointed out? There is something wrong with the way in which the whole thing has been handled. To say in the report, as the Government do, that they hope that an inquiry into the points raised will ensure that the presentation is better next time is not good enough.

I want to know why the goal posts were moved half way through the tendering process. I want to know how Mott, Hay and Anderson obtained the agent's post. Why is the project manager someone who should not be doing the job? Why did the man from Mott, Hay and Anderson know nothing about wind problems on the bridge? Why did the accountant not bring facts and figures with him? If that is the quality of person that the Government use in the Department of Transport, is it any wonder that they underestimate traffic on the M25 and overestimate tolls in the north of England? There is something wrong in the state of Denmark.

I beg the Minister not only to learn lessons for the future, but to tell us what has been going on, why and who has been doing it. Where is the Government's latest information coming from, and who gives it to them? If it is coming from the same incompetent crew that has been advising the Government thus far, they can forget the advice as worthless.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I am sorry that my voice is hoarse tonight; it is in poor form because it was in too good form on Saturday at Cardiff Arms park.

I want to raise certain points that have not so far been covered. When my hon. Friends and I were first asked to serve on the Select Committee, we were all rather green, having been elected only in 1987. We were unfamiliar with some of the more arcane aspects of Commons procedure, so when the Whips approached us and told us that it was a great honour to serve on a Select Committee we rushed back to tell our hon. Friends of the new intake that we have been asked to serve on a Select Committee scrutinising private business. They asked what we had done wrong. I am still trying to find out, but it was a long job and we sat patiently. So green were we that we did not realise that the Government are allowed to score goals after the Select Committee has finished. I am glad that did not happen last Saturday. We scored a drop goal in injury time, but not after the whole match was over, which is essentially what the Government have done.

We can all share some sense of grievance at the fact that the Government have pretended that the Select Committee never met. They have said that they will accept the point about presentation and the fact that they did not put their case well. However, that merely strengthens their resolve to ram their original conclusions down the throats of hon. Members. They claim that all that was wrong was that they made a few mix-ups and did not get their act together in time to have everything ready for the Committee. Perhaps they rushed things a little and did not put the best face on what was really a strong case. All that does not please those of us who served on the Select Committee. The health of the Select Committee procedure for private or hybrid business in which there is a strong Government interest must depend on the Government showing some respect for the conclusions reached by Select Committees. They have not done so on this occasion. They have accepted the bit that does not involve any change in making up their mind and reaching conclusions. They have said that they are sticking to their guns even though they were overturned in the Committee by a majority of five to one and took a fairly severe pasting in the Committee's final conclusions. We have to ask ourselves why that happened. It is not just a matter of presentation, because something fundamental was giving rise to disquiet the whole way through.

8.30 pm

We are not discussing the principle of privatisation—and the Opposition do not wish to raise that issue at this stage—and we are not considering privatisation of a key part of Britain's motorway infrastructure; we are debating whether the use of a design, build and finance contract for a key part of the M25 will give rise to any kind of substandard operation compared with what would have occurred if the Government had heeded to the Select Committee's conclusions.

The Select Committee met and considered the evidence in extenso. We were laymen, except for one member of the Committee who was an engineer, and we found in favour of the petitioners on some fairly fundamental points in relation to the bridge design. We expect some notice to be taken of that and will be most unhappy if it is not. We also expect some notice to be taken of the way in which we went about our work. We put our best efforts into it. We do not expect it to be dismissed as if it did not happen. That is extremely worrying for everyone involved in the work of the House of Commons as a whole.

This is a matter of concern not just for the seven of us on the Committee, who feel fairly aggrieved because the work that we put in may not have been noted in the way that one would expect, but for every hon. Member who will have to consider how the House is supposed to deal with the hybrid Bill procedure which combines Government and private interests. Are we supposed to pretend that the Committee goes through a charade of sitting for 122 hours because its Members have nothing better to do? Is it intended to be a real part of the examination of evidence which allows the Committee to draw conclusions?

It is most unfortunate, when private companies and the Government combine on docks, harbours, roads and bridges and use the hydrid Bill procedure more and more, that the Goverment do not recognise that the essential countervailing part of that is that they must take notice of the conclusions reached by Select Committees, even when those conclusions run counter to the case made by the Government. There must be times when the Government are willing to accept the principle that, even though a Select Committee has found against them and it will cost them time, money and renegotiation, Select Committees are there to do a job.

The Committee considered this case the first time that the Government wanted to use a design, build and finance procedure. We heard evidence that it would take additional time and money, but the Government said that they were unwilling to accept that conclusion. They said that the only conclusion they would accept was the one that involved the Government giving themselves a small caning on the backside for not putting the facts and figures together very well and for second-rate presentation. That is not good enough and will bring the Select Committee procedure on hybrid Bills into disrepute.

As I have said, it is an attack not only on the seven members of the Committee but on the whole Select Committee procedure for dealing with hybrid Bills. We all have an interest in seeing that that procedure is properly protected and is not used simply as a doormat by the Government. We must all make a stand to see that Select Committees are used properly and treated with respect, even when they draw conclusions that are inconvenient for the Government and for their concessionaires. The Government cannot ride roughshod over Select Committees.

I should like to make a few points on finance and windshielding. These matters are important. When I started to serve on the Committee I took the view, based on gut feeling similar to that felt by some of the professional engineers involved in the design of the bridge, that near the Severn bridge on the west coast where I come from is a very windy area. The east coast is not as windy. Therefore, the many hours during which one would expect to see traffic restricted or diverted from the Severn bridge would not occur on the east coast because the winds in London are not like those in south Wales. I took a macho view.

The Minister has said that the Severn bridge has been closed only three times in the past 21 years. He did not say that the closures were all in the last two years. We have a Select Committee but we do not want select evidence from the Minister. The evidence must be treated in more than one way, and not just in the way favourable to the Government's case. We have to look at it objectively, because, when the bridge is constructed, it will be in place for a long time.

The key evidence against the Government was presented by their own employee. He was their top expert not just on winds, but on their effects on structures, which is the key factor in Dr. Cook's expertise, which was never challenged by anybody on the promoters' — the Government's—side. It was to the effect that, because the Dartford crossing would be in a particular alignment across the Thames and high above the river, the wind impact on vehicles crossing it in the one-way mode, which would be the norm, would be virtually as great—well within the margin of error—as the wind impact on traffic on the Severn bridge. I am more familiar with that bridge as I use it once or twice a month. Our experience as laymen that the west coast is windier than the east coast is not necessarily relevant according to the Government's top wind expert, who was called by the petitioners and not by the promoters. That evidence was never challenged.

We come back to the fundamental point, that, if the Government want to make a success and build confidence in this design, build and finance form of privatisation that they are setting out to use for the motorway system, they have to show that they are not cutting corners in order to make it a financial success for the promoters but of doubtful benefit to road users.

Let us deal with road users. I speak frankly as someone from the Celtic fringe who, like my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) has no direct traffic constituency connection to the Dartford-Thurrock crossing. We simply have the ability to consider how important this bridge is relative to the roads and bridges in our areas.

It takes a bit of swallowing of pride to admit to the volume of traffic that will use this road, even though it is not technically classified as a motorway, so that motor bikes, learner drivers, and so on, will be able to use it. The evidence given to us shows that in terms of traffic volume it is about twice as important as the Severn bridge. It will carry a colossal volume of traffic. About 40 or 50 per cent. of traffic will be local, from Essex and Kent, and this is probably the most important short length of motorway anywhere in Britain.

When the Channel tunnel is opened in 1992-93 and when we have full and free trade under the single internal market regulations—assuming that they come about in 1992—there will be a colossal volume of strategically important traffic travelling from France, Spain and Germany, the Benelux countries, not just to Kent or Essex, but to the midlands and to the north. That traffic will cross that length of motorway over the Thames. Therefore, it is perhaps the single most important two or three miles in the British motorway system. It is vital that it should be right and that there should be no unnecessary restrictions.

In many ways it will be the road transport jugular vein of Britain. For that reason, if there are ways of making sure that the traffic flows smoothly, we must take them, even if that costs the concessionaires a little extra money or results in a delay in their getting their money back of from 14 to 20 years or conceivably a loss of risk capital. They are in the risk business and that is the risk that they have to take. I do not wish that on the concessionaires, but that is the type of business that they are in. They are not operating on a cost-plus basis. They entered into it on a partly risk-bearing basis and they knew that before the Select Committee stage.

It is totally wrong for us to say that they may bear some risks, but we must eliminate those risks if they involve additional costs that they do not like. The Government cannot say that if the concessionaires do not like it, they will put it right, but if the Select Committee does not like it, they will ignore it. That is the wrong attitude in terms of the public interest in traffic flow and the importance of the M25 Thames crossing to the road system of Britain starting in 1993.

The evidence from the Severn bridge is clear, but there will be problems on the M25 Thames crossing, with the weight of lorry traffic which is particularly susceptible to high winds and which will carry key items of export freight from Scotland, the north and the midlands to the continent. It is vital that the bridge is right. It should not be a skimped, second-rate, cut-price bridge in order to ensure that the design, build and finance contract gets off to a good start in the view of the concessionaires and not in the view of the users of the bridge.

Mr. Dover: I am the only hon. Member who was on the Select Committee and the Standing Committee. I am also a civil engineer, without any financial interest in a building or civil engineering firm, although until the end of 1986 I was Wimpey's parliamentary consultant in the House.

In his opening speech and in response to the Select Committee, the Minister spoke about the so-called independent report from a Danish engineer. I have that report, and I do not consider that it is independent. The Cleveland Bridge and Engineering Company Ltd. together with COWI Consult, a Danish engineering firm, made a bid for the third Bosphorus bridge in Turkey. I compliment Trafalgar House on its massive export orders around the world and on its superb first Bosphorus bridge. I regret that it did not build the second one, and I hope that it will land the contract for the third.

Those firms—Cleveland Bridge, part of Trafalgar House and the Dartford River Crossing Company—are in league with the Danish firm in putting in a very large tender for the third Bosphorus crossing. Dartford River Crossing Company briefed the engineers. The Government played no part in that, nor have their advisers, Maunsell and Kent and Essex county councils. They have since been asked to do nothing further and they have not been consulted since the end of the Select Committee's consideration.

There were only two days of briefing with Dartford River Crossing personnel. One of the items that Dartford River Crossing asked the experts to judge was "verification of Dr. Homburg's reputation as a major bridge designer."

It seems strange, at that late stage for the bridge promoter to wonder about the credentials of its own so-called world expert in design. Later in the report there are rather dubious comments about whether the Severn crossing model can be likened to any Dartford model. I understand from Maunsell that the geometry was very similar, but the Danish engineer dismissed any similarity between the two projects.

The Select Committee spent some time considering whether Dartford or Severn had wind-shielding problems. We have heard from the Minister that full wind-shielding is under consideration for the second Severn bridge crossing. Indeed, much of the evidence to the Select Committee made great play of the fact that there was no bridge in the world with full wind-shielding.

We have heard that argument tonight. It is not a real argument, because the Government are rightly considering it for the second Severn bridge crossing. Indeed, the bridge referred to in the report, the Little Belt bridge in Denmark designed by the Danish engineer without wind-shielding, now has wind-shielding around its towers.

Civil engineering is a progressive art and one learns by one's mistakes or one's lack of understanding and takes suitable measures. The report states that a plastic wind shield membrane would be unsuitable. If that is so, and if the expected life is 20 years or less, why has the Department of Transport agreed to have it on a bridge on the River Tees where there is to be 16,000 sq m of glass reinforced plastic fitted?

I applaud the Department's foresight in covering the structural members that are deteriorating, and making sure that no further deterioration takes place. The plastic fairing and membranes help enormously.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Is my hon. Friend asking us to compare weather-shielding with wind-shielding?

8.45 pm

Mr. Dover: I will be dealing with wind-shielding in a few moments. Perhaps weather-shielding was what the Minister had in mind at the Tees. I shall explain why I am talking about wind-shielding and the structural significance of the member itself.

The report made great play of the fact that plastic is not really a suitable member. That is wrong because it can have, and will have on the Tees, a life of 30 years, which is the maximum period that an agreement certificate requires of any member in maximum exposure conditions.

The report goes on to say that the plastic material will in some way have to integrate with the steel of the bridge and that the membrane could be in aluminium or stainless steel and has to follow all the movement of the bridge. That is not true. I have checked with Maunsell, which has a different opinion from Mott, Hay and Anderson. It has given its opinion of the report, which is generally available. It says that the paragraph referring to plastic materials and movement, or the joint structural behaviour of that with the steel of the bridge is "wholly and totally a wrong assessment."

[Mr. Dover]

The Select Committee heard a lot of evidence about the time delay.

Mr. Bottomley: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend, but it is rather important. Was he talking about the membrane or was he referring to the plastic members of the bridge as load carrying or as covering for weather protection for existing members of the bridge?

Mr. Dover: We are not talking about weather protection as on the Tees bridge. We are talking about wind-shielding, with the fairing membrane making sure that the wind does not impose too much wind load on the bridge but moves past it and that whatever wind pressure is put on the bridge is taken on the main structure which is able to resist it in a more effective way than if the fairing membrane was not there.

Mr. Bottomley: Then the Tees example is not an effective comparison.

Mr. Dover: I accept that, if the Minister is saying that it is purely weather protection.

Mr. Bottomley: It would be helpful to know what my hon. Friend is asserting, so that I can respond to him.

Mr. Dover: I mentioned the Tees bridge originally because there are assertions that the life of a plastic membrane, as there will be at Tees, is 20 years or less. The Minister will find that it will be 30 years or more at Tees and the Department of Transport would not have allowed weather-shielding to be a plastic membrane if they thought otherwise.

The Danish expert was told by Dartford River Crossing that the delay would be about 21 months. He immediately made the point in his report that a saving of five months could be made, bringing that delay down to some 16 months. I was reluctant and a little sad to hear tonight that the Government immediately put that up to 18 to 21 months, whereas Maunsell and their advisers Essex and Kent county councils reckoned on a delay of some six months.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): How can my hon. Friend convince the House that either Kent or Essex can make a better assessment of the likely delay involved in the redesign of the bridge than the company that has the contract? The opinion of those who will have to redesign the bridge — the work will be done in Darlington — is that it will take 15 to 21 months. How can Essex county council have a superior view?

Mr. Dover: If my hon. Friend studied the Select Committee proceedings, he would see that time was spent on analysing in great detail bar charts, some showing critical path networks through those programmes and Maunsell, Kent and Essex put their points of view, and the promoters of the bridge put their points of view. It was clear to the members of the Committee that there were time savings, and that speedier routes could be followed. The Danish expert said immediately that a saving of five months could be made, but the Government have said that they will forget that, and that they reckon that the delay will be 18 to 21 months. It is possible to redesign the bridge in terms of an overall trapezoidal box, as the report suggests, but the report is not truly independent. It would be possible to redesign it with minimum changes, perhaps adding one or two extra longitudinal members, and that was accepted in the Select Committee.

In the Government's response, and tonight, we have heard about an extra cost of £15 million to £18 million. It is odd that the Danish engineer was not asked to quantify the extra cost associated with the addition of wind-shielding. Tonight, for the first time, we have heard a cost-benefit analysis from the Government. We have had one from Maunsell saying that the cost-benefit is £20 million to £30 million, whereas the range of costs is £5 million to £15 million or £18 million. The users of the crossing will provide £16 million of net profit each year. If there is an override cost of £16 million or £18 million, that will be swallowed up by one years' extra toll income. There is a buffer period of five years' tolls at the end of the envisaged construction period for the facility.

The Select Committee heard that the Government's man in charge — the project director — used his sixth sense to judge that wind-shielding was not needed. We have heard that full wind-shielding is under consideration for the second Severn bridge, and I welcome that. We have read in the report from the Danish engineer that there is limited wind-shielding, as the Government intend, around the towers, and that will certainly stop the dramatic effect that drivers will feel as they pass those towers.

However, I wish the House to concentrate on the four lanes of traffic heading south at about 50 mph and slowing down towards the toll on the southern side of the bridge. Until they reach the crest, they will have been protected from the prevailing south-west wind, but when they hit the crest, they will hit that wind full on, because they will be dropping from a rising gradient to a falling gradient. The design gradients on the bridge are the maximum permitted for a 50 mph speed range.

In other words, there is a dramatic change and, along with that, a dramatic wind, but the Government are not having any wind-shielding at that point. My hon. Friend the Minister said that he will gladly carry the can, but I hope that he will think more carefully about the issue. It is a matter of the wind direction and the direction of the traffic. My hon. Friend mentioned the Orwell bridge, but there is already a solid barrier there which is some 1·2 m high and made of concrete. No wonder there has been no closure of that bridge through wind.

I say this with great regret, but I could not possibly support the amendment. The Select Committee thought carefully, and heard the evidence, but the Government have not gone out for independent advice to see whether one set of experts or the other is correct. All we have is the promoter seeking a further source of advice from a group with which he is already in league. I wish them all success in their third Bosphorus crossing tender.

I shall end by quoting from an article by the county engineers of Essex and Kent, areas in which half the drivers using the crossing will originate or have their destinations, so the views of these people are a vital consideration. They say:

> "The public at large must have complete confidence in this first privately financed design and build estuarial crossing . . . Traffic difficulties at Dartford in future due to wind conditions would neither be forgotten nor forgiven by the public we all serve."

I feel that the Government are making a mistake by turning down the recommendations of the Select Committee. Wind-shielding should be added to the bridge.

Mr. Janman: I welcome the Bill's quick return to the House and for the same reason as I welcomed its Second Reading. I also welcome the amendment deleting the unproven requirement for the wind-shielding. Although I withdrew it, I tabled a similar amendment in Committee. I support the Government, and not as a Government Back-Bench poodle, as was intimated by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks).

Mr. Dicks: I said that it sometimes seemed that way, although I could have been mistaken. I was not referring to the Bill that we are discussing, so my hon. Friend should put his quotation in context.

Mr. Janman: I stand as a Member whose constituency is immediately adjacent to the crossing and as somebody who is therefore extremely concerned whether the design of the bridge has been got right. With respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington, the number of drivers crossing the bridge daily who will emanate from my constituency will outnumber by a large factor the number of people crossing the bridge who will emanate from Hayes and Harlington. Therefore, I have a great interest in making sure that the Government get the design right. The team working on this project from DRCC and the Trafalgar House group was experienced and expert. The comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) about the worldwide experience of Trafalgar House in designing bridges shows that it is unlikely that a company of such prestige and professionalism would come to a conclusion that is faulty in the way that my hon. Friend suggested.

The second Severn crossing is only just being considered and no decision about wind-shielding on that crossing has yet been reached. It may be decided that it is not required even in that particular location, which is much more susceptible to wind than the Thames between Dartford and Thurrock. Until that decision is made, it is safe to say that there is no major estuarial crossing in the world with full wind-shielding. The only instance of full wind-shielding in Europe can be seen on the Europa bridge across the Still valley in Austria. That bridge is sited at an elevation of 2,500 ft and that is quite a different location from the Thames between the Essex and Kent plains in my constituency.

The petitioners have based much of their case for extra wind-shielding on experience with the Severn bridge. Some of the Severn bridge's problems are caused by wind, but many are caused by its design. It is far more susceptible to a variety of problems, some caused by wind, than almost any other bridge in the United Kingdom. Why did the petitioners not consider the Humber bridge, the Forth bridge or any other major bridge in the United Kingdom? Obviously, it was not in their interests to do so. I believe that Maunsell, which advised Essex and Kent county councils, has a patent on full wind-shielding. I will take that back if I am wrong. Of course, Maunsell therefore has an interest to ensure that the bridge has full wind-shielding.

Mr. Morgan: I want to explain that Maunsell has also been chosen by the Department of Transport to be the consultant engineers for the second Severn crossing.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Hon. Members on both sides of the House should realise that the geometry of Dartford differs from the proposed second Severn crossing and one cannot use one of those crossings as a surrogate for the other. It is also worth noting that, while the Department responsibly considers wind-shielding on the second Severn crossing, it would be ludicrous if it did not, for any good reason, aim to do the same for the Dartford crossing. The Department should be allowed some credit for being responsible for commissioning the work on the second Severn crossing.

Mr. Janman: The point that I am trying to make is that the firm of consulting engineers chosen by Essex and Kent has a vested interest in ensuring that full wind-shielding is installed on the bridge because it has a patent on a full wind-shielding design.

Let us consider the comparison that was made between the Dartford-Thurrock crossing and the Severn bridge. It has already been said that the Severn bridge has been closed completely only three times in its 21-year life. I believe that the laboratory where Dr. Cook worked produced projections before the Severn bridge was built about the number of hours of lane closures due to wind —although I must state that I do not know whether Dr. Cook was involved in those projections. I believe that I am right to state—no doubt my hon. Friend the Minister will correct me if I am wrong—that the projections were out by at least a factor of two. There have been fewer hours of lane closures on the Severn bridge than the laboratory to which hon. Members have referred projected.

The statistics show that there is an average of 168 hours per annum of lane closure on the existing Severn crossing. Some of the projections offered by the petitioners to the Select Committee on Transport estimated that the influence of wind at Dartford would be five times greater than actually occurs at the Severn bridge, when current British standards show that maximum gust wind speeds at Dartford are about 15 per cent. lower than on the Severn bridge. The petitioners used very low wind thresholds as the base for their predictions of wind effect at Dartford.

However, the number of hours when the wind exceeds specific thresholds was calculated by the Dartford River Crossing Company for both the Dartford and Severn bridges using Meteorological Office records corrected for bridge heights and locations. The records show that the "hours of wind"—that is, the number of hours when the wind would reach a gust speed that would cause lane closures—for Dartford are no more than 25 per cent. of the Severn bridge figures for the same threshold speeds.

Taking other special factors into account, such as the particular design of the bridge and the fact that the traffic flows only one way, everyone concerned with the project has concluded, quite rightly I believe, that the number of hours of lane closure on the Thurrock-Dartford crossing would be as few as 24 per annum. When my hon. Friend the Minister replies, I hope that he will clarify whether the figure of 24 hours does or does not include the effect of localised wind-shielding and whether, if it does not, the figure of 24 hours could be reduced even further with the addition of such localised wind-shielding.

Dr. Reid: The hon. Gentleman has made considerable play of the 24-hour figure about which, according to him, everyone involved in the project agrees. Given the discrepancy between 24 hours and 880 hours—the figure produced by the Government's top expert on the effect of wind on structures — will he name one expert who supports the 24-hour figure who has the same background, expertise and reputation as Dr. Cook? There is an awful discrepancy between 24 hours and 880 hours. If we are to judge fairly on this, will he name one expert whose reputation is as formidable as Dr. Cook's to back up his 24-hour figure, if possible without reference to any of his hon. Friends?

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It may be helpful to the House if I explain that we are not playing a game. We are considering a serious issue to which the Select Committee devoted nearly 21 days.

Mr. Morgan: Is that a point for the Government's side?

Mr. Bottomley: I hope that this is of assistance to the House. I open my mouth to make points not just for my side. It is fair to say that Dr. Cook presented data on wind speeds and occurrences. He did not get involved in the argument about whether wind shields were necessary.

Mr. Janman: It has also been accepted that at the east London river crossing, only eight miles up river and in similar territory, there will be 25 hours of lane closure per year. It strikes me that, there being only a difference of one hour between those two crossings, one could logically come to the conclusion that 24 hours of lane closure is correct. The Government, the Department of Transport, the consultants acting on behalf of the Government, the Dartford River Crossing Company and the Trafalgar House group, all of which have individuals whose judgment I respect and value, have come to the conclusion that there will be only 24 hours of lane closures per year at the new crossing as a result of the gust speeds that will operate in this geographic location and their effect on vehicles travelling across. It is interesting——

Mr. Robert Hughes: I should like to make one point to the hon. Gentleman. He has cast some doubt on the integrity of the firm of consultants that advised about wind-shielding on the ground that it is trying to sell its systems to Trafalgar House and therefore cannot be objective. The hon. Gentleman should have a care about casting doubt on people's reputations, especially as he appears to be quoting from a brief that he received from Thurrock borough council. It is the council that is making those allegations and it is opposed to the system. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will try to deal with the matter on its merits and not throw mud about.

Mr. Janman: With respect, I said that the company had a patent on the design. I did not at any time say that it was trying to sell it. I am not quoting from a brief provided by my local council, which I should remind the hon. Gentleman is a Labour-controlled local authority. If he is casting doubt on its integrity, perhaps the current political control has something to do with that.

It has been revealed in the debate that most of the wind-related incidents on the existing Severn bridge occur near the towers of the bridge. Therefore, it is important that there should be some form of wind-shielding at the towers. That is exactly what the localised wind-shielding will provide. In my view, it will cater adequately for any wind-shielding that is required.

We have to decide tonight whether it is worth the extra cost to the motorist and the extra delays. I do not think that it matters whether the delay is 15, 18 or 21 months; we are talking about a long delay in a project that is required urgently. As my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) pointed out, that sort of delay could jeopardise jobs in the north-east of England, which is where Opposition Members are always saying that we need more jobs.

For 24 hours of lane closure per year, of which, statistically, at least half will be at night when the real challenges of traffic control will not apply, are we prepared to have that long delay and jeopardise jobs in the north-east? Perhaps what has happened, to use a rugby analogy, is that the Select Committee has scored the first try, but I think that after reassessing the evidence, which the Government have done, we will see that the winning argument is that against wind-shielding, not the argument in favour.

I certainly welcome the Bill on Report and Third Reading and I welcome and support the amendment. My constituents are intimately involved in the bridge and are keen to see it built as soon as possible. They certainly do not want to drive across a bridge that is dangerous. They welcome the Government's reassessment and their conclusion.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I come as a non-member of the Select Committee to listen to the debate because it is important that we should keep an eye on these matters and not leave discussions to Committee Members.

I have heard the arguments and read some of the report, and I am alarmed to see that, in paragraph 6 of its report, the Select Committee stated:

"Over the course of 15 days, we heard a substantial amount of evidence on the desirability or otherwise of adding windshielding to the bridge."

The Committee's conclusions were made on an entirely objective basis with no party political involvement. That objective assessment of the evidence was made after long and boring proceedings, with counsel for both sides appearing to be paid by the hour and making every hour as lucrative as possible—that is the general reputation of such Committees—yet the Committee's conclusions were case aside so lightly by the Government

I also read the Government report, and I hope that the Minister will answer my questions. In paragraph 6 of its report the Select Committee stated:

"We acknowledge that a requirement to add windshielding to the design at this stage would cause some delay to and increase the cost of construction. We believe, however, that these disadvantages should be set against the significant reduction in the number of occasions when restrictions on vehicles using the bridge would have to be imposed owing to high winds. We concluded that the benefits to be gained from windshielding are sufficient to compensate for the delay and increased cost in building the bridge. We have agreed by a majority of five to one to amend the Bill accordingly."

That was a hefty majority of the Committee. The House will accept that the Committee was considering the matter objectively. People suspect that perhaps the Government have not been quite so objective. The Minister will be able to tell us whether, as a result of those published conclusions in the special report of the Select Committee, there have been any representations from Trafalgar House, any communications, meetings with civil servants or the Minister, exchanges of letters or protests from the concessionaires, who would not like to see the cost of bridge construction increased in that way.

Has there been any pressure, or has the Department taken an entirely objective position and decided that the additional cost is simply not worth the candle of the reduced number of potential closures on the bridge because of high winds?

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I remember one conversation with a senior member of the Dartford River Crossing Company. I suspect that there have been letters, and there have certainly been meetings, because we have put a substantial amount of pressure on DRCC to obtain the information on which we could make an objective judgment. I stand by the words in my opening speech.

Mr. Cryer: When a Minister tries to make an objective judgment on subjective information from people who are interested parties, it is a difficult process. I understand the Minister's problem, but, in Parliament, we have to consider the circumstances and decide whether they are satisfactory.

There are two sides to the matter. On the one hand, hon. Members who are not involved on a constituency basis and have no axe to grind have to go through a boring procedure because they are asked to do so and have to make the best of the circumstances. On the other hand, the Minister, cosseted by civil servants behind closed doors, receives evidence from people with a clear financial vested interest. The difficulties in making an objective decision are far greater for the Minister than for the Committee.

We set up these Committees to do a job in the public interest. The Committee may just as well not have sat, for all the value that the Government have placed on its deliberations. It is not just a case of the Labour Opposition saying that the Government are taking a ham-fisted approach, as there has been virulent criticism from a Conservative Member. This is an important matter. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) said — he is a Rugby Union enthusiast, with some justification to judge from recent events—the House will have to consider the issue. With a Government who have a majority of 100, the House has to reassess its position in regard to an elected dictatorship. If we have Select Committees spending hours examining evidence that is then discarded, the House will have to consider whether it is worth while pursuing such procedure for legislation such as this.

The inability of the Government and the concessionaires to present adequate evidence was all concealed behind a cloak of commerial confidentiality. That cloak is used far too frequently. Departments can shield pretty well what they want. By and large, it is not Ministers who classify documents, "Commercial in Confidence". The documents arrive on their desks stamped by a civil servant. Until we are clear about the relationship between Trafalgar House and the Civil Service, we are not clear about the influences that produce category.

9.15 pm

I do not accept the argument in the Government's resonse that there was sufficient justification on grounds of commercial confidentiality to inhibit them from presenting a full and comprehensive answer to the detailed questions which the Committee properly asked. In paragraph 17, the Government say:

> "The Government, as promoters of the Bill, assisted by the concessionaires, presented the case in the way they thought most helpful to the Committee."

That patently was not the case — the Committee complained. The Government are to have an inquiry. They say:

> "The Secretary of State has already begun an enquiry into the way in which the case was handled and will ensure that this enquiry includes consideration of ways in which difficulties might be avoided on any future occasion."

That is the sort of platitudinous nonsense that Governments turn out to suit any occasion. We shall get a platitudinous report in which the Government say that a little more information could have been presented a little earlier. The Secretary of State will look at it and it will gather dust until the next point of disagreement.

The Government are too closed a society. Government Departments use the excuse of secrecy to do what they like. It is simply not good enough to have such a response to people who were elected here to do a job which they do not much like doing but which they do with reasonable spirit. In a spirit of inquiry, they produced a report for public consumption. They were fobbed off with childish answers. It does the Minister and the Department no good at all to produce a response of such poor calibre.

The case that the Select Committee made has not yet been answered. I look forward to the Minister's winding-up speech. He has received strong criticism from both sides of the House and from members of the Committee. There is a strong case for retaining the Committee's recommendation. I hope that there is a vote on the Government amendment. In view of the Minister's comments, I suspect that the Government have kept sufficient Members here to see the amendment through. The matter will not be decided in quite as objective a way as has been suggested. It is lamentable that the Government's case has been put forward on such an ordinary level. They have produced no answers of any substance.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): We spent 21 days of our lives listening to evidence, much of it highly complex and technical. At times, indeed, it became positively surrealistic to listen to long and worthy arguments about vortex-shedding, flutter and all sorts of other strange things of which I have never heard in my life. My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr Chapman) was a delight as Chairman: indeed, it was his chairmanship that made some of the lengthier and more boring sections of the inquiry bearable.

It had its lighter moments, however. Mention has been made of the substantial fees paid to counsel on both sides. The House sat all through one Tuesday evening, and, when we assembled on Wednesday morning, we had to remind counsel that the day was still Tuesday, and that Tuesday's refresher would have to do for Wednesday as well. There were one or two unhappy faces on the other side of the table! However, it has to be said that those moments were brief and all too infrequent.

The sitting became a battle of wits between the rapier cross-examination of the petitioners' counsel, Mr. Conrad Dehn, and the somewhat more pedestrian efforts of the Government's counsel and between the articulate and highly credible evidence of the petitioners' principal witness, Mr. Churchman, and some of the more halting contributions on behalf of the Government and the concessionaires.

Ultimately, it came down to whether we accepted the petitioners' contention that restrictions would have to be put on the bridge for, variously, 500 or 800 hours a year.

[Mr. James Couchman]

In their rebuttal of the Select Committee's evidence, the Government have produced in appendix A facts and figures which I wish to goodness we had had when the Committee sat. If I had been able to see that the Severn bridge had been closed only three times in its 20-year history, that the average for lane closures between 1984 and 1986 was only 168 hours a year and that restrictions on wind-susceptible vehicles were only 60 hours a year, it would have been easier to cut through the enormous verbiage to which we were subjected.

I am also taken with the Government's instance of the Mar Dyke, on the crossing approaches of the M25, just north of the Dartford-Thurrock crossing. There, we are told, the forecast suggests that gusts of 50 mph, the conventionally accepted threshold for consideration of the closure of a bridge to wind-susceptible vehicles, occur for just 11 hours a year. We are told that, using the same forecasting methods — the petitioners' own wind forecasting method, I believe, was used—the projection for Dartford bridge is some 37 hours a year. I use the name of Dartford bridge in the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Janman), who has other ideas about its naming. If the Mar Dyke viaduct offers such projections to a bridge just south of it, we have listened to an awful lot of words based on information produced by one side and not rebutted by the other.

I regret that the Government have had to rely for their rebuttal largely on the evidence produced by Aksel Frandsen, the distinguished Danish engineer from COWI Consult. I regret most the fact that this rebuttal has been produced with new evidence after the Select Committee and the Standing Committee finished their proceedings, so this evidence cannot be tested by cross-examination by the Committee or by the counsel who represented the petitioners and the Government. I find Mr. Aksel Frandsen's evidence persuasive, but that is likely to happen, because I was the one—as opposed to the five —who did not find the petitioners' case to have been made.

I sat through many hours in Committee. I represent a Kent constituency and my natural feeling would have been to support the petition submitted by my county and Essex, but I did not find the case to have been made. I was especially concerned by the threat of delays that would result from redesign work and the possible rehybridisation of the Bill. That becomes a real prospect if one reads carefully the evidence of Mr. Frandsen and of the Government.

It is clear—I think that this was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover)—that the gradients of the bridge are the maximum that can be permitted in these circumstances. If those gradients were to be retained and the bridge had to be completely redesigned to a trapezoidal box system, as opposed to an orthotropic steel deck, the toll booths at the southern end would have to be moved. That would involve more land and other people whose interests might be hurt by the Bill. That would clearly involve rehybridisation and the reselection of the Select Committee. I hope to have a good alibi so that I am not recommissioned to sit on the Select Committee, because 21 days was long enough.

I am content that the Government seek by way of this amendment to take wind-shielding out of the Bill. I am less content with the inelegant way in which it has had to be done. I am certain that, had the Government and the concessionaires presented a better case in Select Committee, we would not have come to the conclusions that we did. I think especially of Mr. Frandsen's evidence. Whether it is compromised by the fact that COWI Consult worked with Trafalgar House is by the by. That evidence would have been persuasive and we would not have found the petitioners' case to be made.

I shall support the Government. I dare say that other members of the Select Committee from both sides of the House will feel that, in the interests of consistency, they should vote against the amendment. We shall find out in the Lobbies who will prevail.

Mr. Fallon: I shall be brief, because the House wants to come to a decision. I begin by declaring an interest—not a financial interest, company involvement or an interest as a fan of any of the various sets of civil engineers mentioned during the debate, but a constituency interest. Much of the fabrication involved in the bridge will be carried out in Darlington. We look forward to some 350 man years of work in Darlington, involving some 20,000 tonnes of steel fabrication. That work will be done in Darlington and the steel will be produced either in the north-east or in Scotland. I should have liked to hear at least some recognition of the employment effects of the contract from hon. Members who have sought to impose the wind shield and the delay that is consequent upon it.

The rest of the country has an interest in the bridge. It is not simply a matter for Kent or Essex. Some areas of high unemployment will be involved in its construction. Regions north of Essex are looking forward to faster and more efficient links with the south and Europe.

I make that point because 1,000 men in Darlington are on short-time working. They are now facing a four-day week. The Select Committee has been making leisurely progress—it sat for three days a week as the lawyers sought to debate for hour after hour—and 1,000 of my constituents have been forced on to a four-day week while waiting for this project, which has been substantially delayed by the Select Committee's slow progress.

I want to be fair to the Select Committee, because I understand the problems involved. I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) that I served on a Select Committee in the last Parliament that sat for twice as long as this one—the Select Committee on the Channel Tunnel Bill. I understand the burden that is imposed on hon. Members.

Nevertheless, it is right to point out that today's debate illustrates perfectly the impossible task that the Select Committee had. It is not the function of a Select Committee to design a bridge; we do not ask a Select Committee to do that. Nor can we ask a Select Committee to redesign a bridge on the basis of petitions and evidence from civil engineers and construction experts.

I suspect that it was because of the over-generosity of my hon. Friend for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) and the Committee in accepting the locus of the petitioners that it put itself in this impossible position. I think that that was a serious error of judgment.

The entire debate has been about an important issue of public policy — exactly how the bridge should be constructed, what the various delays involved are and how the traffic can be dealt with if the delays materialise. That point is not just a matter for the petitioners of Kent and Essex. It is a matter of public policy. It was wrong for the Select Committee to take it on board. It should have been left to a Standing Committee to consider, along with the other issues of public policy that could have been brought before it.

Mr. Chapman: In fairness to the Select Committee, it should be said that in examining whether the petitioners had a locus we had to look at whether their interests would have been affected. Rightly or wrongly — perhaps my hon Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) thinks wrongly — we said that they did have an interest because of the consequences for their roads on both sides of the River Thames if the bridge was closed.

9.30 pm

Mr. Fallon: I accept that point, and I have read the proceedings of the Committee. I notice that the Select Committee was divided and that it voted on whether a locus had been established. I believe that the Select Committee was wrong. Of course a council on either side of the river might have an interest in whether traffic would be redirected, but that interest is not necessarily any greater than that of Durham county council, Darlington borough council, the rest of our road network from which much of the traffic might originate or those district or county councils to which the traffic might be directed. The Select Committee confused a particular interest with a wider general public interest that Kent and Essex have, but which they share with other local authorities throughout the country.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the hon. Gentleman concede that, if the Select Committee had not accepted the locus and had generated, albeit over a lengthy period, such an intense and interesting debate about wind-shielding, the Government would not have introduced partial wind-shielding? The Committee has done a service because apparently the bridge is now even better, although it is not entirely what the petitioners and some hon. Members wanted. Improvement has been effected because of the Select Committee's work. I tell the hon. Gentleman — I hope without being patronising — that that never would have arisen if the matter had been dealt with solely by a Standing Committee.

Mr. Fallon: I certainly accept that the Select Committee has done a service to the House in ensuring that the issue has been properly debated. Equally, the matter could have been before a Standing Committee. I am seeking to establish that the Select Committee put itself in an impossible position. It came to a divided conclusion.

Mr. Dicks: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Fallon: No, I shall not give way.

The Committee was divided in its conclusion on whether shielding was necessary. It voted on the issue. It is inevitable that one side of the Committee will be satisfied and that the other will be dissatisfied about whatever steps the Government take to deal with the matter. It is unfair to the House and wrong to expect a Select Committee to deal with the matter in that way.

The way in which the Committee considered the matter has lengthened the amount of time involved. The project has been considerably delayed. I hope that it will not be delayed much longer. It is instructive to note that a bridge was first considered by the House in 1930, when the tunnel was first planned. That was 58 years ago.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: This has been a curious debate, for at least one reason. The only voices that have been raised in aid of the Government, other than that of the Minister — I say this kindly to the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) — have been those of hon. Members who have a vested interest in the project or in the Government. I shall pass over the hon. Gentleman's PPS-ships.

Mr. Couchman: I devoted 21 days of my life to listening to the evidence, and I found the petitioners' case wanting. I have been consistent in finding that case wanting tonight. I shall certainly support the Government on that basis, not because I am a junior member of the most junior rung of the Government.

Mr. Lloyd: I accept the hon. Gentleman's juniority. It is well-deserved. I do not wish to engage in a personalised debate.

The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) made it clear that he spoke for what he perceived to be the interests of his constituents, as indeed did the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Janman).

Those hon. Members who have come disinterested to the Chamber have spoken powerfully against the amendment and in favour of the status quo. It is rather curious and instructive to note the way in which, in his latter remarks, the hon. Member for Darlington managed to confuse the House and himself. He said that somehow it was heinous that the Select Committee should divide five to one, and that somehow that meant that there was a rift. The hon. Gentleman prefers the ministerial steamroller — the absolute certainty of the Minister telling him exactly how to behave — to the idea that we in a democratic society and in a democratic Parliament should have differences of opinion on matters that everyone concedes are of great complication. The Select Committee procedure allows it to examine in detail, over a considerable period, the arguments that were put forward, and to have a difference of opinion. Even within that difference of opinion, the way in which it voted on a cross-party basis was overwhelming.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) said, had it not been for the Select Committee, the concept of partial wind-shielding would not have arisen. The Minister indicated his assent to that earlier, and no doubt he will confirm it later. But the progress of the Bill through the House reflects no credit on the promoters or on the Department.

The Select Committee produced two volumes of detailed argument and evidence. I have not had the opportunity — hon. Members would not have expected it — to replicate all the deliberations of the Committee. The Minister has admitted that he has not had the direct experience of the members of the Select Committee. Like mine, his experience is second-hand. Yet the Government have produced a document which supposedly refutes the technical arguments that were made before the Select Committee.

The document contains information that was not made available to members of the Select Committee, and its production at this late stage is inadequate. It is not good enough that the Select Committee did not have information on wind speeds in other areas. It is not good enough that the Committee did not hear that evidence put to the test under cross-examination, as happened with all the other evidence that it heard. It is not good enough that the Government had already made up their mind to oppose the Select Committee examining wind-shielding.

This evening, we have heard arguments about whether that examination was right or wrong. It is worth quoting from the minutes of evidence on page 853. On Thursday 15 December, the Chairman said:

"The Government challenged the right of the Petitioners to be heard on the subjects of windshielding and the toll regime. Concerning the latter, the Government contended that the Petitioners had no locus standi on this issue and also that any alteration to the proposed regime would be contrary to the principle of the Bill. We decided that the County Councils did not have a locus standi on this issue, so the Petitioners were not allowed to produce evidence on it."

But the Committee accepted that the two county councils had an interest in wind-shielding, and the ensuing prolonged debate has been of great importance to the House. There was no debate on the issue on Second Reading, because the evidence was not available at the time. But once the petitioners started to make their case to the Select Committee, it became obvious that powerful arguments had to be considered — powerful arguments that the Government wanted to sweep under the table.

The Minister should respond to that point because the Government, through their representatives, opposed the idea that wind-shielding should be discussed. Had it not been discussed, we should not have achieved what everyone accepts is the improvement of partial wind-shielding. That is a black mark on the Government's record and handling of the matter.

In Standing Committee, the Opposition made it clear that there was little point in pursuing the argument because we had received no new evidence from the Government. They had already made it clear that they intended to table an amendment on Report. But we did not know on what information the Government would base the amendment. We now have that evidence and the opportunity of this narrow debate, but we could have debated the matter more fully in Standing Committee had the information been available.

The Government made some play of the amount of time that the Bill has taken, but no one can argue that the two or three weeks that have elapsed between the proceedings in Standing Committee and now will greatly affect the role of the bridge in the traffic management of the south-east and the nation generally.

Dr. Reid: In response to what was said earlier by the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon), does my hon. Friend accept that my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) and I have male unemployment in our constituencies well in excess of that in Darlington? Is he aware that both of us have a steel interest and that, however remote, our subjective interest would be to push the Bill through as soon as possible? Do not those two facts make our case even stronger because, despite them, we feel that in the public interest there should be some delay and that wind-shielding should be added?

9.45 pm

Mr. Lloyd: I accept my hon. Friend's point. Despite what I said earlier about the hon. Member for Gillingham, all members of the Select Committee began and ended with clean hands. We were all disinterested and the process was conducted in the interests of general public and parliamentary scrutiny of an important Bill. As my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North said, we want to see another crossing at this part of the Thames. It is important that it should be built.

But it is not right for Parliament to allow a crossing on any terms and conditions, or to accept whatever scheme is proposed by promoters in any circumstances simply because of delays of weeks or even months. There is an argument between the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) and the Minister about the nature of the delays. Even if they are as long as 18 months, it is not right for us to accept a second-rate bridge or an unacceptable bridge simply because we all accept the ultimate importance of another crossing at this point.

It is remarkable to have a procedure involving hon. Members, only at the end of it to reject everything that they do. That is what the Government have done, and no one should have any illusions about it. The Government have not taken on board the evidence that came before us or our recommendations; they have rejected them completely. There has been a partial attempt through limited wind-shielding to allay public fears, and that at least is a partial triumph for the Select Committee, but clearly, from the recommendations, that is not what it wanted. Nor is it what the public needs. There are real doubts and anxieties about wind-shielding. The Government should not casually dismiss the Select Committee process.

Hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber want this bridge. We are not divided along party political lines. Every hon. Member knows that the Government will have their payroll vote steamroller this Bill through, partly because the concept of design, build and finance projects is ideologically important to them. They want to make this first one a success. We are not here to debate that and I shall not detain the House, except to say that the Government's desire to make a success of the first of these new bridge-building projects is not an adequate reason to steamroller the procedures of the House and the work done by hon. Members on both sides where no party political division exists. The Chamber will become divided if the Government say that we must take evidence on trust and unexamined when the alternative evidence was examined thoroughly and carefully.

I cannot understand why the Minister should expect me to trust him as an individual. Ultimately, he is present as the arbiter of the experts that he marshals. He is here to convince the House that his expert's evidence has greater validity than that of the experts who paraded before the Select Committee. I do not say this unkindly, but I can have no greater confidence in his ability to represent his experts than I have in the five members of the Select Committee who listened with great attention hour after hour, day after day.

That is what divides the House. It is an issue of confidence in the procedure which has arrived at the decision to get rid of the full wind-shielding on the bridge, and whether it has adequately examined the facts. We say that it has not. The procedure that produced the report that recommended wind-shielding was as thorough as could take place under the parliamentary process. Because that procedure has been followed and the recommendation was overwhelmingly in favour of wind-shielding, I ask my hon. Friends to resist the amendment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The

"majority recommendation by the parliamentary select committee on the Dartford-Thurrock Crossing Bill to introduce wind shielding raises important questions of a constitutional philosophical and technical nature. First, the constitutional issue.

A hybrid Bill procedure was adopted for the privately financed bridge because it offers a much shorter preconstruction period than the conventional and somewhat discredited public inquiry route, and gives a chance of opening the structure early in the 1990s.

But if the hybrid route is to be more than just a rubber stamp, then Parliament's scrutiny must be thorough and its views influential. It is no good the promoter bleating that the alterations required by the select committee add costs and delays, or that such changes are tantamount to breaking faith with the agreement or changing the rules part way through. Just as with the 19th century railway Bills, the promoter must convince Parliament of its case, and must run the risk of failing. Privately financed construction should operate that way or not at all.

The second question concerns the nature of the project. Any Government interested in the efficient movement of people and freight has to be concerned about the vulnerability of a particular link to bad weather, while a private promoter might simply be interested in the effect any closure would have on commercial viability. Their conclusions need not be the same. The Select Committee on the Dartford crossing is correct to scrutinise this issue in the public interest.

The third and crucial question is whether the recommendation is right. Were the bridge an isolated crossing with no other routes nearby (such as at Severn) the answer might well be yes. But with the tunnel alternatives so close, it is hard to see how the committee can justify the extra cost and delay. On these grounds, the Government may be justified in overruling the committee.

Both private finance and the hybrid Bill have much to offer in construction, but only where the promoter shoulders risk and where the Parliamentary procedure has teeth. If they are to succeed, promoters must become more forthcoming and persuasive than at the Dartford hearings, and select committees need to be more technically literate, perhaps by employing advisors, so that they can judge better conflicting technical advice."

Those words come from the New Civil Engineer editorial after the Committee had reported, and I believe that the House thinks that they are all right.

There is the issue that Parliament cannot allow the Government to take it for granted, especially when a Select Committee has served as long and hard as did this one. The editorial went on to say that the Select Committee's recommendation was not necessarily right. When I was watching the Select Committee from afar, it was interesting to note that the technical press showed no interest. The issue was considered for seven weeks, yet the New Civil Engineer did not report it each week, the Institution of Civil Engineers did not organise seminars in the middle of it, and the construction journals showed no interest in it, and that was a sign to me that the issue did not grip the whole of the consulting world as it obviously did the counsel for the petitioners and promoters and members of the Select Committee. Having read, day by day the transcript—

Dr. Reid: Of Private Eye.

Mr. Bottomley: It is not too clear who the private eye was on that occasion.

Spokesmen on the Opposition Front Bench raised several issues. I do not accept all their strictures, and I suggest that they, the members of the Select Committee and other hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) have confidence in the way in which I normally approach issues. I am not regarded in the Department or in Parliament as the sort of person who accepts a brief and reads it out. That is not my way of approaching things, and I should be sorry if people thought it was. The hon. Member for Bradford, South——

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Minister has raised an important point. This is not a matter of personalities. There is no question of the Minister's competence or character here. As the Minister has said, he did not have the opportunity to go through the same long process as the members of the Select Committee. That makes an important difference.

Mr. Bottomley: I honestly wish that I had appeared before the Select Committee, because if I had it might have been possible to move slightly away from the manner in which the Select Committee procedure has to work under present rules. Under those rules, the petitioners put their case, and the promoters' case is not described in the way that it is described in annex A, which describes the straight factual side of the relationship between wind exceeds and restrictions on the flow of traffic.

Three major issues were put to the Select Committee. The first was what sort of wind there would be. The second question was what effect it would have on restrictions on traffic. The third question—in effect the trial within the trial, which is where commercial confidentiality comes in—was whether it was possible to add 3 m high wind-shielding to the existing design. Commercial confidentiality was not the issue at the base of the hours of wind. That was a separate issue.

It is worth saying that Dr. Cook is a recognised expert, and nothing that I have said was designed to undermine that in any way. It was his work that described the hours of exceedence as being plus or minus 40 per cent. Obviously, there is no doubt about the integrity of the proposed bridge, where Dr. Cook's work leads to a confidence factor of plus or minus 5 per cent. That is far more useful than plus or minus 40 per cent., which gives a wide range.

The issue of commercial confidentiality exercised the Committee to some extent and in some strength, but dealt with the subsidiary issue whether it was possible to adapt the existing bridge design and put 3 m high wind-shielding on it. It is quite clear from my experience around the world, and from research that has been carried out, that there is no bridge with a 3 m high wind shield across an estuary. The closest was the Europa bridge in Austria which had to contend with the föhn wind, which could sweep up suddenly at 80 miles an hour.

I spent a fair amount of time looking at Japanese road reports. Japan has a 21-mile stretch of road that goes over bridges that do not have wind-shielding. I have here the annual report on roads from the Japan Roads Association. In it there is a picture of the Seiun bridge on the metropolitan expressway. There is one cable-stayed expressway. The Seiun bridge is a different type of bridge, with no wind shields. If wind shields were in any sense common and appeared on, for example, 10 per cent. of the bridges currently under construction, there would be more of a basis for saying that the Department is wrong.

Mr. Morgan: Does the Minister accept that the same principle would have applied to the Severn bridge in 1966? That was the world's first box girder bridge. The Minister is saying that nothing must ever be done for the first time.

Mr. Bottomley: No, I spend most of my time arguing the opposite; arguing against the historic negative that one cannot do something in a new way because it has never been done that way before. I am not arguing in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggests. The addition of limited wind-shielding is acceptable.

In that context, I should like to pick up some of the points made in the debate. Without the persistent concern of Essex and Kent county councils, I do not think that the partial wind-shielding would have been brought forward in the first place. It was not suddenly produced as a pre-emptive measure three days before the Select Committee started its proceedings. Obviously, work needs to be done to test whether partial wind-shielding would have a good effect and whether the bridge could stand it. One needs to take those issues in the round rather than try to divide people into camps or try to mislead the Select Committee or decide to what extent one side of the argument may have exaggerated or gone up to a 40 per cent. tolerance one way or the other.

The speech of the hon. Member for Bradford, South showed that interest in this subject is not confined to those who served on the Select Committee. I sometimes wonder, when the hon. Gentleman starts shouting and accusing people of being childish, whether he is moving away from the substance of the debate and on to other approaches to politics.

The hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) spoke about the hybrid Bill procedures. The House is considering opposed private Bills. Hybrid Bills are slightly separate. Perhaps the usual channels will consider what has been said tonight and whether an improvement can be made to the hybrid Bill procedure.

Mr. Robert Hughes: I am grateful to the Minister for those remarks. It has been argued that, because the hybrid Bill procedure produces quicker results in planning terms than the formal planning procedures, of necessity it can never be challenged because it might cause delay in the initial programme.

The other difficulty is that, when we debate such matters, inevitably partisan terms are used. When we are putting a non-party point, I object to hon. Members saying across the Floor of the House that while in previous years I have argued for more jobs, because I wish these issues to be properly and thoroughly discussed I am in favour of losing jobs. That partisan element makes it difficult, under the present procedure, to speak objectively.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Motion relating to the Dartford-Thurrock Crossing Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. MacLean.]

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman has made his point and I shall not dissent from most of what he said.

The interest in the Bill seems to be growing in the House. Hon. Members from Essex and Kent who have been present throughout the debate have shown a clear interest, as the traffic starts in those counties. One can understand the interest of my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn). I am sure that he would have spoken had he not been a member of the Goverament.

I pay tribute to the Father of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine). The hon. Member for Aberdeen, North accepted that wind-shielding would need to be redesigned. Although he would not claim to be an expert in bridge design or redesign, his conclusion would be accepted by most people. I know that the Select Committee spent much time considering that point, but with the extra evidence that the Government have made available, it would be common sense to accept that conclusion. Bridges across the Thames are not designed and redesigned in Committee. They need to be designed in such a way that the promoters and the concessionaires have confidence in them and can demonstrate that confidence to reasonable, objective people such as myself.

I have had to consider what is right. Although delay can matter, the key issues are whether the bridge will last and whether it will be safe. Clearly, it will last, and the Government consider that it will be safe. Obviously, different points of view have been expressed during the debate. There was a reference to cutting corners. We do not intend to cut corners. We want a bridge that will work.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) who chaired the Select Committee, carefully pointed out the issues with which the Select Committee was concerned and explained the Select Committee's conclusions about the evidence that was put forward. His speech stands by itself and needs no comments from me. I emphasise that he dealt with the cost and the delay. He also spoke about the technical advisers to the Committee. Having read the way in which the case was put, I reckon that the best move would be for counsel's fees to decline daily, as the Select Committee proceeded, and for hon. Members' attendance allowances to increase daily.

My hon. Friends the Members for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) and for Thurrock (Mr. Janman) put their cases very well, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon). I shall not summarise the arguments put forward in favour of the Government's conclusion, which I do not deny was the same as that with which they started. However, we have ended up with rather better evidence for our view. I hope that I have put it rather better, or at least more briefly than it was put during the Select Committee hearings.

I must say to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) that I did not hide the decision that the Government had taken in Standing Committee. The Government had not taken a decision in Standing Committee. Indeed, my opening speech led my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) to believe that the Government would accept full wind-shielding. It was only on my second attempt at explaining the Government's considerations that it became apparent that if the Government's further research confirmed that full wind-shielding was not necessary, the Government would come forward, in the open, on the Floor of the House, to ask the House to make a decision. It would have been wrong in Standing Committee, even if all the further work had been completed, to take out the amendment, or propose to take it out, when more than half the members of the Select Committee were not on the Committee. It is far better to do it openly if we decide to do that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley rehearsed some of the arguments about plastic covering that were put to the Select Committee. It is unnecessary for me to repeat those arguments. The conclusions reached by the independent engineer, at least independent of the DRCC and the Government, had given some weight to the views on the cost and the delay, and annex A helps to deal with the inter-relationship between the hours of wind-exceedence and the effect on traffic.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr.Dicks) made a robust speech. I am happy for him to pat me on the back, but some of the transfer of the approach suitable for a politician to a public official is wrong. I spend a lot of time with officials in the Department of Transport. They occasionally make mistakes, and I more frequently make mistakes, but together we serve the community well, and the same thing would apply if the Labour party were in government.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman would not be a Minister.

Mr. Bottomley: I am sorry to hear that. I thought that I would be a fixture, like a Speaker.

I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington that the Department had the benefit of expert advice on all aspects of the scheme through its consultant engineers for the project, Mott, Hay and Anderson. The contractors responsible for the construction of the bridge, the Cementation Construction Company and Cleveland Bridge and Engineering, have worldwide experience in major construction projects. They are advised by Sir William Halcrow and Partners Ltd. The bridge is designed by Dr. Engineer Helmut Homburg, who has contributed to the development of the cable staybridge type, and has been responsible for the design of a number of cable staybridges, including the Kessoch bridge in Scotland.

When my hon. Friend left his usual high standards was when he started to make jokes about people's names. I am exposed to that kind of joke rather often, and addressed to a fellow member of the European Community it does not go down too well.

Mr. Hicks: My hon. Friend should be careful about this point. When criticising the civil servant whom he so rightly defended, I was only using criticism that is already clearly in the minutes of the Select Committee.

Mr. Bottomley: I had not got on to dealing with what my hon. Friend said about an individually named civil servant. I was dealing with who was advising the Department and who was advising the concessionaires ad the people who designed the bridge. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that.

Mr. Selby, the project manager, reports to his director, who is an expert bridge engineer. Mr. Selby has served the Department well for 19 years, and I and the Department have every confidence in him, and I shall return to defend him if he is further attacked about the design of bridges. Bridge design concerns bridge designers, and they were reasonably well represented in the Select Committee.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Minister said that it was always the Government's intention to listen carefully to the evidence. In that case, will he comment on the report in the Financial Times on 15 December last year, long before the Standing Committee sat, which said:

"Parliament and politics: Bridge wind shield plan faces block. The Government is prepared, if necessary, to override any proposal by the cross-party Select Committee on the Dartford-Thurrock crossing that the planned bridge over the Thames should have a special wind shield."

It seems pretty clear that the Government leaks had made it well known to the press that they were going to block the wind shield proposal whatever happened.

Mr. Bottomley: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman understands a word that he has read out. If I were the one who was recommending the decision to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I did not take that decision until after the further work and at the conclusion of the Standing Committee, any leak must have come from a very ropey old bucket.

The hon. Members for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) and for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) put forward arguments. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West said that we needed to show more respect for the Select Committee's conclusions. We have shown that respect in our response, I have shown it in my speech and it is shown in the further work that was commissioned. Design, finance and building contracts can work only if the design is safe. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I am convinced that if the Government were to design, finance and build the bridge we would reach the same conclusion as we are recommending to the House tonight. I recommend that the House accepts the amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Litter Campaign

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

10.21 pm

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): I do not intend to delay the House unduly, but I should like to raise a matter that has been raised on many occasions — the problem of litter, including litter disposal and litter as a public nuisance. Sir Rupert Speir, who represented the constituency of Hexham, was successful with the private Member's Bill on this subject. Regrettably, the provisions of his Litter Act 1958 have not been implemented and are not being implemented today. We are all aware that the Prime Minister is deeply concerned about this matter and, on two occasions in recent months, she has made the problem of tackling the nation's litter a main issue, but so far without success.

We can undoubtedly claim to be the dirtiest country in Europe. That is not much to brag about. We must recognise that litter is a national problem. Litter is basically rubbish. If people thought about litter as rubbish, they would put it in a bin or in a proper place, but they put rubbish in the wrong place and it becomes litter. Litter is a problem to every authority in the United Kingdom and it causes them great concern, as they must deal with it.

I refer the Minister to a recent study by the industry council for the packaging industry. In a series of surveys over the past years, it has concluded that the public are showing more awareness of the scale of the problem than they did five years ago. The public are becoming more aware of the worsening situation, but, regrettably, they frequently display their indifference.

As we well know, local authority staffing levels have been cut. As fewer resources are available, there are fewer people and machines to tackle the problem.

However much local authorities do, the root of the problem is the attitude of the public. Although the public show some concern about the matter, we must recognise that there is massive indifference. We have all met people from time to time who moan about litter and who are ashamed of the filth in their area, but they do not do much about it. They do not seem to protest to councillors or form action groups or write to the local papers. They just sit back in the squalor that surrounds them.

Fortunately, I represent a part of north Tyneside, which I share with the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter). We have a success story to tell. In north Tyneside, the problem has been tackled vigorously by the council. It has given responsibility to the environmental committee and the parks and recreation committee, the chairmen and officers of which have played an important role in keeping the standards in Tyne and Wear exceptionally high.

On my visit to the north-east last weekend, I could not help but notice how clean the streets were. It was a Saturday afternoon when people were shopping and the streets had been in use most of the day, but they were spotless. I was proud of Tyne and Wear, particularly north Tyneside. I was proud to see such an area, which has got rid of its dereliction problems and some of its environmental problems through the decline of coal, shipbuilding and steel. The worst aspects of those industrial eyesores have disappeared and people are tackling improvements to their environment with renewed vigour.

I should like the Minister to go to north Tyneside in a few weeks' time, where he will see a massive spring floral display which equals, if not surpasses, anything to be found in the rest of the country. It is being done by local effort and must be seen to be believed. It is really beautiful.

The council has won quite a few national competitions which have been sponsored by various organisations. Representatives of the staff on the council have come to the Palace of Westminster to receive awards and a residents' association received an award last year.

We want other parts of the United Kingdom to try to follow our example. I should like the Prime Minister to come to Tyneside, especially north Tyneside, to see what can be done. If it can maintain high standards, why cannot the capital city? It must be an amazing experience for foreigners who visit London for the first time to arrive at Heathrow or Gatwick airport, for example, which are spotless, or to arrive at one of our mainline stations where the concourses are kept at a high level of cleanliness due to the efforts of British Rail and then step outside to see litter on every street, every corner and on railway embankments, and apathy about it all. I am appalled at the filth to be found in some parts of London. We can think of areas where valiant efforts have been made, but I regret to say that other areas are a sad story.

I live in north London when Parliament is in session. Anyone who goes down Camden high street or Kentish Town road tonight will see filth and plastic bags piled up by the side of the road. Some bags are split and when the city goes to sleep, cats, rats and dogs will scratch them open, thus creating all the ingredients of a disease which could strike London.

I cannot understand why allegedly responsible people, instead of keeping the plastic bags on their premises until collection, leave them out. I dare say that the same thing can be seen within 200 yd of this building. It must be caused by a breakdown in communications between the local authorities and the public or by plain ignorance on the part of the public. I fail to see why local authorities, encouraged by the Government, do not take a more positive line and explain to people the hazards that they are creating, irrespective of the fact that the poor council refuse collectors must sweep up the mess. I should like the Minister to urge councils to educate people to keep litter indoors until the time of collection.

We have all seen the trails of litter from the entrances of the schools in our areas to the local shops where the school children buy their lunchtime trash—school meals having virtually been abolished—and, coming back after their lunch break, leave another trail of litter. Their parents would not let those children do that in their own houses. Why do they throw litter away instead of keeping it until they go home, or back to school, where they can put it into refuse bins?

The teaching profession has opted out of part of the responsibility. Teachers do not educate children and enforce standards on them. Children should be responsible for their personal litter; they should put it in their pockets or in the school litter bins. Perhaps the problem is part of the general epidemic of indifference that has struck the nation—indifference, in this case, to our surroundings.

Do people who have shops, commercial businesses or even blocks of flats have any responsibility for keeping the pavements and gutters in front of their premises in a tidy condition? If they have no legal responsibility, is it not time that we thought about the matter?

Let me return to the plight that faces our capital. I am fortunate enough to be a member of the Council of Europe, and to see quite a few of the European capitals. I blush with shame when I compare London with the cleanliness of Paris. I note one significant difference. Paris uses water to clean the streets, with hydrants connected to hoses. The rubbish is swilled down the streets to a collecting point. It is a clean and efficient method which saves labour, and also helps to remove any refuse left by dogs. I cannot understand why, when we are so close to a river the size of the Thames, water cannot be harnessed to clean our streets as it is in Paris and other cities.

We must think hard about finding solutions to the problem. In many areas, there is a lack of civic pride. That pride has been dented for a variety of reasons. At one time, people were proud of their cities, towns and villages. Now there is an indifference which I find rather sad, having spent many years on a local authority.

There is also a lack of national pride. We are indifferent to graffiti and litter. We must restore to people's minds the idea of improving their surrounds and conditions. We might give traffic wardens the power to impose on-the-spot fines on litterers. They could combine the jobs of traffic warden and litter warden.

There is no doubt that attitudes must be changed. If there is a return to civic pride, there will be a sense of cleanliness as a nation and then there will be a better response, for example, in tourism. The tourists will return and notice with pride that London has something going for it—that it is smartening itself up and cleaning itself up. If London sets an example, the rest of the country will follow suit. North Tyneside has set the example. I ask the Minister to give an assurance that the matter will be given immediate and urgent study.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Christopher Chope): It is some time since the House had an opportunity to debate a topic—litter—which affects us all, whether we live in cities, small towns, villages or the countryside. I congratulate the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) on his choice of subject.

We all recognise how unsightly and offensive litter is and how it makes our surroundings less pleasant and, in some cases, even dangerous. Apart from the obvious impact that litter has on our environment, it also costs every one of us money, with public resources having to be expended on clearing up the mess. What makes this situation so appalling is that litter is unnecessary. It does not occur naturally; we create it ourselves through thoughtless actions and careless habits. With consideration and care, it could be avoided.

The Government certainly share the widespread public concern about this issue—a concern which is reflected in my Department's postbag. Quite apart from the natural repugnance all of us feel about living in an untidy environment, it is unpleasant to learn of comments made by visitors from overseas, and by those returning from overseas, which contrast the state of our streets and countryside with those of other countries. The hon. Member for Wallsend referred to such comments. Although I cannot accept that Britain is the dirtiest country in Europe, I agree that we should be the cleanest, and that is the Government's objective.

[Mr. Christopher Chope]

The problem is not one that the Government alone can solve. The role of the Government in relation to the litter problem is twofold: first, to ensure that the right legislative framework exists to tackle the problem—I think that we have achieved this—and, secondly, to create a climate of opinion in which to foster a change of public attitudes. The question we must ask is: why do people who are clean and tidy in their home become insensitive and inconsiderate in public places? Perhaps it is a feeling that it is someone else's job to clear up the mess—a feeling that "they", whether Government, local authorities, British Rail or whoever, should do something about it.

The ultimate remedy lies in the hands of each individual member of the public—use litter bins, or take rubbish home. In short, do not create litter. That is easy to say but less easy to bring into effect. There are two essential approaches: one via legal constraints, the other via persuasion and education.

Under the Litter Act 1983, it is an offence to drop litter in the open air—with a penalty of a fine up to a maximum of £400. There are about 1,600 prosecutions a year. We have tightened up the law to make enforcement more effective by making it an offence for a suspected litterer not to give his name and address to a police officer on demand. Nevertheless, given the very great pressures on the police, there are problems with enforcement.

For this reason, we are particularly interested in the progress, and, if it is enacted, the eventual operation of the Westminster City Bill, which contains a power to introduce fixed penalties for litter. The city council proposes to use its 50-strong multi-purpose inspectorate to help enforce the measure, under which offenders will be asked to pick up the litter they have dropped. Any who refuse to do so will be issued with a fixed penalty ticket, to be paid within 14 days. The Government have given this Bill a fair wind and, if it is enacted, we shall monitor its operation closely with the council. If it is successful, it may prove to be a suitable model for wider application.

In addition, there are various powers that local authorities, in their capacity as litter authorities, can use if they wish. This is important since, although the problem is often described as a national one, it does vary from locality to locality. Thus, local authorities may, if they decide to give the matter appropriate priority, appoint litter wardens for their areas. A number have already done so.

Mr. Garrett: Will litter wardens have the same powers as traffic wardens? Will they have the power to impose on-the-spot fines?

Mr. Chope: No. We have considered the use of traffic wardens to enforce the Litter Act 1983, but the traffic warden service is already hard-pressed nationally to cope with its existing responsibilities to support police efforts to enforce road traffic laws. There is strong pressure for better enforcement of parking restrictions to reduce accidents and to keep traffic moving. It would not be sensible to add to that burden.

On-the-spot fines are often mooted as a simple and effective way of enforcing litter legislation. However, there would be major difficulties—for example, accounting for cash collected; the risk to the police or anyone else carrying substantial amounts of cash; and dealing with offenders who do not have funds available on ths spot. For those reasons we have rejected those ideas. As I said, Westminster city council is seeking to obtain legislative approval for a new approach.

I should like to think that a significant role will also be played by competition for street cleansing when the Local Government Bill becomes an Act. One of the first effects of competition will be to make local authorities set out very clearly what work they want to be done in this service, as in the other services concerned. Clarity of purpose can have nothing but beneficial effects on results achieved.

The second main effect will be to increase the efficiency with which the work is carried out. Perhaps, with more money available as a result of such efficiency gains, the authorities with the worst litter problems will then be able to step up the standard of litter cleaning.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the London borough of Camden. As he will probably know, it is one of the highest spending councils in the country. Despite its high levels of expenditure, it does not seem to be able to cope with the problem of litter, which I am sure most of its residents would regard as a high priority. It is a question not of councils not having the money but of them not giving sufficient priority to resolving the litter problem and not running their refuse collection and street cleansing services as efficiently as many of them could.

The need for voluntary local efforts brings me to the second prong of our approach to the problem. The Government have, for a number of years, supported the Tidy Britain Group, a registered charity formed under the original name of Keep Britain Tidy. In the current year, the group is receiving a grant of £570,000 from the national taxpayer towards its objective of promoting the prevention and control of litter. The group also obtains sponsorship from private sources, and it organises competitions, such as the "Beautiful Britain in Bloom" competition, which is financed by Barratts and the Kentucky Fried Chicken awards and trophies.

As the hon. Gentleman has said, North Tyneside metropolitan borough council has been particularly successful in this competition. The council has reached the finals of the Kentucky Fried Chicken competition every year since its inception, and it won it in 1978, 1983 and 1986. I am pleased to add my congratulations on such efforts. I am sure that many members of the Government, given the opportunity, would be happy to visit North Tyneside and see what gives it such an advantage in those competitions.

The main activities of the Tidy Britain Group are concentrated in two main sectors. First, it has devised a comprehensive litter abatement programme — the community environment programme—which is focused on district and borough councils and trains local authority officers in techniques of litter abatement, by enlisting public support, working with local industry and commerce and with voluntary organisations. I understand that 113 local authorities have so far formally adopted the programme, that 19 are considering its adoption and that nine have partially adopted it. We give every encouragement to local authorities to take up the group's community environment programme. It is inevitable that the results of this approach will take time to come through, but we are encouraged by the results so far.

The second aspect of the group's activity concentrates on education. As part of its education programme, the group has produced a range of learning kits for use in schools, and a youth action pact for youth group activities.

They have proved particularly valuable. They have the twofold benefit of obtaining practical results for today as well as offering a sound investment for society for the future. In addition — I think that it can rightly be considered as part of the educational effort—the group and my Department have co-operated to make a number of short promotional films that we hope the television companies will pick up and use to encourage a more responsible attitude towards litter prevention.

I do not underestimate the role of members of the teaching profession. I am not sure that all schools adopt the attitude of the one at the end of my garden. On a summer's day, after the children have spent a morning in the playground, the head teacher goes out to the playground and says, "Before you go back into school, you must clear up all the litter in the playground." Many of the playgrounds of the schools that I have seen are filled with litter. That is not setting the right example for children at an impressionable age.

The Tidy Britain Group has, at our request, reviewed its strategy and approach, and we are considering with it how to achieve greater effectiveness.

Local authorities clearly have a major part to play, and I hope that others will adopt the same approach as North Tyneside, to which I have already referred. The priority and resources that authorities choose to devote to litter abatement and clearance are for them to decide, but I should like to encourage them to work with the Tidy Britain Group, local businesses and local voluntary groups to tackle the local problems and to promote civic pride.

Business interests can play a major role. For example, the growth of the fast food industry has brought its own litter problems. Customers are not always as responsible in disposing of food and drink containers as we would wish. The Take-Away Food Federation (UK) Ltd. is therefore to be congratulated on the production of a booklet entitled "Less Litter, Better Business", giving guidance to proprietors of such establishments about the proper disposal of the potential litter that they create.

Drawn up in conjunction with the Tidy Britain Group, the booklet covers such matters as the provision of posters and signs in the premises carrying the anti-litter message, and the provision of litter bins and litter patrols by staff. Adoption of such measures by more proprietors, along with the Tidy Britain Group message on containers, will add to the efforts to educate the public about litter.

A great deal has been and is being done to deal with this unpleasant and unnecessary problem. We, and all sectors of society, must continue to seek ways to strengthen and reinforce our efforts. The Tidy Britain Group has been invited to take a fresh look at its activities and to show how a new impetus can be achieved. We are always ready to receive ideas and suggestions on how the problems can best be tackled.

The hon. Member for Wallsend, in initiating this debate this evening, has made a valuable contribution towards increasing public understanding and awareness. He made it apparent that it is basically a matter of common sense, and there has not been sufficient common sense applied to it by enough people.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at thirteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

Staff Dispersal

1. Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all current plans for relocation (a) within Greater London and (b) elsewhere of units of his Department.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): It is not possible to provide the detailed information sought by the hon. Member without a disproportionate amount of work. However, I can inform the House that the number of civilian staff in London has reduced by over 10,000—that is 35 per cent.—since 1979. Moreover, we continue to pursue every opportunity to relocate defence work from London when justified in both operational and economic terms.

Mr. Galbraith: The Minister said that the number of jobs in London had been reduced, but does he agree that the number of jobs in other areas of the country has also been reduced? At the previous Defence Question Time the Minister said that only 2·2 per cent. of jobs were located in the north and that that figure had not changed for some time. Therefore, will he take definite steps to relocate jobs in the north and abandon any plans for further office accommodation in London—for example, at Thames House, which does nothing for jobs, but simply helps property speculators in London?

Mr. Sainsbury: I remind the hon. Gentleman that after the Hardman report in 1973, the Labour Government between 1974 and 1979 achieved absolutely no dispersal to Scotland. This Government have a far superior record.

Dr. Hampson: Does my hon. Friend accept that this is not just a matter of the relocation of units of the Department, but is a matter of general spending policy? Is there not a gross disparity in spending between south and north, and will my hon. Friend institute some means of scrutinising the bids from the service chiefs with a view to dispersing them elsewhere in the country?

Mr. Sainsbury: My hon. Friend is aware that there are very good operational reasons for the concentration of defence establishments in the south. However, whereas we have reduced the number of defence posts in London and the south-east by 35 per cent. since 1979 in our search for greater efficiency, the reduction in the number of posts in the northern region over the same period was only 23 per cent.

Mr. Sean Hughes: Will the Minister tell the House why it is necessary for the Ministry to take offices at Thames House? Can he not accept that if his Department located in the north, it would not only save the taxpayer money, but would provide jobs in areas that badly need them?

Mr. Sainsbury: I assure the House that there are no plans to centralise in Thames House, Millbank part of the MOD headquarters staff at present located in London. As I hope the hon. Gentleman is aware, accommodation for London-based headquarters staff is a matter for the Property Services Agency.

Mr. Dykes: As we are talking about buildings as well as jobs, will my hon. Friend say when the Ministry intends to relinquish its buildings in the Stanmore area—both the Royal Air Force and other MOD buildings? In due course that accommodation will be available for pressing housing requirements.

Mr. Sainsbury: That matter is under active review.

Mr. Cartwright: Can the Minister say when he will decide about the future location of the directorate-general of quality assurance? Is he aware that the uncertainty has continued for years and is now starting to affect morale? When he makes a decision, will he bear in mind the contribution of the people of Woolwich to that military establishment and many others, for generations?

Mr. Sainsbury: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's interest in this matter and I recognise that Woolwich has a long association with the Ministry of Defence. The issues involved in the location of the quality assurance office are complex, and further study is needed before we can reach a decision. However, I hope that it will not be too long before we can give further information.

HMS Conqueror (Log Book)

2. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set up a further inquiry into the disappearance of the log book from HMS Conqueror, in the light of recent allegations that the log book was deliberately destroyed.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Ian Stewart: As I have already explained in correspondence with the hon. Member, the official concerned categorically denies the allegations. The fact is that he was not, in 1982, nor has he ever been, in a post which would have given him access to naval log books. On that basis, no case has been made out for reopening the inquiry.

Mr. Williams: Is it not the case that the commander of the Conqueror reacted with incredulity to the order to torpedo the Belgrano, that that order had to be repeated three times over six hours and that the messages between Northwood and the Conqueror would have been recorded verbatim in the log book, and that is why the Government ordered its incineration?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to understand what control room log books are about. They are about technical matters, such as the course, depth and speed of a submarine at a particular time.

Mr. Dickens: Does the Minister agree that the sinking of the Belgrano was operationally correct and necessary, and that the Argentines have agreed that, placed in similar circumstances, they would have done exactly the same? Why do the Opposition persist in trying to discredit the Royal Navy, when they should be proud of it?

Mr. Stewart: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right, but one does not have to be a Member of the House for very long to know that most of the Opposition's ideas about defence are wonky.

Mr. Dalyell: What on earth could have prompted the former Secretary of State for Defence, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), to opine that he wanted "to make sure that there was not a Watergate round here"?

Who could he have had in mind for the role of Richard Nixon?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman can speculate on all sorts of things, but I cannot follow him on that.

Trident

3. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the implications for the safety of the Trident missile programme of the recent test firing of a Trident 2 missile at Cape Canaveral.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Younger): The latest test flight of a Trident D5 missile on 21 January revealed a deficiency in the design of one of the missile sub-systems. One of the objectives of project development programmes is to expose any design deficiencies. There have already been eight successful Trident II firings and, overall, the development test programme has been highly successful.

Mrs. Mahon: Is not the truth that the testing was a miserable failure, with the missile exploding after two minutes 43 seconds? Does that not prove that the people who target the missiles are in more danger than those targeted, and would not the money be better spent on the National Health Service and on housing?

Mr. Younger: The objective of such tests is to discover whether the missile systems are working properly, and, as the test clearly demonstrated that this particular missile was not working properly, the test can be said to have been a 100 per cent. success. The hon. Lady might agree on reflection that it is no use having the most perfect health service in the world if one cannot defend the country in which that health service exists.

Sir Antony Buck: Does my right hon. Friend agree that he and the Government are going for the D5 for precisely the same reasons as the Opposition went for updating our deterrent by going for Chevaline without telling anybody?

Mr. Younger: Yes, my hon. and learned Friend is correct. The Opposition updated the Polaris system because they, too, wished it to be effective when they were in office. The sad thing is that they have abandoned responsibility now that they are out of office.

Mr. O'Neill: Does the Minister agree that this is now the second or third hold-up in the project and that the expenditure of £500 million on the latest enhancement programme for Polaris suggests that we are miles behind schedule, contrary to all the undertakings given during the general election?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman is utterly wrong. There is no hold-up in the Trident system, which is absolutely up to time. [Interruption.] Yes, it is absolutely up to time, including the warheads, which are being made in Britain. In fact, the manufacture of the warheads was started last month.

Mr. Morgan: In Cardiff, not in Aldermaston.

Mr. Younger: No, in Aldermaston. The tests are designed to make sure that the system is working properly, and the test series has been the most successful of any missile system yet.

Nuclear Weapons

4. Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to the number and nature of nuclear weapons accidents or systems malfunctions.

Mr. Ian Stewart: There has never been an accident involving damage to, or release of radioactivity from, a nuclear weapon in the United Kingdom. Nor has there been any malfunction of systems associated with such a weapon which could have posed a hazard to service men or to members of the public.

Mrs. Wise: Has the Minister seen the "Handbook of Nuclear Weapons Accidents" published by Bradford university? Has he noticed that the handbook lists some horrendous near misses, such as missiles virtually launching themselves because of computer error, or weapons exploding and only by luck not detonating the nuclear warheads? Does the Minister not agree that, in the words of the former United States Admiral Eugene Carroll, our nuclear weapons are just a trigger to commit suicide? Would we not be better off without them?

Mr. Stewart: I am aware of the latest in the series of publications by the Bradford school of so-called peace studies, but, as usual with its publications, this one contains a large number of false assumptions. Not surprisingly, its conclusions are equally astray.

Mr. Squire: Has my hon. Friend seen the profusion of questions on the Order Paper from the Labour party on nuclear weapons? Does he consider reports that the Labour party may be moving towards an acceptance of nuclear weapons as an essential part of our——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister cannot answer for reports about the Labour party.

Mr. Squire rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman made rather a duff start.

Mr. Cryer: Can the Minister confirm that there was an accident in Lakenheath in 1956 in which an American plane carrying nuclear weapons crashed on the aerodrome and was allowed to burn out, including its crew, because the danger of radioactive leaks from the nuclear weapons was so horrendous, and that it came within a hair's breadth of causing a major nuclear explosion at that time?

If that is true, why does the Minister not come clean about these nuclear weapons of which he is so proud—these instruments of mass extermination—and accept that they are dangerous to the people of this country?

Mr. Stewart: The assurances that I gave the House in response the original question cover the incident that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned, and all other such incidents.

We maintain stringent standards of safety with nuclear weapons, and it is worth remembering that the nuclear deterrent has achieved a longer period of peace and stability in the world than we have enjoyed for many centuries.

Nuclear Strategy

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received from the West German Government regarding nuclear strategy.

Mr. Younger: None, Sir.

Ms. Short: Is it not true that Germany is anxious to negotiate away battlefield nuclear weapons, because the Germans are very worried that a nuclear war might be fought on their soil? Instead of welcoming reductions in nuclear thresholds in East and West, the British Government are leading the pack in demanding rearmament in Europe to make up for the INF cuts. I understand that the decisions are to be made in May by NATO Defence Ministers in Denmark. Can the House have an undertaking that we will discuss the matter before those serious decisions are made?

Mr. Younger: The German Government entirely support the nuclear strategy of the NATO Alliance, of which they are prominent members. The Alliance will be discussing the next stages in the process of nuclear disarmament in the next two months. It will, I think, agree that the priorities for the next stage should be a worldwide ban on chemical weapons, and a start on reducing conventional weapons.

As the hon. Lady must surely admit, there is now no doubt that the attitude of the present Government, who have been leading the pack towards reductions in nuclear weapons, has been overwhelmingly successful.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the leaders of West Germany realise that the Trident programme is the guarantee of their freedom and ours, and that if we were to abandon the nuclear deterrent we should be faced by the vast superiority of the Warsaw pact countries in conventional and chemical weapons? Will he promise to listen not to the harridans of Greenham Common, but to the common sense of the British people?

Mr. Younger: I agree with my hon. Friend. I have no doubt that the German Government and people will understand that their safety and security depend on the nuclear strategy of NATO.

Ms. Ruddock: I am sure that the Secretary of State is as aware as I am that the Soviets have an overwhelming superiority over the West in short-range nuclear weapons. Is it not a fact that the British Government are opposed to a negotiation between NATO and the USSR because it is most likely that Mr. Gorbachev would agree to removing all those short-range nuclear weapons, despite the fact that the Soviet Union has a great excess, and that the British Government are terrified of the denuclearisation fo Europe, which is what the people of Europe want?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Lady ignores the fact that this Government have been leading the search for fewer nuclear weapons and are the first Government ever to have achieved a reduction in nuclear weapons.

Germany would agree with us that the priorities are as I have set out. We are saying, not that other forms of nuclear weapons should not be negotiated away, but that the priority, for our safety, is chemical weapons and the conventional imbalance. The hon. Lady should come to terms with the fact that the solution that she supports has failed dismally.

Mr. Summerson: Does my right hon. Friend agree that if there is a war on West German soil the aggressor is hardly likely to be either NATO or the West German Government?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The question of conventional weapons must address the fact that the Warsaw pact forces are arraigned in an offensive posture and it is that which we must negotiate away as soon as we can.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I am sure the Secretary of State is aware that there is consensus in the Federal Republic, between Right and Left, that there should be parallel talks on the reduction and elimination of battlefield nuclear weapons, and on conventional arms reductions. If the talks on conventional reductions prosper, the talks on battlefield nuclear weapons can prosper. However, if they do not, there will not be any progress in the talks on battlefield nuclear weapons. Why are the Government so opposed to such a reasonable suggestion? What are they afraid of?

Mr. Younger: The right hon. Gentleman is putting words in the mouths of the Germans, who fully support NATO's nuclear strategy, which depends upon a flexible response being available in any possible nuclear attack. The NATO Alliance as a whole, including Germany, will have to make up its mind whether it agrees with the priorities that I have set out as the British Government's view. It will do that in the next few months.

Mr. Wallace: Last week the Prime Minister commented on the need to modernise nuclear weapons. That could have implications for the Federal Republic. Has the Prime Minister discussed that view with any representative of the German Government? Have any decisions yet been taken on modernising a British tactical nuclear weapon, or is that decision to await the decision of the NATO nuclear planning group?

Mr. Younger: No decisions of that kind have been taken. This matter predates the INF agreement. It is necessary that we keep our existing weapons systems up to date. Nobody can keep weapons systems without keeping them up to date. That is what the Montebello discussions were all about, and we shall have to reconsider that in the future to make sure that we never have outdated weapons.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: When responding to the Opposition, who use the West Germans to support their unilateralist cause, will my right hon. Friend remind the House of West Germany's record and of the fact that it was the West German Government and leaders who appealed to NATO to bring in the dual-track policy that brought about the installation of cruise weapons in the first place?

Mr. Younger: Yes. Opposition Members are being most unfair to West Germany, which is a strong advocate of NATO's strategy. I remind Opposition Members that all the NATO allies, without exception, support NATO's strategy of nuclear deterrence. Only the British Labour party is out of step in this matter.

Tucano Aircraft

7. Mr. Ted Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the introduction of Short's Tucano into RAF service.

9. Mr. Haynes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the introduction of Short's Tucano into Royal Air Force service.

Mr. Sainsbury: The release-to-service trials programme is continuing at the Aeroplane and Armament Experimental Establishment, Boscombe Down, and should be completed within the next few months.

Mr. Garrett: Is the Minister still convinced that the design and engine power of these aircraft will be suitable and that when they are introduced at squadron level they will not prove expensive to maintain, and possibly, be failures? Is he really satisfied that there are not problems, other than armament problems, with these aircraft?

Mr. Sainsbury: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we still consider that the Tucano will meet the RAF's training needs satisfactorily. Therefore, there are obviously no plans to review our decision to purchase that plane. Nor do we expect it to be unduly expensive to operate.

Mr. Haynes: Can the Minister remember coming to the House and telling us that this aircraft was the bee's knees and that it was the aircraft that we needed to train our RAF personnel? Will he now stand at the Dispatch Box and say that that statement was a failure? You know, Mr. Speaker, some of the Ministers in this Administration are useless. If the Minister was a councillor and had wasted ratepayer's money in the way that he has wasted taxpayers' money, he would be disqualified.

Mr. Sainsbury: My memory does not go back quite as far as the hon. Gentleman's. I do not recall being at the Dispatch Box and using such an eloquent phrase as the "bee's knees". I assure the hon. Gentleman and the House that we have every confidence in the aeroplane. There is no cost penalty for the Ministry of Defence because of any delay, as there is a fixed-price contract and the aircraft are paid for when they are delivered.

Mr. Colvin: Will my hon. Friend confirm that because it is a fixed-price contract—130 aircraft for £125 million—the lateness in the delivery of the initial aircraft will not add one penny to the overall cost, and may even help his cash flow? It will not have any effect on the completion of the delivery.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am glad to confirm what my hon. Friend said. The late delivery does not add one penny to the overall cost. Throughout the delivery period we hope that there will be an acceleration that will enable us to catch up on some of the original delays.

Mr. Sayeed: How is the reciprocal trade agreement on Short's Tucano going?

Mr. Sainsbury: My hon. Friend may know that there is no offset arrangement with Brazil for the Tucano because some 90 per cent. of the value of the airframe is represented by work to be carried out in the United Kingdom, mainly by Short's. We have an offset agreement with the engine manufacturer, Garrett, and that is bringing significant benefits to United Kingdom industry.

Mr. Rogers: Why will the Minister not come clean and lay the facts before the House? The two Tucano prototypes that have been delivered and are undergoing tests have only flown for three quarters of an hour — [Interruption.] That information was given to me in answer to a written question in mid-January. Those prototypes have flown for only three quarters of an hour. At this time the RAF should have at least 24 such aircraft in service. I wonder whether the Minister is now considering hiring some PC9s from the Saudi Air Force, which has had its aircraft delivered, in quantity, already?

Will the Minister also come clean and tell the House that there is a cost to this country as a result of the late delivery of Tucanos? The price of the aircraft may stay the same, but there is a cost of at least £10 million every six months to keep the Jet Provosts flying.

Mr. Sainsbury: If the Jet Provost were not flying we should be flying the Tucano instead—there would be no cost in that. The hon. Gentleman has got those figures wrong, as he has the others. I hope, he will appreciate that the RAF has, correctly, extremely high standards, especially for training aircraft. There have been delays to ensure that those standards are satisfied. So far, the five production aircraft have achieved a total of 180 flying hours.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Tucano, with its new upgraded engine, the strengthened wing spar against bird strikes and improved undercarriage, is a different aeroplane from the Tucano that was first looked at? When the new Tucano comes into service it will be capable of doing exactly what the RAF requires.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am glad to confirm what my hon. Friend says. The RAF has every confidence that the Tucano will meet requirements and specifications.

Rev. Martyn Smyth: Will the Minister confirm that not only has Short's an excellent reputation for a sturdy plane, but that, time and again, the world has turned to Short's to satisfy its needs, as the Queen's prize for exports has testified year after year?

Mr. Sainsbury: The hon. Gentleman will know that Short's has a long and proud history of providing defence equipment, and I hope that it will continue to maintain that record.

Jet Provost Aircraft

8. Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current cost of maintaining the Jet Provost planes in operation.

Mr. Ian Stewart: About £65,000 per aircraft per year.

Mr. O'Brien: Is not the Minister's reply shameful, given that our pilots are training in antique planes, when the Minister promised the House that the Tucano aircraft would be in operation by this time? The Government have failed the country yet again on this issue. Is the Minister not ashamed to come to the Dispatch Box and say that the new planes are not being introduced and are costing the taxpayer a great deal of money? As my hon. Friend said, if the Minister had been a councillor and shown the same attitude, he would have been disqualified from holding office.

Mr. Stewart: I am sorry that both the hon. Gentleman and I have had part of the ground cut away from under our feet by the answers to the previous question. I repeat what my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement said. There is no extra cost to the Ministry of Defence budget through running on the Jet Provosts because, in the meantime, the Ministry of Defence does not have to find the up-front money for the Tucano. The Jet Provost is more expensive to run than the Tucano and it consumes more fuel, but, until such time as the Ministry of Defence has to pay for the Tucanos, the net effect of this is not to add any extra cost to the Ministry of Defence budget.

Mr. Bellingham: Will the Minister consider carefully the regulations governing the use of aircraft as demonstrators? Is he aware that yesterday a con man, purporting to represent the Sultan of Brunei, persuaded the Royal Air Force to fly up to Norwich airport a BA146 of the Queen's Flight for a full demonstration, involving a free flight and a full briefing of all the sensitive equipment in the aircraft? Will he tell the House why the RAF did not check that person's credentials? Does he agree that a full explanation is required?

Mr. Stewart: I agree with my hon. Friend that a full explanation is required, and I understand that the person concerned is helping the police with their inquiries.

Mr. Ron Brown: Given the Minister's statement, is it not also opportune to pay compensation to Sergeant Jarvey of the King's Own Scottish Borderers, who is linked with that project, and therefore compensate him in a small way for all the stupidity and nonsense that we heard from the brass hats in Berlin about his alleged misconduct? Is it not time that something was done to make amends to Sergeant Jarvey? Does the Minister remember the case?

Mr. Stewart: I do not know whether the person concerned was flying a Jet Provost at the time, but I find it difficult to relate the hon. Gentleman's remarks to what we have been discussing.

West German Defence Minister

11. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met his West German counterpart; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Younger: I last met Dr. Woerner on 20 January, when we discussed matters of mutual interest.

Mr. Coombs: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it is both his view and that of Chancellor Kohl, as set out in a speech in Munich on 2 February, that, until further progress has been made on the reduction in conventional forces and the elimination of chemical weapons, the denuclearisation of Europe is not an option? Will he also confirm that, in the meantime, the upgrading and modernisation of nuclear and short-term weapons, which have not been included in the INF agreement, are vital to European security?

Mr. Younger: I understand that, as my hon. Friend says, those are roughly the views of Chancellor Kohl and of the West German Government. Certainly, all the NATO allies are agreed that our weapons systems must be kept up to date.

Mr. Conway: When my right hon. Friend met his counterpart, did he have an opportunity to express the value that we attach to the kindness and hospitality of the West German people when our troops are on exercises in West Germany fulfilling their NATO function? Will there be more exchanges of home-based forces, particularly territorial forces, with the British Army of the Rhine, to take part in mutual exercises?

Mr. Younger: Dr. Woerner and I have discussed these matters on many occasions. I have no doubt that he and the German Government are extremely grateful for the presence of British forces in Germany. We are grateful for the training facilities with which they are able to help us.

Mr. McFall: When the right hon. Gentleman meets his West German counterpart, will he discuss with him the incident at Faslane on HMS Resolution on 26 January in my constituency, which was described by the Ministry of Defence as a minor electrical malfunction? The Ministry of Defence did not give a sufficiently robust rebuttal of what happened, so my constituents——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is difficult to relate this to the question.

Mr. McFall: It is related because of the interest of the European Community in the incident. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot hear whether the question is relevant or not.

Mr. McFall: Many European reporters contacted me about the matter.

Will the Secretary of State ensure that if there is no substance to the reports, the Ministry of Defence will deny them robustly and communicate that to the local community so that unfounded fears can be laid to rest?

Mr. Younger: I do not think that it will be necessary for me to raise this with Dr. Woerner, because I would only have to tell him that there was a small electrical malfunction. At no point was there any danger to anyone on board or in the neighbourhood. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will be glad to retail that in full detail to his constituents, who have nothing to fear.

Mr. Jack: Did my right hon. Friend discuss the European fighter aircraft with Dr. Woerner? If so, what did he say?

Mr. Younger: Yes, my hon. Friend has guessed correctly. We discussed the European fighter aircraft and Dr. Woerner expressed himself and his Government as being determined to press on with it and—I agreed with him about this—to try to reduce its price. I am glad to say that good progress has been made and I hope that the partners will be able to get together before long to agree the next stage.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The Secretary of State has still not given the House a rational explanation of why the Government are so opposed to parallel talks on conventional arms reductions and battlefield nuclear weapons. As we have constantly been told that NATO must have battlefield weapons because of the large concentrations of Soviet armour, and as conventional talks will be about reducing those, why not have parallel talks on battlefield nuclear weapons, especially as the Soviet Union and the Warsaw pact have some superiority in nuclear artillery and a large superiority in short-range nuclear missiles?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, who has made my point for me. If what he said meant anything, it meant that it would be infinitely wiser to go for conventional reductions first to establish whether the tank concentrations that he talked about can be reduced.

Mr. Brazier: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, were there to be significant reductions in conventional Soviet forces, and were they to be pulled back behind the Urals, because of the much greater reinforcement distances across the Atlantic for American reinforcements there would still be the potential for an imbalance to reassert itself quickly? That is why it will always be essential that we have battlefield nuclear weapons.

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is right. The whole reinforcement capability will have to be taken into account in the conventional talks. The House should be in no doubt, and should not forget, that we are having this discussion in the context of the first major progress in arms reduction, which was a product of the policy that the Government have been following.

Nuclear Strategy

12. Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received from the French Government regarding nuclear strategy.

13. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received from the French Government regarding nuclear strategy.

Mr. Younger: We maintain a fruitful dialogue with the French Government on a wide range of defence matters of mutual interest, including nuclear matters.

Mr. Redmond: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain the Government's attitude to the fact that, because the Franco-German defence council and brigade remain outside of NATO, and because of the Prime Minister's total reliance on the USA, there is a danger of a serious military split occurring?

Mr. Younger: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman need fear such a split. We take the view that the Franco-German brigade is a welcome development, especially as none of the troops for it will be taken from troops that are already committed to NATO. It is therefore a bilateral development outwith NATO, which can only help the strength of the West.

Mr. Campbell: What is the Government's attitude to the new Franco-German defence council and brigade outside NATO?—[Interruption.] Given the fact that the Prime Minister is wholly relying on the United States, will there not be a military split?

Mr. Younger: With respect to the hon. Member, I think that that is the question asked by the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond), which I answered a moment ago.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the robust, independent pro-nuclear policy of the former Socialist Government and Socialist President of West Germany has much to commend it to the Labour party?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is correct. I only wish that the previous Socialist Governments of West Germany could give a teach-in to the Labour party about sensible defence policies.

Mr. William Powell: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the most helpful developments in European policy and strategy is the increasing willingness of France to engage in manoeuvres with her allies in NATO? Will my right hon. Friend do all that he can to ensure that France carries out manoeuvres, not only with West Germany, but with ourselves?

Mr. Younger: I very much welcome the extremely good defence relationship that we have with France at present. It is helpful not only in joint manoeuvres—which are developing quite satisfactorily—but in joint procurement policies, which also have great promise for the future.

Mr. O'Neill: Further to that point, does the Secretary of State agree that it is about time that the French paid their full dues to Europe and became, once again, full members of NATO and stopped trying to have their cake and eat it?

Mr. Younger: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I hope that the time will come when the French will feel able to come into the military structure of NATO. At the present time we are happy to develop warmer and closer relations with France, and I believe that that is happening now.

Mr. Curry: Is my right hon. Friend aware that President Mitterrand of France is to attend the forthcoming NATO summit, which will be the first time that a French Head of State has attended it for more than 20 years? Does he think that that is a positive sign for the increasing integration of France, in practice, into the defence of Western Europe?

Mr. Younger: Yes, I think that the presence of the French Government, at presidential level, is a good augury for a successful NATO summit, which I hope will produce a clear and strong declaration.

Dual-Capable Aircraft

14. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary for State for Defence how many aircraft types there are in the Royal Air Force currently classified as dual-capable.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Three, Sir.

Mr. Barnes: Is there any intention to include the three dual-capable aircraft, which are capable of nuclear use, in conventional—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is very difficult to hear at this end of the Chamber.

Mr. Barnes: Is there any intention to include those three aircraft in the Geneva conventional arms talks, or is it the Government's intention never to introduce discussions about nuclear capability into negotiations?

Mr. Stewart: We do not believe that nuclear systems should be included in conventional arms talks.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that dual capability for the RAF is not new? It goes back to the introduction of the Victor, Vulcan and Valiant in the early 1950s. Therefore, the RAF is simply maintaining the capacity that it has had over all those years.

Mr. Stewart: My hon Friend is right. There is a long history of dual-capable systems for aeroplanes. As to the negotiations on arms control, which the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) raised, we believe that conventional talks should concentrate on conventional forces. The priority in that regard is the great advantage and numerical superiority that Warsaw pact forces have in conventional ground forces.

Mr. Duffy: Will the Minister tell the House when those RAF aircraft will benefit from the protection and security of a NATO identification friend or foe system, for which we have been waiting for years?

Mr. Stewart: As the hon. Member knows, we have studied the systems for a long time. We are always anxious to update IFF and other systems, and I have no doubt that those aeroplanes will benefit from that.

Mr. Rogers: Will the Minister simply give a straight answer: will the three dual-capable Tornados be included in any conventional arms talks?

Mr. Stewart: We have said that we would not expect nuclear capability to be included in conventional arms talks. We have not said that dual-capable aircraft or other systems should be excluded in so far as that applies to their conventional role.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 23 February.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty The Queen.

Mr. Dykes: As this is such a crucial moment, will my right hon. Friend today and in coming weeks continue her determined and much appreciated efforts to secure an international peace conference and a lasting settlement in the middle east, bearing in mind that this must be done without preconditions on either side, that the credibility of the United States is inevitably reduced by its historic and strategic closeness to one party to the dispute, and that Europe and the United Kingdom have a unique role to play in this process?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, our policy has not changed, over the past year in particular, when we have espoused the cause of an international conference as a background for direct negotiations between King Hussein and the Palestinians and Israel. It has not been possible to get that going because it has not met with a sufficient degree of support from Mr. Shamir. We shall continue to espouse that course because we think it is the best one. The other side of the problem arises as to who shall negotiate on behalf of the Palestinians, but I believe that that particular part is soluble.

Mr. Kinnock: First, I warmly welcome the reply that the Prime Minister gave on the international conference.

Does the Prime Minister recognise that her refusal to give a commitment fully to fund the Health Service pay award is, in the words of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, causing "damaging uncertainty" and in some areas continued ward closures. Will she now make the necessary commitment to funding so that health authorities can plan and provide properly without cutting staff and without closing wards?

The Prime Minister: No, Mr. Speaker. This is about the fifth time that I have had the same question, so the answer will be precisely the same. The pay award will be dealt with in precisely the same way as previous awards, and of course previous awards have been highly beneficial to the nurses. I did look up to see precisely the dates upon which we dealt with it last year. All the reports of the review bodies came in between 1 and 14 April. We like to deal with them altogether. The nurses, doctors, dentists, the profession supplementary to medicine, the armed forces and the top salaries pay review bodies' reports all came in within a fortnight and we announced all our decisions by 23 April. I hope that if the reports come in in a similar group this year we will be equally expeditious in announcing our decision.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister says that she has made the commitment before, but never before have we had a Select Committee with a majority of her hon. Friends saying publicly that the absence of a commitment is causing "damaging uncertainty", and never before have we had the same Select Committee saying that the Prime Minister has up to £2 billion extra that she could spend on the National Health Service without changing the proportion of GDP spent on the service. When that service has such desperate and immediate need today, and when she plainly has the money, why does she not use the money?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary gave a very effective reply to the Select Committee. With regard to GDP, the right hon. Gentleman will be aware that not only has GDP gone up —there is further good news on that today; it is up 5 per cent. on what it was a year ago—but the proportion of unincreased GDP spent on the Health Service has gone up from 4·8 per cent. under Labour to 5·6 per cent under the Government.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister quotes her right hon. Friend. In response to him, her right hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) said that coded messages were not enough and that his reply was not good enough. Today, now, wards are being closed and uncertainty is causing damage because the right hon. Lady will not make a commitment. Why does she not make a commitment and relieve the health authorities of further weeks of uncertainty, causing further damage to the Health Service?

The Prime Minister: The nurses have had great action under Tory Governments, and have had pay increases of 30 per cent. over and above inflation, compared with a 20 per cent. reduction under Labour. The nurses have done very well under Tory Governments, and I shall deal with the report as I have indicated.

Mr. Knapman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that vast sums of public money have been given to the Rover car company and that further sums of money should not be given to that company to fund excessive pay demands?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is correct. During the lifetime of this Government about £2·9 billion has been given to the Rover-Leyland group. There is no intention of providing any more money specifically to fund the demand for an increase greater than that which the management has decided to offer. It is for the management and the work force to resolve the strike. I hope that it will not last long, because strikes do not help anyone, least of all those who work in a particular company. My fear is that that would be handing jobs and business to Japan.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: I am pleased that the Prime Minister is a regular visitor to Cornwall, but is she aware that in so doing she and many others are adding to the burden on the Health Service in Cornwall? Roads are congested and ambulances are less able to move around the county as hospital closures increase. Will the Prime Minister—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must ask a question, please.

Mr. Taylor: Will the Prime Minister ensure, within the review of the Health Service, that a new commitment is made to tackle the problem of rural scatter in areas such as my constituency?

The Prime Minister: We shall have a very thorough review of the Health Service, taking into account many representations. If the hon. Member has specific and rather more definite representations to make, perhaps he will let me have them in writing.

Mr. Colvin: When does my right hon. Friend expect the flotation of the National Freight Corporation, a business that was previously owned by the state and is now owned by its workers? Are not the privatisation and flotation further examples of the transfer of wealth in favour of working people and their families?

The Prime Minister: I very much welcome the progress that the National Freight Corporation has made since it was privatised by a management buy-out. It has done very well by its work force, and the work force has done very well by the National Freight Corporation. Profits have increased by about nine times since privatisation, and those who helped with the buy-out have had a very good deal. I wish the company well for the flotation.

Engagements

Q2. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 23 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Mullin: Does the Prime Minister agree with Lord Denning that it is better to have one or two innocent people remain in gaol than to risk undermining the credibility of the legal system by having to own up to a mistake? [Interruption.] Does she further agree that nothing discredits our system of justice so much as the widespread notion that some mistakes are too big to own up to?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman asked me to agree with a proposition by Lord Denning. I would prefer to see the proposition in context. I understand that the hon. Member may be referring once again to the recent hearing by the Court of Appeal of the case of the Birmingham pub bombings. The Court of Appeal hearing fully examined the defence case and decided that the convictions were sound. The Court of Appeal has certified that there is a point of public importance. I understand that the appellants intend to apply to the House of Lords to pursue the matter. The judgment, of course, is fully available to those who wish to read it in detail.

Mr. Favell: Has my right hon. Friend had time today to consider the Japanese ambassador's comment that if there were a business Olympics we would win gold medals? What kind of medals would we win if the Opposition were in charge?

The Prime Minister: I saw the most excellent comment by the Japanese ambassador. I think that he and Japan are very pleased with the inward investment that they have had into this country. They have insisted on one union only with which to negotiate. The companies have done well and the work force has done well. They have done well for Britain and we are very pleased with the compliments of the Japanese ambassador on our excellent, enterprising industry.

Q2. Mr. Strang: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 23 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Strang: Will the Prime Minister acknowledge the fundamental importance to the Scottish economy of the coal and steel industries? Is she aware of the widespread concern that thousands of jobs which depend upon these industries are threatened by privatisation? Will she take steps to direct British Steel to invest in new facilities in Scotland? Will she put an end to the suggested economic lunacy of a privatised South of Scotland Electricity Board being allowed to close pits by importing foreign coal?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman has, not unexpectedly, asked two questions, one about steel and one about coal. As to steel, it is the subject of a debate later. The hon. Gentleman is aware that undertakings, subject to commercial considerations, were given to Ravenscraig with respect to steelmaking for the next seven years and to the Associated Dalzell plant for plate-rolling. It was, I think, an undertaking for the longest production of almost any steel plant in Europe. I thought that that went down extremely well in Scotland. We hope to undertake the privatisation of electricity, including Scottish electricity, during the lifetime of this Parliament. There will, I hope, be a White Paper out soon about our proposal.

I understand that the hon. Gentleman was asking a third question about coal, in connection with the ending of the coal contract, which I believe is due to terminate at the end of March—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is aware that the existing arrangements between the South of Scotland Electricity Board and British Coal are due to terminate at the end of March. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] If they are not, there is no problem.

Mr. Stanbrook: When my right hon. Friend signed the Anglo-Irish Agreement, did she expect that the Irish Government would use it to justify a unilateral inquiry into an incident that occurred within the United Kingdom, to restrict the extradition of alleged terrorists from Ireland, to set aside a decision of the Attorney-General and to attempt to reverse the verdict of the British Court of Appeal?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that it is right or possible to use the Anglo-Irish Agreement for that purpose, if one looks at the terms of the agreement. With regard to the inquiry which the Republic of Ireland has recently indicated that it has set up, of course, in their own country the Irish Government can inquire into anything they wish, but not in matters north of the border. I have taken note of what my Friend has said about the extradition arrangements which we had with them and which were changed unilaterally. I have nothing to add to the excellent statement which my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General made in the House on other matters.

Q4. Mr. Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 23 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Smith: Further to the question that was asked earlier by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, was the Prime Minister denying the report that appeared in today's Daily Telegraph that Ministers have already decided not fully to fund the nurses' pay review, but instead to seek further efficiency savings? If she is not denying those reports, when will she realise that for her to suggest that nurses' pay should be funded only at the expense of patient care would be beyond contempt and rejected decisively by this House, as it has been by the Select Committee on Social Services, and as it will be by the people of this country?

The Prime Minister: I have not read any newspapers today. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I have been far too busy. What appears in those newspapers is not my responsibility. We shall deal with the report of the review bodies in precisely the same way and with precisely the same expedition as we dealt with them in previous years, and in particular last year. The hon. Gentleman will not have long to wait.

Mr. Strang: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take points of order after the statement.

Mr. Strang: I have a point of order arising out of Prime Minister's questions, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know that the hon. Gentleman wishes to raise a matter, but I shall still take points of order after the statement.

Britoil

3.31 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement.

On 1 February I told the House that, following the acquisition by BP of the majority of Britoil's ordinary shares, the Government would discuss with the two companies how we would use the special share. I reaffirmed that the powers of the special share would be used for so long as it was in the national interest to do so. I undertook that, in the discussions, we would take fully into account what was best for Scotland and for the development of the North sea. Those discussions have now been completed, and an acceptable arrangement has been reached with BP. The details are set out in an exchange of letters between BP and the Treasury, and I am placing copies in the Library of the House.

I shall deal first with the undertakings BP has given about its management of Britoil's North sea assets on the United Kingdom continental shelf. BP will seek to achieve an increase of at least 5 per cent. in recoverable reserves from Britoil's North sea oilfields. It has also undertaken to increase exploration substantially. By 1990, BP plans to spend between £300 million and £325 million a year on combined BP and Britoil North sea exploration. This represents a large increase in expenditure, and will lead to a major expansion in the number of wells drilled. BP has undertaken to develop as fast as is practicable all economic North sea discoveries in the combined BP and Britoil portfolio, including those resulting from the increased exploration programme.

All this implies a faster and more effective development of assets in the North sea. This increase in activity should give a welcome boost to the United Kingdom offshore industry.

So far as Scotland is concerned, BP has undertaken that Britoil's Glasgow office will become the business headquarters for the management not only of BP's and Britoil's combined United Kingdom upstream assets but also of BP's Norwegian and Irish interests, and that the overall number of employees in Aberdeen and Glasgow will not fall as a result of the acquisition.

BP has also undertaken to transfer to Glasgow the management of a high technology research and development project for the exploitation of the deeper waters of the United Kingdom continental shelf and elsewhere. As a minimum, between 50 and 75 senior BP executives and other highly qualified technical graduate staff will move to Scotland.

BP expects to increase the existing commitments of both companies in support of United Kingdom continental shelf-related research at Scottish universities. In addition, the company will endow a number of BP research fellowships for postgraduate research in Scottish universities. Both BP and Britoil have an excellent reputation for support for the Scottish community, and BP has undertaken that that will be continued at at least the present levels for the two companies.

The board of Britoil will be headed by a new non-executive chairman without any previous BP connections, whose appointment will be agreed between the Government and BP. Of the rest of the board, the chief executive and the executive directors will be nominated by BP, but the appointment of a majority of the non-executive directors will be agreed between the Government and BP.

If BP, which currently owns some 80 per cent. of Britoil's ordinary shares, ends up with a majority, but not a 100 per cent. shareholding, the same assurances and arrangements will apply, to the extent consistent with the obligations owed to Britoil's minority shareholders. Britoil will then be managed and operated as a separate, independent subsidiary and will have its own chief executive. The proposed staff movements to Scotland will still take place.

The Government have told BP that in return for these assurances, and so long as we are satisfied that BP is complying with them, we do not intend to exercise any of the rights attaching to the special share. After a period of time the Government will review, in the light of the way that these assurances have operated, when the special share should be redeemed. Meanwhile, responsibility for the special share will be transferred from the Treasury to the Department of Energy.

The existence of the special share has enabled the Government to secure from BP these wide-ranging, valuable and public assurances. BP has a high reputation, both internationally and also as a major employer in Scotland, and I am sure that the House will share my confidence that it will honour the assurances it has given.

I believe that this outcome is good for Scotland, good for the efficient exploitation of our North sea assets, and good for the future of the two companies and of their employees.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I hope that the Chancellor does not expect the House of Commons to accept that this pathetic exercise in window dressing is an honouring of the specific pledges about the independence of Britoil that he gave when he was Secretary of State for Energy while assuring us of the magical properties of the golden share. Let me remind the Chancellor of what he said to the House when he was Secretary of State for Energy. He said that the special share

"will act as the most formidable deterrent to anyone who tries to take over control of the board, of the company or of the majority of its shares, and who the Government consider to be unacceptable."— [Official Report, 31 March 1982; Vol. 21, c. 334.]

Does the Chancellor also recollect that the then Minister of State for Scotland, now Lord Gray of Contin, said:

"The articles will contain effective safeguards for Britoil's independence and the safeguards will be triggered if there is an attempt to take over voting control of the company or to control the Britoil board or its composition." — [Official Report, 1 April 1982; Vol.21, c.450.]

Is it not right to say that BP correctly judged that the Government would not stand by their own assurances and has now rolled over the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

In exchange for the obliteration of the independence of Scotland's largest publicly quoted company there is an undertaking that jobs will not fall, although there is no guarantee for the future, 50 to 75 executives will move with the research project, which should have been in Scotland in the first place, and the Scottish universities will get a few extra research fellows.

Is it not crystal clear that the Chancellor exacted precious little from BP in exchange for handing Britoil to it on a plate? Is it not typical of the muddle of public relations and doublespeak with which this statement is riddled that Britoil

"is to be managed as a separate, independent subsidiary"?

Does not the Chancellor understand that a subsidiary has ceased to be independent? Was it not the independence of Britoil that the golden share was supposed to guarantee? Is it not significant that BP has sole and unfettered control over the appointment of the chief executive and all the executive directors of the new subsidiary?

Having failed to use the powers of the golden share, the Chancellor is now signalling its end, and even in its limbo period it is so worthless that the Treasury is tossing it over to the Department of Energy.

Does not this whole episode prove that the Chancellor is not to be trusted when he gives assurances to Parliament? The result of the whole exercise is the betrayal of the public interest exemplified by an increase in monopoly power, a move of decision-making power to London and the extinction of a proud and successful oil company.

Will the Chancellor reflect on the irony that, while he allows BP to gobble up Britoil, the Kuwaiti Investment Office is steadily increasing its shareholding in BP—the pathway opened to the Kuwaitis by the Chancellor's decision to persist in selling the Government's share after the crash? Do not the Kuwaitis have a clearer concept of their national interest than the Chancellor has of the British interest?

Mr. Lawson: I am not at all surprised that the right hon. and learned Gentleman got on to the subject of the Kuwaiti holding in BP, because he knew that he was on such flimsy and hopeless ground on the issue about which I made my statement. He also knows of the assurances that we have received from the Kuwaiti Government on the Kuwaiti holding.

I am sorry that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should have decided to imply that BP was such an unacceptable owner of Britoil, as I well recall an earlier occasion—over the BP share issue—when he lauded the merits of BP to the skies. He seems to have changed his tune to a remarkable extent. Also, the right hon. and learned Gentleman has not read the statement very carefully, although he had a long time to do so. The reference to the separate independent subsidiary was in the case where BP did not secure 100 per cent. of the shares and therefore there was a minority outstanding. Therefore, that is an accurate statement in company law. If, however, BP gets 100 per cent., Britoil will not be independent but it will still be subject to the assurances that BP has given. They are substantial assurances and the right hon. and learned Gentleman is wholly wrong to brush them aside. His views will not be shared by anyone who knows anything about the oil industry in general and the Scottish offshore oil industry in particular.

Finally, I would refer the right hon. and learned Gentleman to the statement that I made more than five years ago as Secretary of State for Energy which he quoted. I said that the special share would be a deterrent to the takeover of Britoil by anyone who the Government considered to be unacceptable. The Government have found that a takeover by BP, subject to the assurances that BP has given, is thoroughly acceptable and in the best interests of the British people and the British economy.

Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith (Kincardine and Deeside): Will my right hon. Friend acknowledge that there has been a direct challenge from BP to the Government? In those circumstances, my right hon. Friend is placed in extreme difficulty. This is indeed a sad day for the independence of Britoil and of the British oil sector. Having said that, will my right hon. Friend accept that the assurances that he has obtained from BP in these difficult circumstances are very much to be welcomed? Will he ensure — particularly in the future interests of Britoil's staff—that there is no backsliding and that BP fulfils to the letter the undertakings that have been given?

Mr. Lawson: I thank my right hon. Friend for his remarks. I am quite sure that there will be no backsliding by BP. BP has given solemn assurances to me and, through me, to the House of Commons. But of—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is very difficult to hear what the Chancellor is saying when there is so much background noise from a sedentary position.

Mr. Lawson: But of course it is important that the House should be assured that the undertakings that BP has given will be carried out, and that is why we shall be retaining the special share, with all its powers, until such time as these assurances and undertakings have been fully implemented and have been seen to be working satisfactorily for a reasonable period.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Sir Hector Monro. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] I will balance up in a minute.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Does my right hon. Friend accept that most thinking Scots will welcome a company such as BP with an international reputation developing its operational and administrative role in Scotland? Has my right hon. Friend discussed with BP the likely employment figures over the next two or three years?

Mr. Lawson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The employment figures will obviously depend on the success of the exploration programme and the success of the North sea oil industry based in Scotland, but I have no doubt that the arrangements that we have secured will benefit the North sea oil industry in Scotland. It is interesting that the total amount that BP expects to spend on exploration in the UKCS by 1990 of between £300 million and £325 million compares with a total for BP and Britoil this year of around £200 million.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Chancellor enlighten us a little on one of the conditions that BP seems to find acceptable — the 5 per cent. increase in the return on recoverable reserves? What timespan does the Chancellor seek to put on that evaluation? Will he or the Department of Energy continue to hold the golden share in order to ascertain whether this is a mere promise on the part of BP, or a promise that looks at the value of a field over, say, 20 to 25 years? How will the Chancellor or the Department of Energy seek to monitor that, or has he, in reality, sold out on a whole range of conditions to an oil company that knows what it is doing when he does not?

Mr. Lawson: The way in which BP conducts itself when it has secured Britoil and its operations in the North sea will be carefully monitored by the Department of Energy, which is one of the reasons why it seemed to me appropriate that the special share should be transferred to the Department of Energy.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Will the Chancellor acknowledge that his statement to the House this afternoon is a shameful climb-down on the merit of the golden share? Why was not the takeover of Britain's largest independent oil company by Britain's largest oil company referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission? Does not the takeover show the Government's complete lack of understanding on the role that can be played by independent oil companies as opposed to multi-nationals? Will the net effect in Scotland outweigh the fact that BP is now transferring 300 people from Aberdeen to London, and will the transfers to Glasgow be from south of the border or from Aberdeen?

Mr. Lawson: Whether the arrangements should have been referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission is a matter for the Director General of Fair Trading and for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, not for me. The enhanced activity of the combined British Petroleum and Britoil group will mean great benefits for Scotland. The special share has ensured the independence of Britoil for over five years. It has ensured there has been no foreign acquisition of Britoil and it has ensured that BP has given the important undertakings that it has.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the original object of the special share was to ensure that Britoil remained a British company? What could be more British and more acceptable than for Britoil to be acquired by BP?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend makes a good point. It is deplorable that the Opposition seem to have nothing good to say about BP, Britain's largest company. One might have expected that sort of thing from Members of the Scottish National party, if there are any around; I would not have expected it from Members of other parties who believe in the union.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Will the Chancellor answer a simple question by telling the House what contingency arrangements he has in case BP fails to honour the undertakings that he has given the House today? Is it possible that BP will be divested of its share interest in Britoil if it fails to honour the undertakings which it has given the Chancellor and which he in turn has given the House?

As for BP's employment record, does the Chancellor realise that he simply does not know what he is talking about? As a Scottish Member in whose constituency BP has been throughout my parliamentary life, I know that it has the most appalling employment record of any company in my constituency. I do not regard the undertakings that BP has given the Chancellor as being worth the paper on which they are written.

Mr. Lawson: I find it difficult to contemplate that a company such as BP would give such undertakings to me, and through me to the House, and then break them. If, however, BP did not live up to those assurances, the Government would have full power to use the special share to remove the entire board of Britoil, and to replace it with another board.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, if the Opposition have no interest in the jobs in Scotland, we would be happy to have them in the north-east and receive similar assurances there? Does he not agree that, if the Opposition cannot attach any value to the concept of a tartan share, it is probably high time that it was redeemed?

Mr. Lawson: I note what my hon. Friend has said. He is always a powerful advocate for the north-east of England.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): What exactly has BP given in the way of undertakings? Will the Chancellor look at the small print? For example, paragraph 7 of his statement tells us:

> "BP expects to increase the existing commitments of both companies in support of UK continental shelf-related research at Scottish universities."

BP only "expects" to do that. Where are the undertakings? If BP cannot agree to that, what can we expect from it?

If we look at the statement carefully, we see that BP has not given the undertakings that the Chancellor is trying to give the impression it has given. What is meant by "expect"? Why could not even that be a definite undertaking?

Mr. Lawson: What is meant is that the hon. Gentleman can expect BP to live up to its undertakings. If he wants to look at the small print, however, I suggest that he looks not merely at my statement—which is perhaps the large print—but at the letter written by BP, which I have placed in the Library of the House and which runs to no fewer than 32 paragraphs.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): Will not the public in general, and the Scottish public in particular, be much more impressed by my right hon. Friend's announcement about the increased development in the North sea, and the intensification of research and development in Scotland, than by the accustomed sterile preoccupations of the Opposition with which shares reside in which strong box? Can my right hon. Friend tell us whether this represents any change in the Government's policy towards the independent sector?

Mr. Lawson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has said. There is no change in the Government's policy towards the independent sector of the North sea, but that is not a matter for me; it is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Is the Chancellor aware that the exploration figures that have so excited him in relation to BP's projected expenditure in 1990 are less than the combined exploration expenditure of BP and Britoil in 1985? Are we not moving backwards, and are not those figures almost certainly less than they would be if the two companies remained independent?

Is it not the case that, if BP reaches 90 per cent. of the shareholding, the rest of the small shareholders will be forced to sell out? Are there any guarantees for jobs, given that BP plans to expand its job control from Dyce by 1,000 according to its own devices, and that to maintain employment could still conceal a rationalisation of Britoil jobs?

Does not the Chancellor remember telling the House that it is "important to protect the character of Britoil as an independent company, responsible for its own management and business strategy"?—[Official Report, 31 March 1982; Vol. 21, c. 334.]

Has that been done, and, if not, why not?

Mr. Lawson: On the specific undertakings given by BP, I ask the hon. Gentleman to look at the letter that I have placed in the Library of the House which goes into that in considerable detail, and which I summarised in my statement to the House a little earlier.

As for exploration levels in 1985 and now, I shall let the hon. Gentleman into a secret. At the beginning of 1986, there was a complete collapse of the world oil price, which led to a dramatic fall in exploration world-wide and not merely in the North sea. Therefore, the comparison is between what is promised by BP and what is happening now. As I have said, BP's best estimate of the total amount of expenditure in the North sea by BP and Britoil combined this year is about £200 million whereas the undertaking for 1990 is for expenditure of between £300 million and £325 million. That is a substantial increase.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): Further to his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), does my right hon. Friend agree that, although the number of jobs is, of course, important, the quality of those jobs is crucial and that that is why, for example, the transfer of the sub-sea technology department to Glasgow is so welcome? Can my right hon. Friend give any indication of the timetable for the transfer of that important work?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. On the timetable, BP will carry out that transfer as soon as practicable—[Interruption.] It is of importance. When I visit Scotland the point is often made to me that the jobs that people in Scotland seek are high grade jobs. The jobs to which my hon. Friend referred and to which I referred in my statement are jobs for senior executives and high and top level technologists. They are just the sort of jobs that the Scottish people have wanted to see in Scotland.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, South): On the version in the Chancellor's statement, I think that we can take it that he has battered BP into submission. Is he aware that Britoil's employees in my constituency are still extremely concerned about their job prospects? Did the Chancellor receive undertakings from BP about future developments in, for example, the Don, the Ettrick and the Amethyst fields which would protect those jobs and guarantee their future?

Mr. Lawson: Clearly there were no specific agreements about individual fields, but there was an undertaking to increase exploration activity substantially. That can only be good news for the United Kingdom offshore oil industry based in Scotland.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): Will my right hon. Friend note that if he wants evidence of commitment to Scotland by BP he need look no further than Grangemouth because not only is that Scotland's only refinery but there has been a substantial programme of investment there? When Opposition Members huff and puff about BP, will my right hon. Friend remind them that during the oil price crash Britoil laid off people right left and centre, whereas a large conglomerate such as BP was in a much better position to protect the jobs of its employees?

Mr. Lawson: I think that my hon. Friend is implying that, as usual, Opposition Members are completely out of touch with reality and with the British people. He is quite right.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): Does the Chancellor accept that the undertakings given by BP are remarkably similar to those that were given by the Guinness company, and they were broken? What does the Chancellor plan to do to enforce those promises, or is this another example of major influence on the Scottish economy passing, in this case, not just to London, but to the shores of the Gulf?

Mr. Lawson: I have already explained—I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman understood it—that we shall for the time being retain the special share, with all its powers, to ensure and to satisfy ourselves that the undertakings are carried out. I greatly deplore the slurs that the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. colleagues are making about BP.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on achieving what he has achieved as a demostration of his conscious responsibilities as a Minister peculiarly responsible for matters in all parts of the United Kingdom. The opportunities that he has obtained for executives at senior level to come to Scotland will enable them not only to enjoy the highest standard of living in the United Kingdom, but to promote the huge surge of industry, energy and prosperity which Scotland has enjoyed under this Government.

Mr. Lawson: As usual, there is much in what my hon. and learned Friend says. I believe that it would be more constructive and certainly a great deal better for Scotland if right hon. and hon. Members on the Labour Benches would occasionally stop all this carping and tell the world of the successes of the Scottish economy.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Is the Chancellor saying that anyone who objects to the agglomeration of independent companies into already huge multinational companies is guilty of carping and, by definition, guilty of attacking the company that is doing the acquiring? Does the Chancellor agree that he has made the Secretary of State for Scotland look more than usually absurd? Only last Thursday the Secretary of State for Scotland, in a much-hyped speech, boasted that privatisation led to greater corporate control resting in Scotland. How does the Chancellor equate what has happened to Britoil, with its movement from the public to the private sector and its eventual movement from control in Scotland to Kuwait, with the statement made by his right hon. and learned Friend?

Mr. Lawson: I agree entirely with what my right hon. and learned Friend said. I assure the hon. Gentleman that there is no question of control moving to Kuwait. As for my right hon. and learned Friend looking unhappy, he does not look very unhappy to me, and I should be surprised if he were because I consulted with him throughout the negotiations.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Since this is the first time that the golden share technique has been tested in this way, will my right hon. Friend say whether other companies in which the Government hold a golden share may also be subject to a takeover bid subject only to the consent of the Government?

Mr. Lawson: Each golden share has its own terms and conditions. However, with the exception of Enterprise Oil, where the golden share terminates at the end of the year, pretty well all the other golden shares restrain a holding to 15 per cent. Therefore, the situation is rather different from the situation that pertains in the case of Britoil.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): The Chancellor has made reference to the statements that he has previously made. Does he recall the statement he made from the Dispatch Box about the flotation of Britoil? He said that the purpose of that flotation was to create a new, independent company—independent of the oil majors. If it was a good thing then, why is the destruction of such independence now considered a good thing?

Mr. Lawson: We created a new, independent oil company and freed it from state control and, since then, it has done well. What I also said—indeed it was also said by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith)—was that the purpose of the golden share was to prevent a takeover by anybody who the Government considered to be unacceptable. The whole point is that, as a result of the discussions, we have achieved a situation where there is an acceptable takeover of Britoil.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Does my right hon. Friend realise that there are many Scots who will welcome the statement in the form that it has taken today because they are proud of being Scots and proud of being British? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that BP's independence as a British company — operating as it does in the international market of which, by nature of the business, it must be part — is now much stronger and better because BP and Britoil together are obviously a much safer and better company than they were apart?

Mr. Lawson: As my hon. Friend says, it must clearly be the case that the acquisition of Britoil has considerably strengthened BP.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): Will the Chancellor tell us to whom this takeover is acceptable?

Mr. Lawson: It is acceptable to Her Majesty's Government and it would also appear acceptable to the shareholders of Britoil, some 80 per cent. of whom have accepted the offer.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Will my right hon. Friend accept that many of us thought that there was an inevitability about Britoil being taken over by BP and that it now becomes even more significant that BP stays British and does not become Kuwaiti? Will my right hon. Friend let us into the secret at to what his views would be should someone who is not a British national make a takeover bid for one of our greatest British companies in the oil industry?

Mr. Lawson: I do not believe that it is sensible to engage in hypothetical speculation, but I am confident that BP will remain British.

Mr. Terry Patchett (Barnsley, East): Can the right hon. Gentleman inform the House how much more of the family silver is left to sell off?

Mr. Lawson: That is a pretty tired old simile. I am proud to say that the privatisation programme will continue for many, many years to come.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): Will my right hon. Friend remind the House that BP was not prevented by the American Government from taking 100 per cent. control of Standard Oil — without any special share — even though Standard Oil is much larger than Britoil and happens to own the largest oil reserves in North America? What is all the fuss about?

Mr. Lawson: I believe that my hon. Friend puts an extremely valuable perspective on the discussions that we have had this afternoon.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Does the Chancellor agree that he has brought a considerable amount of this humiliating climb-down on himself? In mid-October 1987, he demonstrated, in proceeding with the share sale, that he was a devotee of the James Anderton philosophy of privatisation—flog the underwriters until they beg for mercy. Does he not agree that had he not alienated the management board of BP on that occasion he would have found the subsequent negotiations when trying, with the use of the golden share, to scare it off from acquiring Britoil far easier to undertake?

Mr. Lawson: I am sure that the BP underwriters will be grateful for the hon. Gentleman's solicitude.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): Although they have not been mentioned this afternoon, does my right hon. Friend agree that the interests of the Britoil shareholders are worth some consideration? The Government would have had to have extremely strong reasons to justify intervening to prevent them from accepting an otherwise extremely attractive offer.

Does my right hon. Friend also agree that it would have been quite absurd and totally wrong to use the golden share as a way of freezing the structural shareholding of a particular company in a particular way for all time? Markets evolve and in the past few years the oil market in particular has changed substantially. It would have been wrong to prevent BP from having the chance to emerge in the future as a greatly expanded and strengthened major vertical company based both in England and in Scotland.

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend makes a number of pertinent remarks. I would only repeat that I believe that the arrangements that have been put in place are good for the North sea oil industry and good for Scotland. My hon. Friend is right to mention the position of the Britoil shareholders. That was certainly one of the factors that I had to take into account.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the Chancellor confirm that nearly two thirds of the shares recently sold in BP have been bought by the Kuwaitis? Is he protesting about that to the Kuwaiti Government? What have they said in response? Have they given any assurances or does he intend that they build up a holding of 29·5 per cent. before he does anything?

Mr. Lawson: It is well known that the Kuwait Investment Office holds a little more than 20 per cent. of the ordinary shares of BP. It is also well known that the Kuwaitis have given an undertaking and an assurance to the Government that they regard this as a long-term investment and that they have no interest whatever in the control and management of BP.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the overwhelming stench of humbug coming across from the Opposition Benches today should be repudiated? In view of the undertakings given by BP, perhaps he will take into account my constituents, who have Wytch Farm in their area and rely on BP's good name for maintaining the oil interests of my constituency. When he next talks to BP, and given that Scottish Members do not want headquarters jobs in their constituencies, perhaps he will consider bringing jobs to Swanage and Wareham.

Mr. Lawson: Wytch Farm is the most successful onshore oilfield in the United Kingdom. I am sure that it brings considerable benefits to my hon. Friend's constituents, about which he is fully aware.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): One thing is certain: the Chancellor of the Exchequer has proved the old adage, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) has just reminded me, that all that glitters is not gold. What guarantee have BP and the Kuwaitis given him that they will not break their promise in the same way that he broke his promise to the House on the golden share? Is he aware that all the shenanigans that have taken place with British oil companies have provided the Left with a perfect platform for arguing the case for public ownership in the future?

Mr. Lawson: I was not aware that the Left of the Labour party, or, indeed, any part of the Labour party, needed any excuse for arguing the virtues of state ownership. It appears to have done it without any excuse. When the Labour party has been in power, it has done great damage to this country, but that will not happen again. I strongly resent the accusation that I have been dishonest with the House of Commons. I have not.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Surely what is best for British business and thus for British jobs is that there should be no politically imposed Scottish solutions on British business — [Interruption] — but rather that Britoil should be free to make its own commercial decisions, free from political interference and special pleading.

Mr. Lawson: I am afraid that there was so much noise from the Opposition Benches that I was not able to hear that question.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth) rose——

Hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us hear this question.

Mr. Dickens: Does my right hon. Friend agree that in answering questions—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Give the hon. Gentleman a chance.

Mr. Dickens: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, when Ministers are replying to questions similar to that of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), we ought to remind hon. Members that the British Government have the sanction of removing the board of Britoil if it goes back on its agreement, and that it is the British Government who issue licences for exploration and place a tax structure on oil companies? With all that behind us, why on earth are we worried about a multinational company which has to compete with other multinational companies? We cannot be parochial any longer. We must compete with the rest of the world and, to do that, we must be strong.

Mr. Lawson: I was able to hear that question, and I agree with everything that my hon. Friend said.

Points of Order

4.13 pm

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to raise an important point of order arising from the Prime Minister's answer to my question this afternoon. The Prime Minister stated that the contract between the South of Scotland Electricity Board and British Coal will come to an end at the end of March. Opposition Members challenged her on that from a sedentary position and she went on to say that, if that were the case, there was no problem. However, only within the past few days, British Coal has taken the South of Scotland Electricity board to court.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This appears to be a continuation of Question Time. What is the point of order for me?

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): It is a genuine point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure that every hon. Member who raises a point of order has a genuine reason for doing so, but I cannot say whether an answer is right or wrong.

Mr. Strang: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. The important point is that the matter is before the courts. British Coal and the SSEB are currently before the courts seeking a decision on whether the contracts applying to Longannet and Cockenzie end at the end of March or in 1992. Did the Prime Minister breach the sub judice rule?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do my homework on these questions. I am not aware that any date has been set down for this case.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is a matter which concerns the whole House, regardless of Government or Opposition support. It is the practice of Ministers to refer to a document and say that something will be found in it, but when one studies the document one finds that what Ministers have asserted is in it tends not to appear in the document specifically.

The House will recall that the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred us to a document in the Library. It so happens that, in the Library, there is the letter of 23 February from Sir Peter Middleton, permanent secretary to the Treasury, to Sir Peter Walters, chairman of BP, but nowhere in that document is there any undertaking of the kind that the Chancellor said that we would find. It is a gross abuse of the House of Commons for Ministers to refer to documents that are not immediately available. There is certainly something in those documents, but, lo and behold, when we read them, what is asserted to be in them tends not to be there. That is a ministerial abuse of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman will have to follow that up in a subsequent question. I cannot deal with it.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to raise an important point of order regarding Prime Minister's Question Time. You will be aware that a serious incident occurred in my constituency this week. The hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) referred to the matter during Question Time. That serious incident resulted in the death of a young man and, subsequently, in a foreign Government deciding to hold an inquiry into the event at Aughnacloy. I tried to intervene, without success, in Prime Minister's Question Time today, as I have done time after time during the past eight months.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must understand that I am obliged to balance questions in the House and I shall seek to call hon. Members who have not previously been called to ask questions of the Prime Minister. I am well aware of the hon. Gentleman's concern about his constituent, and I am sorry about that, but, with the best will in the world, I cannot possibly call the hon. Gentleman whenever an incident occurs in his constituency. There will be other opportunities.

Mr. Maginnis: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The matter does not arise. I am sorry, but I have already called the hon. Gentleman once during Prime Minister's Question Time. He will be called again, but I cannot call him just because he rises. Many hon. Members rise to ask questions.

Mr. Maginnis: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. No, it does not arise.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to raise a point of order regarding Standing Committee proceedings tomorrow. The Hansard for last Wednesday's proceedings of Standing Committee C is not yet available. That will not necessarily prevent the Committee from proceeding, but it is a grave discomfort for Committee Members. I should be most grateful if you would investigate the matter.

Mr. Speaker: I shall look into that.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Was not this afternoon an example of the difficulties that the House gets into because, Sir, of your new practice of postponing points of order until a later time in the day? There was an occasion this afternoon when the Prime Minister should have been called to order immediately, but, because of your intervention in postponing the point of order, it could not happen. We are now in the difficulty that a matter has been raised on which you have postponed a decision—quite rightly—and we shall require another ruling from you.

Would it not be advisable to reconsider this arbitrary introduction that you, Sir, created, of postponing points of order which are relevant when they are raised, but are not relevant one, two or three hours later?

Mr. Speaker: I do not propose to go back on this matter. It is certainly not an arbitrary ruling of mine. I am merely returning to what used to be, and has always been, the practice in this House.

The trouble with having points of order arising out of questions is that, by their very nature, they invite a continuation of Question Time. I think the whole House agrees that the present practice is for the best.

Mr. Faulds rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not hearing any more from the hon. Gentleman about that; I have dealt with it.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would it be possible for you to enlighten me? I understood you to say that you were reverting to an old practice of the House. I have not been an hon. Member for long, but other hon. Members keep telling me that the old practice was to raise points of order when the questions arose. Would it be possible to learn when the old practice became a new practice, to be superseded by an old practice?

Mr. Speaker: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that. In the Parliament before last, that practice began to grow, when the Speaker of the day took the view that, in order not to disrupt Question Time, he would take points of order at the end. I have reverted to the practice that previously existed. I shall be happy to send the hon. Gentleman details of the statement that I made at the time—I do not have it with me now.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your advice. Last Thursday, a Home Office Minister declined to answer eight questions that had appeared on the Order Paper on the ground that the case in question was sub judice. The case, however, was not referred to the House of Lords and was not sub judice. I should be grateful for your clarification on that point, and for your confirmation that there was nothing to prevent the Minister from answering questions on the subject. Is it not about time that Ministers stopped sheltering behind the sub judice rule?

Mr. Speaker: I think that the hon. Gentleman is asking about the case of the Birmingham six. I can tell him that, from the latest information I have, it is not sub judice under the rules of the House.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Could you explain to the House when and why the system was changed whereby hon. Members could rise and say they were not in agreement with what had been said in reply to their questions and would seek to raise the issue on the Adjournment?

Mr. Speaker: That has not been changed; it frequently happens even today. I shall take one more point of order, but we have an important debate on steel——

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: I am telling the hon. Gentleman that a large number of hon. Members want to take part in the steel debate, on which there is a time limit.

Mr. Eadie: Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds), who wrongly left the Chamber. I want to put it to you that when we are dealing with rules that you have decided arbitrarily, we must sometimes reflect on whether, in the light of our experience, they require reconsideration——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. Gentleman did not say "arbitrarily".

Mr. Eadie: I am saying that you decided the rule. If you decided it, it is arbitrary. I should welcome correction from you, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: I should be happy to send the hon. Gentleman the ruling that I made at the time, with the background to it.

Mr. Eadie: I am continuing with my point of order, Mr. Speaker, whether you like it or not.

Mr. Speaker: I do not mind at all; it is a question whether the hon. Gentleman's colleagues will object.

Mr. Eadie: I was raising the issue whether you should consider what happens to our procedures in the light of experience. What was drawn to your attention this afternoon happened because of the procedure of taking points of order after Question Time. It certainly looks as if the Prime Minister, or the Executive, was protected today, when, as was drawn to your attention, the right hon. Lady made a statement about a matter that was about to come before the courts. When the Prime Minister of the country makes a statement, I am sure that it will be transmitted to the courts and could, to some extent, prejudice, or help to prejudice, any decision by the courts.

I am referring to the issue of the SSEB coal contract in Scotland. All I am asking you to do, Mr. Speaker—I know that you are in a hurry, but I rarely raise points of order—is to consider, in the light of what has happened today, the fact that as you are the protector of Back Benchers you do not want to over-protect the Executive. To some extent, the Prime Minister abused privilege this afternoon, and you listened to that.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, it is my duty to ensure that Back Benchers' rights are protected. As far as I am aware —I briefed myself before Question Time—the case has not been set down for a hearing before the courts. It is therefore not sub judice. If I am wrong, I shall, of course, apologise to the House.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As you rightly suggested much earlier, there have been variations on the procedure of points of order during the time that you and I have been Members of the House. It is true that for a long time points of order were raised on questions immediately after they occurred—indeed, that was so for the greater part of the time that I have been here. A few months ago, in 1987, you took it upon yourself to try to be firm and to have all points of order raised after statements so that they could all be collected together. It may not have been the only reason, but certainly one of the criteria for that was the fact that Ministers, who are busy people, arrange to make statements and want to get away from points of order that could occur straight after Question Time, before a statement or business questions might delay them. I can understand that, even though I might not agree with it. You, Mr. Speaker, might have taken a different view.

I have raised this subject before and I am concerned about it. It is fair to say that if the practice stays for as long as you hold your office, Mr. Speaker, and Back Benchers' points of order immediately after questions are disbarred, Front Benchers, who in times of heat, passion and argument, may want to break that rule must be expected to abide by it. As I have said before, there was a slight variation on the rule on one occasion. I suggest that if it applies to my hon. Friends and other hon. Members it must hold fast at all times for all Front Benchers.

Mr. Speaker: I am always prepared to keep such matters under review. I am merely going back to the practice that always obtained in the past. The trouble with asking hon. Members whether a point of order arises out of questions is that the inevitable answer is, "Certainly, Mr. Speaker; of course it does." We then get two slots for points of order in that way. That wastes the time of the House and in any event Ministers do not get an opportunity to reply to the points, because Question Time is over.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. At one time, you made a distinction between hon. Members who wanted to raise points of order directly arising from questions and those who raised other points of order. If you give that further reflection, you will see that, if Question Time ends at 3.30 pm and an hon. Member cannot raise his point of order arising out of it until 5 pm, and in the meantime there have been two statements, and so on, the point of order loses a great deal of relevance.

As you have repeatedly stated, Mr. Speaker, that one of your functions, like that of your predecessors, is to protect Back Benchers—we have limited rights in many respects about asking questions and being called—I should have thought that there was a very strong case for a trial period of six months to see what occurs. Hon. Members who want to raise points of order arising from questions should be asked to do so immediately after Question Time.

Mr. Speaker: Points of order are one thing. As to the practice of the past, the hon. Gentleman needs only to look at Hansard of those days to find that very rarely—almost never—were they points of order; they were points of dispute about a statement or an answer given to a question.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I will put together the 12 motions relating to statutory instruments.

Points of Order

4.35 pm

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask for your guidance, in relation to the point of order that I tried to raise earlier? When you rose to your feet, I sat down. Thereafter, I was precluded from making my point of order. As Northern Ireland is governed and legislated for through Orders in Council, I am unable, as an hon. Member representing Northern Ireland, to change any legislation that the Government may bring forward. In the past eight months I have been called only once during Prime Minister's Question Time. What is my role in the House in terms of representing my constituents? Do I have a role?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must bear in mind the fact that he is one of a number of Members who represent Northern Ireland constituencies. During Prime Minister's Question Time I always attempt to call an hon. Member from one of the minority parties, but it would be impossible to call all of them. The hon. Gentleman is one hon. Member among 650. I must deal with all hon. Members fairly.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Of course I shall take the point of order, but it will affect the hon. Gentleman's colleagues who wish to take part in the steel debate. I hope that I shall not receive any complaints at the end of the debate.

Mr. Dalyell: My point of order arises from what happened yesterday when my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) and others asked questions of you, Mr. Speaker, about the Master of the Rolls. You said that you would reflect on the matter, and I was wondering whether you would be making a statement to the House. The statement has been made much more urgent by what happened in the Scottish courts today regarding the Anthony Cavendish affair and Lord Coulsfield's judgment. The relationship between Parliament and the courts is assuming an extra urgency.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman has raised the matter, I shall reply. I have considered the matter, as I undertook to do yesterday. The rule—which is set out in "Erskine May" on pages 430 and 431—is that,

"Unless the discussion is based upon a substantive motion, drawn in proper terms, reflections must not be cast in debate upon . . ."

certain persons, including peers and judges. That is not to say that hon. Members may not express disagreement with the decisions of judges in cases that are not sub judice, so long as they express their disagreement in proper terms. Nor does it mean — this is the point that the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) raised with me yesterday — that where a person who is covered by the rule undertakes activities in another capacity he may not be criticised in that capacity. For instance, criticism has been permitted of the activities of a member of another place in his role as a newspaper proprietor.

What our rules do not permit, unless it is on a substantive motion, is criticism of the private conduct of a judge of the kind that reflects on his capacity to hold that office.

Mr. Dalyell: Obviously this is an important statement on which the House would wish to reflect. Is, as we interpret it, the House of Commons taking a stand against the behaviour of the Master of the Rolls, not as a judge but more in his role as a politician?

Mr. Speaker: I ask the hon. Gentleman to study carefully what I have said in this considered statement.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You said that it is right and proper for hon. Members to criticise, among other people, judges such as the Master of the Rolls, Lord Donaldson, when they are acting in a capacity that is not in line with their job as a judge. What we argued yesterday, which you have taken on board, is that he had entered the political arena. As opposed to carrying out judgments, he was saying that it was quite all right for somebody to break the law. We challenged that in terms of a motion and he entered the fray and started making comments publicly. He then entered into correspondence with his friend the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: As I understand it, this is part of the judgment, not acting in a different capacity at all.

Mr. Skinner: The point that I am trying to make is that he erred along the narrow line that he should tread as a judge in interpreting the law as passed by Parliament. We are arguing that, now that he has trampled on to a different course, it is right and proper for us — in accordance with your statement, Mr. Speaker — to challenge him because he has voluntarily decided to move out of that narrow, restricted legal arena into the political arena. If he does that, it is right that we should be able to criticise. I think that your statement, Mr. Speaker, vindicates what we have been saying. We will carry on.

Mr. Speaker: My statement was intended to refer to another case that was mentioned yesterday concerning a former judge who appeared on television and made some statements. That is acting in a different capacity.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

4.36 pm

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require an annual report to Parliament on progress made in investigating the causes, effects and treatment of myalgic encephalomyelitis.

First, I should like to pay tribute to the many sufferers who have written to me in the past few days telling me of their personal suffering from the illness myalgic encephalomyelitis—an illness that is also known as post-virile fatigue syndrome.

I should like to pay tribute to the Myalgic Encephalomyelitis Association and the myalgic encephalomyelitis action campaign for the tremendous work that they do for the sufferers of this terrible and devastating illness and for the help that they gave me in preparing the Bill.

The ME illness was first observed in Britain 33 years ago in 1955, but it was observed in other countries as early as 1939. Research into the disease is being carried out in Britain at St. Mary's hospital in Paddington, Glasgow university and establishments elsewhere. Research is also being carried out abroad, notably in Australia and the United States of America.

Research shows that ME appears to be caused by virile infection, combined with a disfunction of the immune system. There is no doubt that ME is an organic disease. The nature of the disease is such that it primarily strikes the central nervous system, the brain and body muscles. Its most common symptom is a profound weakness of the body, which results in even the most active of people being confined to their bed for long periods, sometimes years.

Another symptom that is more distressing than that is the illness's effect on the brain. Some normally bright, alert people find themselves unable to function. Their concentration goes; they have difficulty speaking; and even conversation leaves them completely exhausted. Sufferers lose their jobs and their lives come to a halt. Children affected lose out on their education, sometimes for years. For many children the disease totally devastates their lives.

The greatest suffering of all is the anguish caused by misdiagnosis. On top of the physical and mental stress caused by the disease, sufferers' agonies are compounded by being told that they are well, that there is nothing wrong with them, that they are malingering, or that they are neurotic. It is widely acknowledged that many incidences of suicide result from the refusal of doctors to accept that sufferers are ill from myalgic encephalomyelitis.

The Bill is a simple measure which merely requires the Secretary of State to make an annual report to Parliament describing the progress that has been made in investigating the causes, effects, incidence and treatment of ME. Such a report would be of enormous value in drawing the attention of the medical profession, sufferers themselves and others to whom sufferers may turn for help to what is known about the illness. I cannot emphasise enough how vital it is to give proper recognition to the condition, as the failure to recognise the reality of the illness causes sufferers such great and wholly unnecessary distress.

The following are authentic examples of suffering caused by ME. A mother wrote to me saying:

"My son aged 18 died from this miserable illness last March. He was away at university and had been ill on and off for two years. It all started with an attack of glandular fever. Now we look back over this time and so many things fit into a pattern. He was an active, bright young man with a zest for living and life. This illness got in his way."

She concluded by telling me that her son committed suicide.

Then there was Jill from Sussex, who said:

"I have been to hell and back with this devastating illness. I am still not recognised or getting proper benefits."

I have received hundreds of letters about similar experiences from all over Britain, as well as Northern Ireland and the Isle of Man.

Many well-known persons are afflicted with the disease. Sufferers include the Dean of Westminster; David Provan, a Scottish international footballer who had to retire from a promising career; a famous ballet dancer who is now confined to a wheelchair; and Clare Francis, a well-known adventurer and authoress. I inform the House that one of its Members, my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John), who is a sponsor of the Bill, is a sufferer.

I submit that the case for justice for ME sufferers is proved beyond all doubt. I have tried today to resist the temptation to speak in strong terms about the failure of the medical profession to recognise myalgic encephalomyelitis and the failure of the Department of Health and Social Security to recognise the plight of ME sufferers. The sufferers are denied proper recognition, misdiagnosed, vilified, ridiculed and driven to great depths of despair. They look to this House for justice. For them all I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jimmy Hood, Mr. Alfred Morris, Mr. Jack Ashley, Mr. Brynmor John, Mr. Don Dixon, Mr. Alan Meale, Dr. Lewis Moonie, Mr. Sam Galbraith, Ms. Harriet Harman, Mr. Jimmy Wray, Mr. Tom Clarke and Mr. Jerry Hayes.

MYALGIC ENCEPHALOMYELITIS

Mr. Jimmy Hood accordingly presented a Bill to require an annual report to Parliament on progress made in investigating the causes, effects and treatment of myalgic encephalomyelitis: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 15 April and to be printed. [Bill 99.]

Orders of the Day

British Steel Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Before we begin the debate, I should tell the House that Mr. Speaker has not selected either of the amendments on the Order Paper.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Regarding the conduct of the debate, you will be aware that Mr. Speaker has received many applications from right hon. and hon. Members to participate in the debate, but you will have observed also that there is no amendment on the Order Paper standing in the name of the Leader of the Opposition. As the trade union movement seems to be in support of the Bill and Labour Members are divided on whether to oppose the Bill in principle, will you be taking that into account when you consider whether to conform with your usual practice of calling hon. Members alternately across the Chamber?

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If I may correct a quite erroneous assertion by the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon), I have the authority — which is hardly needed, given their well-known position on the subject — on the basis of recent conversations with the TUC steel committee and the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation, to make it clear that they are totally opposed to the Bill, as is Her Majesty's Opposition. There is no amendment because we propose to vote against the Second Reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that all will be revealed during the debate.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it not have been in order for the Chair to select the amendment in the name of my hon. Friends and me or that in the name of the Liberal party?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As I am sure the House knows, Mr. Speaker does not give reasons for selecting or not selecting amendments. I have announced Mr. Speaker's decision to the House, which is that neither amendment has been selected. That does not mean, of course, that the arguments on those amendments cannot be advanced in the debate; they can.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I welcome the unusual exchange through points of order between my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) and the Opposition Front Bench. Like my hon. Friend, I had not received a great deal of opposition from the Labour party before today. We look forward to the arguments of the Opposition. We are sure that force of persuasion in the course of the debate will get them, even at this late stage, to reconsider their position and to vote for the Bill's Second Reading.

In the past, steelmaking as an industry has given rise to high passions and strongly held views. Anybody who pays a visit to a steelworks, as no doubt most of us have, understands the excitement of the steelmaking process. It conjures up memories of the finest days of the industrial revolution and it is an exciting industry with which to be associated. That high public interest has in many ways been the misfortune of the steel industry over the past 40 years.

The industry has attracted the attention of politicians who wish to control the course of the British economy and have repeatedly sought to impose their own strategies on the industry. Those strategies, not surprisingly, were essentially political and took insufficient account of the market forces which govern industry, even nationalised industry. Many of those strategies led to difficulties.

It is high time that British Steel is seen for what it is. It is a key modern industry, of course — but it is essentially a normal commercial enterprise like any other. It is successful and it belongs in the private sector.

The Government believe that good commercial enterprises should be in the private sector because they thrive better there. They are free of Treasury control, free of ministerial control and further away from political lobbying which raises problems now or in future. Management and work force in a private company are faced by the reality that their prosperity and their job security depend on their success in the market and the satisfaction of their customers. They are exposed to commercial disciplines when they raise their capital. The management are free to take the best decisions about how to tackle the market place. The present management of British Steel and those who work for the corporation will be able to tackle the problems of the market place with great effect.

Echoing what my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington said in what might have been a helpful intervention, I think the nationalisation-denationalisation debate is effectively over in this country. Looking back over the past few decades, that is quite remarkable. After 40 years the public have seen that the great state corporations dreamt of by Herbert Morrison are not in practice efficient providers of goods and services.

Steel debates have aroused great passions in the past. Then, my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington never could have made that comment about whether to nationalise or denationalise steel. Steel is one of the great issues that has caused divisions between parties and within parties — and definitely within the Labour party at certain times in the past. I do not think that those old battles will be fought again. I do not wish to provoke the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), but I shall be surprised if any hon. Member speaking for the Labour party threatens to return the corporation to the public sector, if ever there is a Labour Government. If the hon. Gentleman makes such a promise, he will live to regret it when he returns to his main role of trying to reconstruct the Labour party and make it electable again.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend has spoken about the view of the Opposition and the view of the management of the British Steel Corporation. Does my right hon. Friend accept that the management and the workers of the British Steel Corporation at BSC Redcar who live in my constituency look forward to the passage of the Bill? They consider that it will give them greater freedom from political interference and the opportunity, for the first time in recent memory, to take a stake in their own industry and have some control over their future.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is closely in touch with the opinions of steel workers in his constituency—[Interruption.] In due course I shall listen to speeches from the Opposition which will seek to refute what my hon. Friend has said, but I believe that the underlying current of public opinion in Britain on the nationalisation of such industries has changed irreversibly.

I agree strongly with my hon. Friend that steel workers have also undergone a change of opinion. My contacts with steel workers confirm that most of them realise that the change in the steel corporation in recent years have been beneficial, and they look forward to privatisation.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath) rose——

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington) rose——

Mr. Clarke: The debate is showing signs of arousing passions that I thought were extinct in the Labour party. It is good to see history repeating itself.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: If the terms of trade were to change against the steel industry, and if it were suddenly to move into a period of international pressure, which could happen under any Government, and if it suddenly were to be losing a lot of money, does the Minister rule out the possibility of bringing it back into the public sector? Would the Minister's attitude be to let it go and to lose it, or would the state have a new role to play in those conditions?

Mr. Clarke: I must not spend too long discussing issues of principle, though they are interesting and I would like to spend as much time as possible on them. As the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) appreciates, whether a company is nationalised or denationalised, it cannot be immune to movements in trade and changes in the market place.

Essentially, the well-being of a state corporation and its employees or a private sector company and its employees depends upon the market and the conditions of trade and how well the company thrives within them. A private sector company has to react when market conditions move against it. History shows that the great private corporations in Britain are more effective at doing that than the nationalised industries, which are usually constrained by the Government not to react until it is too late. That was the case with British Steel, with disastrous consequences, from which we took some years to recover.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Clarke: In a moment. I should like to make a little progress. No doubt this theme will be raised throughout the debate.

I shall be interested to see whether the Labour party is in favour of renationalising our key modern industries. That would be quite a surprise, even to people who voted Labour at the last election.

The Bill heralds the start of a new chapter in the history of the British steel industry. It will lead to the end of the saga which began in November 1948, when the Minister for Supply the right hon. G. R. Strauss, during the Second Reading of the Iron and Steel Bill, said:

"There is general agreement that this Bill is profoundly important and vehemently controversial . . . the great majority of the people will share the Government's view that if our country is to prosper and our people to live a higher and a better standard of life, this Bill is essential."—[Official Report, 15 November 1948; Vol. 458, c. 53.]

That is what was said 40 years ago, and I put it to the House that the wheel has now turned full circle. The Bill is not vehemently controversial. It is, however, an important Bill that will allow British Steel to escape from the political arena and return to the mainstream of British industry in the private sector.

The Iron and Steel Act 1948 and its successor Acts did not achieve all that was hoped for. Thirty years of intervention one way or another could not keep market forces at bay. This is no criticism of the men and women employed in the industry. Despite their best efforts, they were trapped in an industry which was repeatedly obliged by successive Governments from both sides of this House to take decisions which satisfied politicians and which often did not accord with commercial realities. They were also in part the victims of the downturn in the world economy after the mid 1970s. But as a nationalised industry answerable to politicians the corporation lacked the flexibility to cope with the new challenges imposed by that recession. The net result was that the corporation became increasingly hopelessly ill-equipped to compete in the market place. As hon. Members will recall, in the late 1970s it made increasing losses, culminating in 1979-80, in a net loss of nearly £1·8 billion in one financial year which had to be paid for by the taxpayer. That catastrophe was in large measure attributable to the refusal of previous Governments to allow the corporation to face up to commercial realities and take the necessary decisions, painful though they inevitably were.

When the necessary steps were finally taken, they were sometimes more painful than they need have been if a more gradual, market-oriented approach had been adopted from the outset. I readily acknowledge that the price of BSC's present success has been high in terms of job losses. But it is counterproductive to put our heads in the sand and pretend that market forces do not exist. We cannot ignore the market in the private sector, and we cannot afford to do so in the public sector.

Mr. Cryer: When the Minister talks about the reaction of the steel industry, the reaction is to sack workers. Has the Minister made any calculations about the cost to the public purse of putting workers on the dole, the loss of tax revenue, and the cost of unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit payments to the several hundred thousand people who have been put on the dole as a consequence of his Government's policy?

Mr. Clarke: In the short-term, such costs obviously have been incurred, but what was done was not done as the hon. Gentleman characterises it. Workers were not simply sacked; surplus capacity was closed. Redundant plant that would never again make products of a quality that would sell was closed. There was investment in good quality plant and alteration of working practices to ensure that plant again became competitive.

The hon. Gentleman was a Minister in my present Department when the last Labour Government refused to face up to the fact that anything needed to be done until the very last years of their term of office. For a time Labour Ministers forced the corporation to invest in new capacity based on fanciful market forecasts. The Labour Government pursued such a policy when it was obvious that they were being unrealistic. They refused to turn around until they took some faltering steps by closing the plant at Ebbw Vale and some other plants right at the end of their period of office.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): The Minister spoke at great length about the huge losses that were incurred during the period of public ownership. Will he accept that those huge losses and all the financial sacrifices throughout that period, which have led now to a profit, were made by the taxpayer? Can he explain to the taxpayers why, when their money was used during the hard period to subsidise losses, they are not to get the profits now being made, which are to go to a few of his friends in the City of London?

Mr. Clarke: The taxpayer will get the benefit of the proceeds of privatisation and will get the value of what the company is worth on the market. I have never understood the extraordinary argument which is sometimes made by Opposition Members that billions of pounds' worth of losses made over the years are somehow an asset which the taxpayer now owns instead of being money which the taxpayer has waved goodbye to for ever. The Opposition seem to think that somehow the new owners are capable of compensating the taxpayer for those losses. In a good flotation the taxpayer will get the value of the British Steel Corporation as it now is as a result of what has been achieved over the last few years.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Clarke: I always spend too long opening debates by giving way too often. I will give way again in a few moments, but I should like to proceed on this theme which is obviously of interest to Opposition Members.

I want to explain what has been done since we inherited the problem to get the corporation back to its present much healthier state. Basically, what we have sought to do is to give the corporation greater freedom to get on with its business even though we as Government remain the owners of it on behalf of the state. The corporation has responded magnificently. The enthusiasm and the commitment of the management and the work force have brought their own rewards. The management and the work force—not the Government—have through their own efforts brought about a remarkable transformation in the fortunes of the corporation.

The corporation recently announced half-year profits of nearly £200 million and all the signs are, and all the reports I am getting indicate, that this success will continue. That is an impressive record and I am delighted to pay tribute to all involved in the British Steel Corporation. In many ways I think that what has happened to British Steel is symbolic of what has happened to the British economy as a whole since 1979. The improvement in BSC's performance is all the more creditable for having taken place in the European market, where there is still substantial overcapacity and under a production quota system which has tended to restrict BSC.

The British Steel Corporation is well placed to consolidate its present strong position as the liberalisation of the European steel market proceeds. As the House knows, I shall have the opportunity of referring to where we are in the European steel regime in more detail in a separate debate later.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): The Minister has talked about what happened in 1978-79 and attributed it to a nationalised industry here not understanding market forces. Can he explain what happened to American, German and French steel throughout that period? Did those industries not lose on a grand scale in exactly the same way, even though they were not nationalised?

Mr. Clarke: The losses and the consequences of the crash would have been less if British Steel had not been allowed to charge headlong to the buffers until far too late in the 1970s. Of course, there was a big downturn in steel demand, as I have acknowledged, in the recession, but all the indications were ignored for a long time by Ministers in the Labour Government who pressurised BSC not to take the decisions which were required to try to prepare for what was to come until far too late. The losses were thereby made much worse.

I have been asked how many jobs were lost in consequence. A large number of jobs were lost. I hope that Opposition Members are not about to assert that it would have been a sensible policy for steel to keep all those people on the books and to keep all the plants open. [Interruption.] Of course, it is the point. If Opposition Members intend to oppose the Bill by saying that they think we were wrong to shed all the labour from British Steel, are they really saying, as was said on behalf of the Labour party by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) not long ago, that nationalised industries should largely be looked upon as a way of creating extra jobs and that Government policy on nationalised industries should be to make them take on extra labour as a cure for unemployment? That folly—and it is folly—led British Steel into its problems in the first place. If the Opposition propose to oppose the Bill on the grounds that they still look upon nationalised industries as an employment creating machine, I fear they will take us back to where we used to be.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does not the Minister understand that the impact of what he did on Workington was to give thousands of men no hope for the future? Many of those men have never found work. I would have had no objection to the rundown of the steel industry if at the same time it had been accompanied by real measures of employment which insulated communities like mine from the ravages of unemployment. But it did not happen like that. The Government imposed a huge dollop of unemployment on my constituency and we have never recovered. We have schemes, but they do not give people the sense of identity with an industry which they had in the past. The Minister fails to understand. We wanted change in the steel industry. We understood it, but the Government gave us nothing in return.

Mr. Clarke: That is the issue between us. It is a great tragedy that Workington as a town reached the position where it had no future as a major steelmaking town for a variety of reasons which were not the fault of the people of Workington. Those plants could no longer produce steel that had a sensible prospect of being sold in the market place. Therefore, the future for Workington lies in finding alternative employment and new industrial activity of a kind which will give new hope to the town. As we have come out of the recession it has sometimes been difficult to find new jobs on an adequate scale for towns that are disadvantaged by geography and other problems, as Workington is.

As the British economic revival has speeded up, it has steadily had consequences on deprived regions, including steel towns. The more we succeed in getting growth in the economy and in reviving attitudes which encourage enterprise, the better prospects we have of getting new business and new jobs in towns like Workington. It is happening. Unemployment is falling more quickly in the older industrial parts of the country. If the hon. Gentleman goes to places like Consett, Corby or Scunthorpe, which suffered terrible losses through the closure of steel plants, he will find large numbers of new enterprises, large numbers of new jobs and a whole new future.

One thing which we all appear to be agreed upon and which has to be accepted is that the British Steel Corporation is an example of a flourishing industry. It is a flourishing nationalised industry; it is not because it is nationalised that it is flourishing, but despite that. It is, in fact, an example of an industry which, through considerable efforts by management and workers, has made a success of itself despite being hampered by the inevitable constraints imposed on the commercial freedom of nationalised industries. It is an industry which now knows that its success is dependent on meeting the requirements of its customers. British Steel understands that it operates against a background of world over-capacity in steel and that if it is to prosper in that environment it must place itself in the forefront of new technology, provide the highest quality and operate to the maximum efficiency. This it has done, and will continue to do. British Steel knows from experience that it is no use relying on Governments. That does not work in the longer term.

The time has come to give the corporation the opportunity to stand alone and to give it the flexibility and independence that it needs to face up to the highly competitive international environment.

The Bill is short and is well precedented by other privatisation Acts. Its provisions are, however, somewhat technical and it may help hon. Members if I spend a short time explaining them.

The Bill itself does not bring about privatisation; it will enable privatisation to take place. The Bill provides, in clause 1, that all of the property, rights and liabilities of the corporation will vest in a successor company. That company will be a Companies Act company limited by shares which in the first place will be wholly owned by the Government. Privatisation will take place when the Government go on to exercise their ability to offer their shares for sale to the public.

The successor company will inherit the whole of the corporation's undertaking, both assets and liabilities. Technically it will be a different person in law from the corporation, but it is our intention, which is represented in the Bill, that it would be regarded for all practical commercial purposes as the same company representing an unbroken continuation of the corporation's undertaking. The vesting is required only to enable the flotation to take place, by changing the status of the corporation from a statutory corporation to a Companies Act company. This transformation amounts to a change in the legal constitution of the company, but does not affect the nature of its activity or the extent of its assets and liabilities. I make it clear at the outset, and this is important, that the corporation will not benefit from any special Government handouts in the process of privatisation, nor do we propose that there will be any write-off of debt.

After vesting has taken place, on a day nominated by order of the Secretary of State, which we call the appointed day, British Steel plc will be a public limited company wholly owned by the Government. The Government will then be able to sell its shares at any time, and decide the exact timing of that sale according to market conditions and the performance of the company. But for various technical reasons, including the passage of this Bill through both Houses of Parliament, I do not anticipate that it will be possible to contemplate selling those shares until the end of this year, at the earliest.

The corporation will not be dissolved immediately after vesting has taken place. It will continue in existence as a shell. This is necessary because some of the corporation's assets and liabilities are located overseas, and are governed by foreign law. United Kingdom law might not therefore be effective in securing the vesting of all those assets immediately on the appointed day.

The corporation will stay in existence until it has taken such steps as may be required to secure the effectiveness of the vesting of the assets and liabilities in the successor company. As soon as this process has been completed, the corporation may be dissolved by the Secretary of State by order, under clause 10. We are calling the period between vesting and dissolution of the corporation the transitional period. During that period, the corporation will have no powers other than those necessary to effect vesting of its overseas assets.

The successor company will require a capital structure that fits with the requirements of the Companies Act. Clauses 2, 3 and 7 of the Bill provide for that capital structure. At present the corporation has an accumulated deficit on its profit and loss account. That is not debt, as the corporation does not owe the money in its profit and loss account to anyone; it is simply a record of past trading losses that reflects the erosion of the original capital base of the company through its trading losses. It is open, in the private sector, to any Companies Act company to go to the court and apply for a reduction in its capital to write off such accumulated losses. The amount of capital shown on the balance sheet after a restructuring of that kind will then more accurately represent the value of the net assets of the company.

As a statutory corporation, BSC is unable to go to the court to apply for a reduction of its capital, so that will be authorised by the Secretary of State under clause 2. That clause further provides for the extinguishment of the public dividend capital that remains after the reduction. That will not, however, result in taxpayers' money being lost, because, in exchange, securities will be issued to the Secretary of State or to the Treasury, as his nominees, at his direction under clause 3.

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Clarke: I should like to finish with this point. Only the public dividend capital will be extinguished. The successor company will be obliged to continue to meet the terms of any loans from the Government or outside bodies that are vested in it.

Sir Giles Shaw: On the question of treatment of the company's debt and the accumulated loss, I understand my right hon. and learned Friend's reluctance to eliminate the debt. He is describing the somewhat complex and awkward proposal of a company that is about to float being required to continue to take a debt of the order of £700 million, and presumably accumulated losses substantially greater than that. Does my right hon and learned Friend think that there will be difficulty in achieving the return on the assets, which I believe the company clearly will have?

Mr. Clarke: It will require capital restructuring. I have been endeavouring to describe the nature of capital restructuring that the Bill will facilitate. The accumulated losses on the profit and loss account will need to be written off, in just the way that a private sector company with this kind of trading background would seek to have authority to do, by an application under the Companies Act.

What we are not intending to have is straighforward debt write-offs. That would amount to an attempt to subsidise the corporation by the back door, which we have no intention of doing. We want to give the corporation a proper capital structure. It would be behaving as we would expect it to do if it was in the private sector and able to operate under the Companies Act, by seeking to get its capital structure to reflect its present capital assets and liabilities, and to wipe off these long-standing losses in the profit and loss account.

To the extent that the nominal value of the securities issued to the Government in exchange for cancellation of the Government's investment in the corporation is less than the value of the capital extinguished, the balance will go to make up a statutory reserve of the successor company. That is specified in clause 7. The nominal value of the shares will have to be no more than their sale issue price at the time of the flotation, because the Companies Act forbids the issue of shares at a discount. In practice, it is usual to set a nominal value significantly lower than the anticipated issue price.

Private sector companies generally have a mixture of share and loan capital and reserves. The process of restructuring the balance sheet of the corporation is complementary to the vesting provisions of the Bill. Instead of a nationalised corporation funded by public dividend capital, the successor company will be a Companies Act company, with capital and reserves similar to other Companies Act companies.

The remaining provisions of the Bill are subsidiary and technical. Clause 4 allows the Government to invest in securities of the successor company to maintain the proportionate level of any residual shareholding, if one is retained. The Government's securities in the successor company may be held by nominees, under clause 5. The Government may fix a limit on its future investment in the successor company, under clause 6. Clause 8 provides for the Government to lend money to the successor company while it remains in the public sector. Clause 9 allows the Government to impose temporary restrictions on the borrowing of the successor company. Clause 11 contains provisions relating to taxation of the successor company. Clauses 12 to 17 and schedules 1 to 3 contain other supplementary provisions.

In deciding whether to invest in the new private sector company, potential investors will obviously have to form their own judgment about the track record of the corporation and, in particular, the prospects of the new company. When I came to the House last December and announced our plans for the privatisation of the corporation, I was able to report the good news about the corporation's impressive half year profit. I regard that figure as a reflection of all the hard work that has been put in by the employees of the corporation, which helps to make it one of the most profitable steel producers in the world. Its productivity has improved every year since 1980.

Its selling prices have risen much more slowly than inflation. Exports are up in absolute terms and as a share of total sales. Capital expenditure has increased steadily since 1982, and customer service has been given much higher priority than before. All that has resulted in great improvements in the quality of the product and the efficiency with which it is produced and dispatched. The results are plain for all to see, and they are all the more impressive for having been achieved in a difficult market.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Is the Minister aware that at a recent meeting with the parliamentary Labour party the chairman and chief executive of the corporation said that, after it was privatised, they would have to reduce the proportion of material exported, because its price was so poor that it would not enable them to maximise profitability?

Mr. Clarke: That would depend on movements in international steel prices. We shall have to see what happens to steel prices when European quotas come to an end, as I am sure they will in the next few years; and possibly in six months' time—I shall be dealing with that later tonight—and also what progress is made in getting rid of the excess capacity in other parts of the world.

The fact is that the record of achievement that I am reading out has not been achieved by other European steel corporations, many of which still have vast overcapacity. Once that excess capacity has been reduced, we shall see how the markets shape up.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The Minister has clearly recognised the enormous contribution to the achievements to which he has referred by the work force. In view of that contribution to success, could he not give some reassurance to the work force, before he sits down, that their terms and conditions of service will be no worse under the private operation than they have been heretofore?

Mr. Clarke: The employees of the corporation will continue under the contracts of employment that they have now. As I have said, for all purposes, the new company will be the successor, with all the assets, liabilities and contractual obligations of the previous corporation. I can happily give that assurance.

I hope—and I am not pretending to describe how it can be done today—that we shall enter into discussions to reassure the work force that their accrued pension rights will not in any way be affected. We shall no doubt have plenty of opportunity to discuss pensions between now and the flotation, perhaps in Standing Committee, if not in discussions. It is also our intention, as everybody knows, to move on to the prospect of offering the employees—who, I quite agree with the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), have made a substantial contribution to the present position—the prospect of having some shares in the successor company and a share of future profits.

The corporation knows that, if it is to survive and progress and protect its business as a whole, it must continue to change and adapt to suit the needs of the market. To do that, it must continue to take decisions on a commercial basis. Fortunately, here again, we have been able to give reassuring news to the House. BSC has been able to give its commercial judgment of the future for its five integrated plant, including Ravenscraig, which has given rise in recent years to a quite unnecessary level of political controversy north of the border.

Dr. Reid rose——

Mr. Clarke: I am going to say more on Ravenscraig, so perhaps I had better leave Scottish interventions for a moment or two.

I remind the House that the corporation has been able to say that, subject to market conditions, it expects that there will continue to be a commercial requirement for the steelmaking and continuing casting capacity of the corporation's five integrated plants for at least the next seven years. The hot strip mill raises other problems because there is surplus capacity in hot strip at the moment throughout Europe, and British hot strip mills are running at very low capacity indeed. But, even there, because of the strength of BSC's present position, having reviewed the position thoroughly, the corporation has concluded, on the basis of commercial judgment, that the Ravenscraig mill will continue to operate until at least 1989. /Interruption.]

I look forward to hearing which plants the Opposition are prepared to guarantee against market conditions, which ones they are going to reopen and how they are going to put the clock back to the days when BSC was operated on the basis on which they operated it.

The commercial judgments that I have given are some of the best news that has been given to people working in the Scottish steel industry for very many years and they reflect the advances that I have described.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South) rose——

Mr. Clarke: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment. I am aware, of course, that a report published last week by the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray), with the support of the local Labour party and his council, tried to cast doubts on the future of Ravenscraig. I have to say, as an Englishman who now makes frequent visits to Scotland, that I have the greatest difficulty sometimes in coming to terms with the nature of the Scottish political debate. The Scottish Labour party appears to thrive on trying to represent to the world that Scottish industry is in a desperate state of decline and is loss-making. When it gets the commercial assurances that I gave a moment ago, which I have described as among the best news that has been given to the population of Motherwell and west central Scotland for many years, the Scottish Labour party spends its time desperately trying to find someone who will cast doubts on the good news, no doubt to reinforce the unworthy position that it took in the last election when it tried to represent Scottish industry as on the verge of collapse and its members as the only rescuers of it. I see absolutely no point in members of the Scottish Labour party going to outside bodies which cannot have full access to all the commercial information available to BSC to try to rubbish good news about the commercial prospects of the steelworks.

Dr. Bray: Will the Chancellor acknowledge that the so-called undertaking, which reads:

"Subject to market conditions, there will be a commercial requirement for steelmaking at Ravenscraig for at least the next seven years", is not an undertaking at all, but an economic forecast? And, given BSC's forecasting record, does he think that it means very much?

Mr. Clarke: The previous three-year undertaking was subject to market conditions. Of course it is subject to market conditions. It is the best commercial judgment that can be made. There is no other sensible proposition to put forward. The hon. Gentleman has great expertise in economic policy and is one of the more erudite Members of the House. If he suddenly got to his feet and gave in ringing tones a guarantee about the future of an industrial plant regardless of market conditions and commercial considerations, he would destroy his reputation with me and with most other people. I should regard him as an idiot. Any politician who says that his political party can guarantee the future of an industrial enterprise regardless of market conditions is an idiot. Anybody who believes such a guarantee has only to look back over the history of nationalised and private sector companies in the last few years to know that such guarantees are worthless pieces of paper, given by people who do not understand how the steel or any other industry works.

The reason why I criticise the hon. Member for seeking to undermine what he calls the undertaking is that it is extremely good news that the management, which is in the best position to know and at the moment is the most successful management in steelmaking in western Europe, is able to give as its considered commercial judgment that it will require steelmaking at Ravenscraig for the next seven years — subject, of course, as any sensible management has to say, to market conditions remaining satisfactory.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): In view of what he is saying, will the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland gave a guarantee that he had an assurance that the mill would stay open for three years, and that he was very proud to boast about his record on that? It is well known that the management of British Steel wanted to close Ravenscraig. If it had done so, how could Ravenscraig now be there to contribute profits? Was not that guarantee necessary and beneficial to the steel industry?

Mr. Clarke: The assurance on which my right hon. Friend relied and, to the extent that I was pressed about it, I relied as well when I went to Scotland during the election, was subject—/Interruption.] No doubt I left a trail of devastation behind me, but on the assurance, I was on very sound ground. Not only was that three-year assurance expressly subject to market conditions, but it turned out, despite all the doubts heaped upon it by the Opposition, to be a valid assurance. It has been lived up to, to the deep disappointment of the Scottish Labour and Liberal parties. The assurance expired at the end of three years, but was replaced by the much better assurance that we now have, that Ravenscraig steelmaking is required, in the commercial judgment of the corporation, for the next seven years, so long as market conditions allow.

Mr. Salmond: With regard to the Minister's foray into Scotland during the general election, I seem to recall that on a previous occasion he said that it had substantially benefited the Opposition parties. The right hon. and learned Gentleman referred to worthless pieces of paper. Was he referring to such things as golden shares? Is not the scepticism in Scotland regarding the Minister's seven-year guarantee for Ravenscraig based on a realistic assessment of the investment patterns in the steel industry, which most certainly leave Ravenscraig vulnerable?

Mr. Clarke: There is a £15-million investment going into coal injection plant at Ravenscraig at the moment. Investment decisions are best made by the commercial management of a company, having regard to its market needs and its judgment of the best way of serving them. The moment politicians of whatever party — Scottish National, Liberal, Labour or Conservative—start to get deeply immersed in the investment decisions of a corporation, one gets into difficulty. While this corporation continues to be nationalised, all major investment decisions above a certain size have to come to me and, unless there is some obvious flaw in them, naturally I shall tend to approve those proposals by the corporation between now and the date of flotation.

One thing that I shall certainly not do is start arguing with the corporation that its proposed investments should be altered for political reasons contrary to the commercial interests of the corporation, because I believe that, if it acts contrary to the commercial interests of the corporation, it acts contrary to the interests of the work force. If the work force at Ravenscraig looks at the assurances that it has had, which have been lived up to, it should be very cheered by the assurance which it now has of the seven-year future in the circumstances that we have given.

I do not think that the hon. Member for Motherwell, North is doing a service to British Steel or the Scottish economy as a whole by seeking to advertise the economy of his region as being much more fraught than it is in the judgment of the major employer in the town.

I have looked at the report, and it recommended that the Government should consider—and I stress that the recommendation was no more than that we should consider it — the separate sale of the plants at Ravenscraig, Dalzell and Shotton. I emphasise Shotton, because this is sometimes referred to as a separate Scottish privatisation. It is nothing of the kind. It is a Scottish and a part of Wales privatisation. Perhaps a Welsh hon. Member will catch your eye during the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I understand that the trade unions at Shotton are horrified by the suggestion. There is not much Welsh support for the amazing idea that Shotton should be swept into a separate company.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clarke: As I have referred to the hon. Gentleman's constituency, I had better give way.

Mr. Jones: I can only say at this stage that if I am lucky enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall be able to give the House the view of the Shotton steel workers. I would rather it was me than the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but in the interests of brevity I must tell him that my steel workers wish very much to remain in one unit with the BSC if there is privatisation.

Mr. Clarke: That is rather as I thought, and the hon. Gentleman will be glad to know that that was my reaction to the report. We considered such an option—indeed a whole range of options for dividing the corporation up or privatising it as a whole—in detail with our merchant bank advisers and with the British Steel Corporation before our initial decision to privatise it as a single entity. I am not questioning the bona fides of Arthur Young, which is a reputable and expert consultancy company. However, it did not have access to some of the commercial information. BSC could not be expected to reveal that information because it would have been of value to BSC's competitors had it leaked out—as tends to happen even with the best will in the world. Nothing in the report issued last week cast any doubt on the conclusion that we had already reached on the basis of the better information to which we had access—that it was in the best interest of BSC, its work force and, indeed, the taxpayer to maintain the corporation in its present form into the private sector. I should make it clear that it remains the Government's intention to privatise the corporation as a single entity.

The privatised British Steel will use its independence to respond even more effectively——

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): Before the Minister passes on from Ravenscraig, let me ask him whether the seven-year guarantee — perhaps assurance would be a better word — will be repeated in the prospectus of the company at privatisation?

Mr. Clarke: Subject to there being no sudden changes in market forces or commercial judgment between now and then, the answer is yes. We said when it was issued that it would in effect be reflected in the prospectus.

The privatised British Steel will use its independence to respond even more effectively to the needs of its customers. By doing so it will contribute enormously to the economy, through both its domestic activity and its export earnings. The British Steel Corporation belongs in the private sector and it is there that it will best prosper. The Bill represents a historic opportunity and I commend it to the House.

5.32 pm

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): The Government's reasons for bringing forward legislation are often obscure, but never more so than in this case. None of the reasons advanced by the Minister, either today or on other occasions, stands up to examination. His difficulty is that the true reasons are reasons of dogma, partiality and cowardice, and therefore cannot be stated.

The Minister puts his case in terms of the industry's success. It is that success, he says, that now makes privatisation both possible and desirable. Yet that argument is a total non-sequitur. There is no causal connection between success and privatisation. Success has been brought about with no help from privatisation and does not depend on privatisation for its continuation.

The success is of course undeniable, and it is very welcome. In terms of productivity and profitability — though not in terms of output or market share — the steel industry has indeed recovered and is now among the most successful in the world. Let us be clear how that success has been achieved. It has been achieved at very considerable expense to the taxpayer and as the consequence of very great sacrifices and contributions by the work force.

The Minister declined to estimate in his statement of 3 December how much the taxpayer has contributed over recent years, but £5 billion seems a not unreasonable estimate and that is confirmed in a written answer given by the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 15 December. In other words, the public purse has provided the necessary investment on which the industry's recovery has depended. There is no way that private owners would have been willing or able to provide the money needed to carry the industry through difficult times and to emerge stronger at the other end. If public investment was the precondition not only of the industry's success but of its survival, experience, and particularly the experience of the past 10 years, also gives the lie to the argument that the industry cannot function efficiently under public ownership. It is precisely under public ownership that the industry has made its gains in productivity and efficiency. It does not need privatisation because essential improvements are still awaited. They have already been achieved, and it is not possible to argue, on the basis of experience, that they cannot be maintained or extended under public ownership.

As so often with the Government's privatisation measures in recent years, this privatisation is produced to take advantage of industrial and commercial success, not to provide it. The steel industry provides perhaps clearer evidence of that than any other. The history of the industry shows clearly that it is under private ownership that the industry gets into difficulties, fails to invest, takes refuge in price cartels and begins to operate against the public and national interest. Under public ownership it has made the necessary investment, put its house in order and begun to serve the national interest and guarantee its future; so much for the argument that privatisation is needed to grapple with the industry's problems.

Mr. Coleman: Would my hon. Friend like to contemplate how the British steel industry could have succeeded had we not brought into public ownership the 14 predecessor companies in 1967? Does my hon. Friend think that had those companies remained the British steel industry could have succeeded in modern conditions?

Mr. Gould: My hon. Friend is right. The investment record — in particular the investment record of those private companies in 1967 — shows exactly what would have happened to the steel industry in the difficult conditions that it faced subsequently had it remained in private ownership.

If there is no argument from practicality, the Government's real reasons must be those of dogma — a belief in the principle, without reference to practical evidence, that it is simply wrong for the Government to be involved in the ownership and management of the steel industry. Yet that argument is equally unsupported by reason or practice. The notion that the Government can stand aloof from the future course of the steel industry is plainly nonsense. That is mainly because the industry is by its very nature extremely cyclical. Private owners will be very happy with their investment as long as the industry, its markets and profits are buoyant, but private owners quickly become disenchanted when the industry has to face tough times. It is then that the necessary investment fails to be made, and the industry gets into further trouble. Only public ownership provides the vision and long-term approach to make the counter-cyclical investment that is required.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Will the hon. Gentleman say whether it is now Labour party policy to renationalise the steel industry after it has been denationalised?

Mr. Gould: Of course, I expected that question to be asked at some point, although it is wholly inappropriate to this part of my speech. However, for the reasons that I have yet to develop fully, Opposition Members and the trade union movement strongly believe that the steel industry is most appropriately owned in a form of public ownership. We shall decide that form and the order of priorities by which it is to be secured when we return to power and we have no intention of having our agenda dictated by Conservative Members this afternoon.

It is impossible to expect the private purse to finance the investment that the industry requires when the going is tough. That is inevitably so.

The industry's current and foreseeable need is for annual investment amounting to about £300 million. That can be financed at present levels of profits, but, as one of my hon. Friends said earlier, it would require only a slight change in market conditions or comparative costs to throw that into jeopardy.

The industry is cyclical because it requires substantial investment in expensive plant to compete, and it can provide a return on that investment only if it is used at or near capacity. If it is required to run below capacity for any length of time, unit costs rise alarmingly and profitability is immediately threatened. That threat occurs all too frequently because the industry is sensitive not only to movements in its own costs and to the intense competition which it inevitably faces, but to the level of demand in the industrial economy as a whole.

A cold summer can mean a lower than expected demand for tinplate because less beer is sold; an industrial dispute in the car industry can reduce demand for hot rolled coil; and that is to say nothing of such matters as movements in the exchange rate which, at the time of the 1980 steel dispute over a possible 2 per cent. increase in overall costs, managed to raise British prices by 40 per cent. over Japanese prices without anyone in the Government appearing to notice. Of course, the customer did notice.

That vulnerability to cyclical movements is exacerbated by the international, and particularly the EEC, context in which the industry has to operate. The EEC concludes in its latest report that there is still 30 million tonnes overcapacity in the EEC and that a further 80,000 jobs will have to be shed. The present reaction of the British industry is, understanably, to take the high ground — to say that in view of its present strength it is not dependent on EEC regulation of the industry and that it could well expect to survive and flourish in a free market. That is why the net of the quota system is widely welcomed, with our support, as providing a real opportunity for the British steel industry to make progress. There is certainly a powerful case at present for resisting any further pressure for cuts. We only wish that the Government had taken that line a little earlier because the British industry has already taken its medicine and a good deal more.

No one can be confident that the present advantages that we enjoy in terms of cost and efficiency can be maintained over a long period, particularly given the uncertainties introduced by privatisation. It is impossible to say that within a short time, for the cyclical reasons that

[Mr. Gould]

I have given, we shall not again be fighting for the industry's survival. In those circumstances, the notion that the Government can wash their hands of the industry, particularly at a time when other EEC Governments are becoming increasingly involved with their steel industries, simply cannot be sustained.

The question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) is relevant and must be answered. What would the Government's attitude be if they found the EEC context and market conditions generally as adverse as they have been at certain times during the past decade? Would they stand by and refuse to intervene or, as some of us suspect, would they be forced, for the reasons that I am about to deploy, to renationalise the industry, as they have done in other cases, notably Rolls-Royce? We are again forced to the conclusion that private ownership is at best a fair-weather friend. The Government and the taxpayer will again be called to the rescue, in both an EEC and a national context, when the going gets rough, as assuredly it will.

We can be confident of that conclusion because the steel industry cannot be allowed, when in private hands, to follow the course which would normally be followed when an industry ceases to be viable. The steel industry may, as the Minister explained, no longer be quite the commanding height that it once was — many of its customers have since changed to other materials — but let there be no misunderstanding that it remains a fundamental underpinning of our industrial economy and of great strategic importance to our future development. It is unthinkable that it should be allowed to disappear, be substantially reduced in size or pass into non-British hands. The loss of a sizeable indigenous steel industry would be a body blow to the British economy and would render us incapable of providing from within our own resources the basic materials needed by our armed forces in time of war. Public ownership remains the only guarantee that the steel industry will be sustained.

If the Government's ideological prejudices provide no acceptable rationale for the measure, their other reasons are no less disreputable. The privatisation will provide the usual bonanza to private interests who, having allowed the taxpayer to pick up that sizeable bill for so long, will now step in and expect to pick up the profits. That is to say nothing of the huge fees and commissions for which City institutions are already queuing up and which they will expect to charge for their part in this charade.

It may be, too, that the Government are keen to privatise because they are anxious to put a privatisation programme, much undermined by the British Petroleum fiasco, back on the rails, politically and financially. But it can surely hardly be the case, given all the boasting about how much money the Chancellor now has at his disposal, that the sale is needed to raise the cash. But some explanation is required for the unseemly haste with which this privatisation has been rushed forward.

It is only a matter of months ago that Ministers and British Steel were talking of a three or four-year time scale for privatisation, following a well-established track record of profitability. What has happened to change that perspective and to produce the current urgency? Do the Government know something that we do not? Is some window of opportunity about to close? Why have past statements been so quickly jettisoned? The Minister looks puzzled, but why is the measure now being brought forward with such haste when it was mentioned neither in the manifesto of less than a year ago nor in the Queen's Speech of a few months ago? We need some explanation for this sudden volte face.

It is for all those reasons that we believe that privatisation is a disastrous option to take. It subjects the industry to disruption and uncertainty at a time when it needs to build on the successes achieved by the present regime. It offers short-term profits to private investors at the expense of a fair return to the taxpayer and at considerable risk to the industry's future investment needs. Moreover, it does so without any measureable benefit to the industry itself. That is why we oppose the Bill. Let there be no doubt that we oppose the Bill outright. We shall fight it, with total support from the trade unions involved, throughout its passage through the House.

Quite apart from the threat to the industry as a whole, and the quite unnecessary jeopardising of its future, there is a specific threat to the future of the plants at Ravenscraig and Dalzell under the privatisation proposals. The Minister, in his statement to the House on 3 December, gave what he claimed was an assurance about their future. But, as has already been pointed out, a moment's consideration of what he said on that occasion will show that any apparent guarantee was illusory. He made it clear that the only firm guarantee about Ravenscraig runs out at the end of the year, in 10 months' time, and any further decision on its future will be made by the new private owners on commercial grounds and according to market conditions which they themselves, by virtue of their plans for reinvestment, or rather the absence of them, will largely control.

As I have already explained, the considerations to which the Minister is now prepared to entrust Ravenscraig and its future would have meant the closure of the whole industry at almost any time over the past decade. The only thing that has now changed is that the Government clearly hope that by divesting themselves of the industry through privatisation they will also succeed in divesting themselves of the political responsibility for what happens to it and its constituent parts. It is clearly the Government's hope that they will be able to leave to private owners and market forces a decision which, politically, they have been too lacking in courage to take themselves.

I must warn the Government that they will not succeed in that hope. Even if the Bill proceeds, I put the Government on notice that they will be held responsible for the future of the 11,000 jobs and £100 million worth of wealth-creating capacity in Scotland which depends on Ravenscraig. We shall not accept arguments to the effect that those issues are entirely a matter for commercial judgment. They remain issues of the greatest importance to the economic well-being of a whole community and as such their resolution is the Government's responsibility. That community, with the full support of the Labour movement, will fight, both politically and industrially, to save the plant, the industry and those jobs, and to make the Government face their responsibilities.

If the Government think that they can shuffle off their responsibilities by claiming that the decisions are for private owners and have nothing to do with them, they have another think coming. [Interruption.] The Minister may say that that is an empty threat. We shall see, but the fact that he can use such a phrase shows very well what is in Ministers' minds.

We want to know what the Minister will do when, as is all too clearly presaged in the weasel words of his 3 December statement, the private owners propose to close Ravenscraig. We want bankable guarantees, which the Minister ought to give now, on the maintenance of those plants and the reinvestment programmes that will be needed to keep them viable. Other specific questions need answers. The Minister has provided at least partial answers to some of the questions that I intended to raise, particularly on the writing off of debts, and I shall be interested to pursue that with him in Committee. However, there are other questions to be answered.

What provision is to be made to ensure that control of the industry remains in British hands? Is the Government's apparent indifference to the issue on the same level as their indifference to the growing Kuwaiti stake in BP, or does the Minister accept the strategic argument that makes British ownership and control of the industry essential in our industrial and defence interests? If so, what does he propose to do to safeguard the position? He has said nothing about that today. Will it be a golden share, or is the experience with Britoil too painful to repeat? Will he take a Rolls-Royce solution and fix a limit for foreign shareholdings, at 15 per cent. or a similar figure — something he appeared to rule out on 3 December?

What has been done—this question was raised by my right hon and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris)—to safeguard the pensions interests of the work force? Is there to be a rejigging of pension arrangements to suit the interests of new private owners, as we have seen in some other privatisations? What date is proposed for the flotation, and what form will it take? What is to be said about EEC quotas in the prospectus, and what will be the initial target investment level? The Government's plans for the industry — I assume that they must have plans—are meaningless unless we receive some answers to those questions.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will my hon. Friend also press the Minister vigorously about what will happen if the new company starts to make losses? The national interest is at stake. Steel is a strategic industry, and I feel that we are entitled to know what will happen to it. Will it be allowed to go to the wall in sectors in which the product is of strategic importance, or will the Government intervene? If they do intervene, in what form will they be willing to do so? They must have considered those matters in advance.

Mr. Gould: My hon. Friend is right. This is the nub of the issue, and we have yet to hear anything sensible, helpful or constructive from the Minister on what is a vital and central problem.

We also need to know what safeguards will be provided for consumers and steel interests against unfair exploitation by British Steel in private ownership of its near monopoly. What guarantee will we have that British Steel will not become more and more a steel importer and marketer, rather than a steel producer?

The Bill is the product of suspect ideology, political cowardice and the Government's familiar readiness to provide goodies for their friends in the City at the expense of those whose livelihoods depend on a continuing and thriving steel industry. It is a product of a typically short-term attitude—the attitude that says that it is right to cash in on short-lived profitability rather than to make long-term provision for the industry's investment needs. It is the product of a cavalier approach to national security and to our industrial future, and of a blind faith in market forces which, as bitter experience should by now have taught us, is a recipe for disaster. It is because we care about our industrial future, about the steel industry and, above all, about those who work in it and have made such a contribution to its current success that we will oppose the Bill.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Many hon. Members with strong constituency interests are hoping to speak. I appeal for brief contributions.

5.54 pm

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): It is interesting to hear the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) give such a weighty address about his views on nationalisation, denationalisation or renationalisation. I wonder whether he would use the same language when speaking to the Ford motor company in his constituency to find out its views on the long continuity of employment— to which, no doubt, he is wholly devoted.

It comes ill from the hon. Gentleman to castigate the Government, and to accuse my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster of dogma, partiality and cowardice, when we have just heard a fine demonstration from the hon. Gentleman of all three. My hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt), in a telling intervention, asked the hon. Gentleman what kind of policy he would pursue. I think that we can agree that the hon. Gentleman genuflected to dogma; he certainly referred with pride to nationaliation as a major part of the historical development of British industry. He was clearly partial as well, because he gave a partial response to my hon. Friend by suggesting that there would be some kind of public ownership, and he showed complete cowardice by refusing altogether to give any cast-iron assurance or guarantee on what exact form of public ownership would be used.

We have heard the Opposition Benches erupting into enthusiasm to try to obtain some kind of copper-bottomed guarantee on the future of a certain steel works in a certain part of the United Kingdom. I think that the hon. Member for Dagenham has let the side down pretty badly in entering the debate with a series of half truths. Not a single Scottish voter will sleep safely in his bed, wherever it may be.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has brought a most important measure to the House, and I congratulate him on his courage in doing so. He is wholly right not only in what he seeks to do, but in the manner in which he seeks to do it. It is amazing that the transformation of the British Steel Corporation has achieved such a turnaround from a scale of loss to a scale of profit unmatched in the private sector during a comparable period. I echo the view expressed on both sides of the House, as well as by my right hon. and learned Friend, that that significant achievement was only partially due to the Government's policy towards the British Steel Corporation. It was largely due to the fact that the management and work forces in the various plants took on board the crucial importance, following the lean and desperate uncompetitive years of the 1970s, of refashioning their operation — of going for productivity, customer satisfaction, price and investment. The management of BSC, led vigorously and effectively by chairmen of various kinds, have brought the company to its present profitable state.

I must pay a particular tribute to the corporation's existing chairman, the old anvil-hammerer of Wagnerian opera Sir Robert Scholey. Even he must now feel that the achievement of a privatised corporation is within his sights after so many years of trying.

Mr. Coleman: Let me put to the hon. Gentleman the same question that I put to my hon. Friend. How does he think that the achievement would have been possible if the 14 companies that were taken into public ownership in 1967 had still been operating in the industry?

Sir Giles Shaw: I think that the hon. Gentleman has provided the answer to his own question. Obviously, if those 14 companies had not been taken into public ownership, there would not be a Bill taking their ownership back into the private sector. I am quite willing to argue with him that the 14 companies might well have been replaced by 24 other companies specialising in the production of British steel and services.

We have to satisfy Opposition Members on the question whether the security of state control will somehow guarantee jobs and development to a greater degree than would the private sector. Sir Robert and his team have now reached a point at which it is possible to privatise the corporation, and I am glad to learn from my right hon. and learned Friend that that could happen in months rather than years. The sooner it happens, the better.

I pay tribute to my right hon. and learned Friend for deciding to privatise the corporation in whole. The British Steel Corporation, as presently constituted, is a major asset for the United Kingdom. However, its prime role in the marketing of steel and steel products is essentially not a United Kingdom role, but a European and international role. The only future for the British Steel Corporation, whether in public or private hands, is to be able to compete Europe-wide in a market that is sufficiently large for the corporation's present share to look comfortingly towards successive periods of growth. If my memory serves me correctly, it has a 2 per cent. share of the European steel market—that is a low share.

From the point of view of the corporation's future—I trust that it will be in private hands—Europe will be where its future competitive growth will mainly lie. There are two reasons for that. The first is the huge contribution that has been made by the work force and the management to restructure the corporation from within. The second reason relates to the consequences of those ghastly years of contraction, of obsolete plants being closed and, if my memory serves me right, of the loss of more than 50,000 jobs from the numbers employed in the heydays of the 1970s. All that has left the British corporation with a much higher rate of productivity and competitiveness than any of its European competitors. However, its only prospect of competing in the European Community is to maintain its present scale of operation.

I hope that none of my hon. Friends disputes the principle of the Bill. It would be sheer folly to divide and break up the corporation from its present size. Looking around the European market, at the giants of Thyssen and at the French and Italian companies and beyond them to Nippon, Pittsburgh and Bethlehem, one sees that those huge companies have grown to significant sizes and it is not possible to compete with them in the international arena for steel products and steel production unless the United Kingdom component is of a comparable size. Therefore, the single structure that my right hon. and learned Friend has chosen is the correct one.

I believe that the window of opportunity to which the hon. Member for Dagenham was looking is crucially to be observed. It is a window through which to see that as we move to a termination of the quota system within the European Community, the British Steel Corporation, in private hands, will be able to develop a significantly increased share of the European market. I must press my right hon. and learned Friend on the European issue. Obviously, I understand that that will be more closely addressed in the following debate, but perhaps my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will at least say that the background to the Bill must be that the steady and, I trust, orderly return to a market in steel and steel products in the European Community should be the proper context in which a privatised corporation can work. If that context is not both orderly and sensibly arranged, it will be difficult to make full use of the new assets that we possess in a steel company with high rates of productivity, competitive prices and a much improved product basis.

I sincerely hope that the development of a free market in steel will be accompanied by significant reductions in overcapacity of other member states. As the hon. Member for Dagenham rightly pointed out, the British Steel Corporation has substantially reduced its overcapacity in past years. With the possible exception of rolling mill overcapacity, it has eliminated all the overcapacity that previously existed, at vast cost to the taxpayer and vast sacrifice to its work forces. If we are to move successfully into the private sector, it is crucial that the European market for steel should likewise address itself to its overcapacity before the British Steel Corporation can rightly look forward to a more profitable future.

We face somewhat difficult positions in relation to debt and accumulated profit and loss. I understand my right hon. and learned Friend's point. I recall that the European provisions on competitive practices are such that a significant debt write-off might be seen as anti-competitive. However, I beg my right hon. and learned Friend to examine more carefully British Steel's position in terms of both accumulated debt and accumulated loss to see whether there is a formula whereby some of the indebtedness from either side can be reduced prior to placing the corporation in the market.

I would not wish shareholders or investors to find that their first act might be trying to write off from generated revenue huge amounts of accumulated loss. They may well make application for a redress of the balance sheet, as my right hon. and learned Friend suggests, but if this is a form of privatisation, it is a pretty miserable form of privatisation which has an albatross of that size slung round its neck.

In my judgment, the Bill is correctly timed. It is the correct decision. It is not a decision based on simple dogma or even on the expediency which the Government may have wished to use when finding themselves with a corporation on their hands which has made profits so rapidly. It is in the correct order of magnitude that the corporation should take its place among the largest private steelmakers in the world. I wish it well.

6.5 pm

Mr. Bruce: If my calculations are correct, the Bill represents the fifth change of ownership for the steel industry in just over 40 years. Therefore, in some ways the House may not be surprised when I say that I hope that it will be the last, although some of the questions raised suggest that it may not be quite as definitive as that. It is apparent that the Bill has been brought forward in something of a hurry compared with the original proposals, for reasons that have not been fully explained to the House, other than that the industry now appears to be in profit and, of course, the privatisation of electricity looks like slipping further down the schedule, and the Government wish to ensure a rolling programme.

Speaking after the hon. Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw), it is worth recalling that profitability has been achieved at a substantial price. That price would not have been freely available to a private sector corporation. I am referring to the public write-off of a £3·5 billion debt, which has been accompanied by dramatic reductions in capacity and in the work force. The British Steel Corporation employed 24 per cent. of the total number of people employed in the steel industries in the European Community in 1975, but now accounts for only 14 per cent. of employees. That demonstrates the degree to which the British Steel Corporation has reduced capacity at a far faster rate than any of our European competitors. If it is any small consolation to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, that is why I wholeheartedly agree with him that we have carried our share of the cut and should not have further quotas imposed upon us. Indeed, we should be able to benefit from a lifting of quotas which, I hope, will proceed rapidly.

It is a fair reply to the interjection from the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) to say that it is a reasonable challenge to the Labour party to ask whether it would renationalise the British Steel Corporation. It has certainly never been our view that one should wish to commit to change and to reverse policies for ideological reasons. However, the House must confront the possibility that the steel industry is crucial to the bedrock of our economy. What would a Conservative Government of the present complexion do if, after the flotation, given the considerable difficulties that steel has faced nationally and internationally over the years and the investment that has taken place, especially in Third world countries, our privatised steel corporation got into substantial financial difficulties?

I agree that nationalisation is not the only solution. However, I hope that whoever replies to the debate will give the House an assurance that there is a recognition that the strategic core of steelmaking capacity must be retained. I agree absolutely that ideally, in all reasonable circumstances, that core should be efficient, profitable and successful, rather than dependent on subsidies and acting regardless of proper rules of economic efficiency.

The reductions that have taken place mean that the British Steel Corporation now employs 59,000 people—that figure is a little out of date and the actual number of employees may have dropped—compared with 184,000 in 1975. The corporation produces about 12 million tonnes, although a 14-million tonne capacity is its stated aim. However, it accounts for only 2 per cent. of the European Community market and that is obviously well below the target that we hope it may achieve. Such are the general circumstances in which the Bill has been introduced.

We are also left with the problem of the carry forward of a £700 million deficit which has not been written off. Against the background of an external financing limit of minus £300 million, which suggests that the corporation will not, apparently, be allowed to carry forward a profit against the accumulated deficit, is the Minister satisfied that the rather complicated formula that he explained to the House meets the European Community requirements? I believe that that formula is rather transparent and I am not sure that our European partners will be ready to accept it. However, if that is the case, obviously it is proper that anyone buying shares in the new corporation should do so in realistic circumstances rather than simply writing off the accumulated debt.

Inevitably, representing a Scottish constituency, I speak with some concern about BSC's operations within Scotland. Indeed, the reasoned amendment tabled by my colleagues and to which I have put my name makes it clear that our main concern is not with the principle of the sale of the steel corporation, but with the future of the industry in Scotland and the rights of the employees to ensure that they have a substantial stake within it. I was rather disappointed that the Minister, in his fairly long opening speech, did not address himself to that problem. I believe that the opportunity for the employees to secure a substantial stake is something which the steel unions and the employees rightly expect. I hope that such terms will be offered and will be attractive to ensure that those employees secure a substantial stake.

I was interested in what the Minister said about the future of Ravenscraig and the future of the Scottish steel industry. If I interpreted him correctly, he said that the Secretary of State for Scotland's proud boast that he had used his influence to secure the future of Ravenscraig through a given period—conveniently, during the last general election — was a worthless guarantee. The Minister said that his right hon. and learned Friend's guarantee was not what he had claimed it to be and that had he been Secretary of State for Scotland — God forfend—he would not have secured such a worthless guarantee and nor would he have made such a substantial claim for it. At least we have no reason to complain that we do not understand the Minister's position.

The Minister should be aware that within Scotland there is much concern—private and public—about the sustained hostility demonstrated by the management of BSC in general and by the current chairman in particular to the continuation of Ravenscraig. It can be argued that, if the Secretary of State for Scotland's guarantee is significant and if he succeeded in persuading BSC not to close Ravenscraig, that plant would not otherwise be operating to make a contribution to the profitability that has enabled the Government to introduce the Bill. That being so, it is a little rich to expect the Scottish people and the Scottish steel industry to regard the qualified guarantees that have now been given with any great confidence.

When the Select Committee on Trade and Industry investigated Ravenscraig it uncovered accounting methods used by BSC to undermine the apparent profitability of Ravenscraig. The Chairman of that Committee said that once that information was unearthed it was a dead give-away of the management's objective: to undermine the apparent viability of the mill and secure its closure.

It is hardly surprising that the guarantees and assurances that have been given have a hollow ring to most people in Scotland. I believe that we are entitled to ask the Government to consider how we can overcome such reservations, given that the existing management has shown such hostility.

I do not wish to give a definitive solution—I accept that the hon. Gentleman representing Ravenscraig has put forward his own solutions; the Arthur Young proposal is one of them—but I believe that there are four options for the Scottish steel industry. A link between Shotton and the Scottish steel industry is one such proposal. I accept that the employees of Shotton may not be so keen on it. If that is the case, I suggest that an alternative option is to explore the viability of an independent Scottish steel company. I am not suggesting that that is the ideal approach, but such an independent company might be preferable to privatising the whole of BSC, whose management is committed to having no Scottish steel company.

Mr. Barry Jones: I know that the hon. Gentleman is speaking as a good Scot, but I emphasise that my people at Shotton see themselves as Welsh people and they want to be associated with their sister plants of Llanwern and Port Talbot.

Mr. Bruce: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's argument and I am aware of that dimension. The Shotton link is a possibility, but obviously such feelings would count against it.

I believe that the third option is for the Scottish company to be part of another European company, which would ensure a degree of competition. The fourth option, as the previous chairman of BSC mooted, is for the Scottish steel industry to join with a non-European company.

I am not suggesting that such options represent perfect solutions, but I find it rather depressing that the Minister is anxious to ensure that we privatise BSC in its entirety without exploring alternative ways, within the right hon. and learned Gentleman's ideology, to ensure that the Scottish steel industry has a viable future with a management committed to its survival and providing it with investment. While such a commitment is not apparent, I believe that it is difficult for anyone who is genuinely concerned for the Scottish economy to support the Bill.

The loss of a steelmaking capacity within Scotland does not only represent the loss of another few thousand jobs, but would tear the heart out of an already devastated economy. It is estimated that 5,400 jobs are directly involved with the steel industry and a further 2,000 depend indirectly on it. Indeed, many thousands more depend on the wider influence of that industry. British Rail, for example, is extremely dependent on the revenue it receives from steel operations in Scotland, as are other forms of transport and haulage. Against that background, a requirement to ensure the continuation of that industry should be regarded as paramount by any responsible Government. I agree that there may be several ways of achieving that continuation, but I am not convinced that what the Minister has offered is likely to prove the solution.

There is another national circumstance that must be considered. There is clear evidence that BSC, in its enthusiasm——

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Gentleman does not appear to be adducing any commercial or industrial argument against the proposal that BSC should be privatised as one entity. He appears to be founding his doubts against the proposal on the proposition that the present management is, in an unreasoned way, hostile to Scotland. I assure the hon. Gentleman that in all my contacts with the management I have detected no such sentiment. The present chairman and management of the corporation have issued their commercial judgment about its future. It would be most unwise to seek to fragment the corporation simply because of deeply held views in Scotland — with no basis in practice — that the management are hostile to the Scottish steel industry.

Mr. Bruce: I believe that that confirms what was said by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) as to why we should encourage the right hon. and learned Gentleman to make frequent visits north of the border. His lack of understanding of the situation certainly ensures that his remaining colleagues who represent Scottish constituencies will be rapidly extinguished from the House.

The record of the past three years demonstrates that the right hon. and learned Gentleman's argument is not true. If it was, the Secretary of State for Scotland would not have needed to secure guarantees and boast about them the length and breadth of Scotland. I am afraid the Minister cannot understand the depth of feeling about this matter.

One argument that may ultimately work in favour of the Scottish steel industry within the BSC—indeed it is already working to our advantage and has enabled a "qualified" assurance to be given—is that the mill that BSC wishes to close is now contributing significantly to the viability and profitability of the corporation. If that mill were closed, British Steel would be relying, even on its present targets, on 100 per cent. capacity from the remaining mills. Everybody acknowledges that that is not attainable.

In addition, if the British Steel Corporation's ambition is to secure an expanding share of the European market, it needs to invest in Ravenscraig to show that it recognises that that capacity is required. Hon. Members representing Scottish interests would start to have confidence in the British Steel management if the substantial investment required came forward. Investment is not an absolute guarantee and the sum mentioned by the Minister is merely an ongoing commitment rather than a long-term assurance.

The Government have failed to acknowledge the significance of the development for Scotland or to take account of the interests of the work force. They have not come forward with any imaginative ideas as to how the work force could be given a significant stake in the industry. I do not believe that changes of ownership per se are critical, but the Government are pursuing a hurried measure which they have not thought through and my colleagues will vote against it.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): I am sure that the House was on tenterhooks, waiting until the end of the speech of the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) to discover which way he was going to vote. As I understand it, at the last general election, the alliance manifesto was in favour of the privatisation of the steel industry. It may simply be a question of the usual problem of achieving agreement among the various parties for which the hon. Gentleman spoke.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman on one point—the importance of employee share ownership. Clearly, that has been an important part of the success of privatisation. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster rightly said that we are considering an industry that has shown a remarkable turnround in recent years. That is a tribute to the management and work force of the steel industry. For example, we now have one of Europe's few profitable steelmakers. A few years ago, the industry cost the taxpayer £5 million a day. The number of man hours per tonne of liquid steel has improved from a figure of 14·5 in 1980-81 to a figure of 6·2 in 1986-87 and, in the past six months, there has been a further improvement to a figure of 5·4.

Those improvements and the resulting reduction in costs have been shown in the performance of the entire corporation, including the three integrated hot rolled coil works at Port Talbot, Llanwern and Ravenscraig. Those improvements have been due to two factors—investment and new technology, and the spirit of competition which has clearly been a major factor in driving down production costs.

The forecasts made in respect of Ravenscraig and Dalzell are clearly valuable. They state that the hot strip mill at Ravenscraig, and the other mills, will continue in production at least until 1989, that steelmaking at Ravenscraig and plate rolling at Dalzell will continue for seven years and that, if British Steel wished to close Ravenscraig, it would consider any wholly private sector offer for the facilities. However, whether we consider them politically or as an expression of the corporation's commercial forecasts, they are valuable statements. In inevitably changing market conditions, few companies would be able to make such forecasts.

What is the best guarantee for Ravenscraig or any other steelworks? Part of any such guarantee is a management committed to the success of a particular enterprise. I do not go so far as the hon. Member for Gordon, but there have certainly been suspicions, justified or not, in the Scottish steel industry. Privatisation has brought to other industries, and can bring to the steel industry, substantial advantages of full commercial freedom and wider employee share ownership.

There has been some debate about the Government's intention to privatise BSC as a single entity. BSC is not a monopoly because of the level of imports and because it will operate in an increasingly free European market. I hope that Ministers will recognise that a number of people from different political viewpoints have questioned whether that is necessarily right. The proposal that Ravenscraig, Dalzell and Shotton be privatised as a separate company is not one that can be simply thrown to one side. It is not a proposal to privatise the Scottish steel industry, as the hon. Member for Gordon suggested. It has not been suggested by those who put forward the proposal that the tubes division of Clydesdale and Imperial steelworks would be privatised along with Ravenscraig and Dalzell. That would not make commercial sense.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) and others will no doubt speak with greater expertise on this subject. The Arthur Young team did not have access to the commercially confidential information held within the BSC. I do not criticise BSC for that, but there is still a case to be answered. It is not sufficient for the Government to say that they have all the secret figures and that those figures disprove the case. One needs a rather better defence than that.

I do not claim sufficient expertise to be able to say whether those proposals are necessarily commercially sensible. It might be commercially sensible to privatise Ravenscraig, Shotton and Dalzell separately. That might be sensible for the Treasury and it would certainly be in line with the Government's competitive philosophy. Clearly, there would be more competition in the industry. That might result in two companies which would have the same access to international associations, technology and marketing outlets, so it might not be a zero sum gain. There might be genuine benefits.

Mr. Barry Jones: My nightmare is that I may not catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, before the debate is over. When I spoke to the leaders of the steel workers in Shotton, they said that if the industry is to be privatised—and they do not wish it to be so—they wish to see the corporation remain as one unit and they want Shotton to play its part there. I apologise for intervening. I know that the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) has to make a case, but I must also provide a voice for the steel workers in my constituency.

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) is right to make that point. Inevitably, that is the initial reaction from Shotton. There might be considerable benefits for Shotton from the arrangement proposed. I do not claim that that is necessarily the case, but there is a case to be answered. I hope that when my hon. Friends on the Front Bench ask the officers in their Department to examine these proposals — including some of the suggestions made by the hon. Member for Gordon—they will not adopt a policy of asking how best they can shoot them down. I hope that the proposals will be looked at in a reasonably open-minded way.

I have no doubt that the time is right for my right hon. and learned Friend to bring forward this Bill. As the steel industry moves towards the challenges and opportunities of the private sector, we must, however, ensure that the structure is the right one for its long-term prospects, its customers and its work force.

6.30 pm

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I know that many of my hon. Friends are alarmed about the effects of what the Government are doing on their constituencies. I want to express the alarms of my constituents about what could happen to the industry for the reasons most admirably stated by my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) at the beginning of the debate.

Whatever else is to be learnt from the past 20 or 30 years about the steel industry, it is clear that it cannot be left to have its whole status and future determined by market conditions—yet that is what the Government are risking. They have not answered that major point yet; indeed, there is no answer to it. Anyone looking back over the past 20 or 30 years will see the strength that the industry has been given by public ownership and the weakness that has been caused by trying to leave it to market forces. That does not mean to say that the Steel Corporation does not have to take account of market forces—of course it does—but it must do so in a proper context. The Government's Bill does not do that.

It so happens that I was introduced to the steel industry by Henry Spencer, a man who really knew something about steel, when I went to Ebbw Vale in 1960. He taught me everything I know about it, and about how private industry and public industry could co-operate. He taught me how necessary it was to have public backing and support when the steel industry had its back against the wall. He was also a great expansionist and believed it was essential that Government backing should be forthcoming so that the industry could properly expand. It was chiefly under his inspiration that the Llanwern works were built in Newport. I know that there was a lot of controversy about whether Ravenscraig should have gone ahead at the same time, but we in Wales certainly owed a great debt to Henry Spencer, to those who backed the project and to the works at Newport. The great victory in the industry that the Minister is celebrating today owes much to the foresight, investment and vision of the workers and managers, and of leaders such as Henry Spencer who wanted an expanding industry with the strength and backing in difficult years—as well as in prosperous ones —to enable it to grow.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman's account of what happened in the 1970s was a travesty of the facts. He spoke of us steaming ahead to the buffers with no interest in what was to come. We wanted to secure an intelligent pace of changeover from the older industry to the newer. We knew that changes had to take place but we believed that if that were done properly we could be saved from the ravages that had occurred in the previous industrial revolution, when great industries were allowed to sink into decay and nothing was done to build up other ones at the same time. When we were faced with the rundown of the industry, thanks to public ownership we were able to make intelligent plans and to prepare for the future. That is what we wanted to do in all the great steel towns up and down the country.

Unfortunately, our chance of doing this on anything like a scale on which it should have been done was wrecked. When the Government came to power in 1979 they did nothing about steel. All they knew was what they had been told by the present Secretary of State for Wales, who had introduced a far more expansionist plan at the beginning of the 1970s—but they write that out of the history books now. In 1979 the Government arrived and wrecked our regional policy, cutting down the enormous grants that we believed were necessary by so much that the amounts of grant that we were giving to make the changeover in the steel towns are being written out of the records now. When the Secretary of State for Wales gives us figures today he tells us that we cannot take account of the £40 million that we put into Ebbw Vale to make the changeover in those days. So the idea that we were not trying to carry through an industrial changeover is nonsense, and the Minister should not dare to speak to the House in those terms.

We tried to carry out the change on a proper basis; we were carrying it through; and the Government who came in in 1979 wrecked it in one place after another. Shotton and all the other places quoted in the debate today were afflicted by the savage way in which the Government applied market conditions so ignorantly and ineptly in 1979, 1980 and 1981. If anyone seeks an authority on that, I tell him to go and ask the present head of the steel board, Sir Robert Scholey. He is a fine fellow and should have been appointed to the job seven or eight years ago. We would have been much better off if we had had him, instead of having to pay the huge sums that were paid to Mr. MacGregor to come in. I remember going to see Mr. MacGregor when he first came to run the industry. He told us that he could not be bound by the previous undertakings of the British Steel Corporation. Also, he did not want to have anything to do with building up new industries. He was opposed to the scheme that we, in the Labour Government, introduced for British enterprise. It was a way of trying to introduce other industries, with all the backing, knowledge and expertise of the Steel Corporation available to them. The Labour Government devised a fine scheme, but MacGregor said that he did not want it; everything should be done by the Government, and it was none of the business of the Steel Corporation.

I am glad to say that other persuasions eventually succeeded, and a similar pattern for building up new industries was then introduced into the coal industry by MacGregor on the instructions of the Government, who had to tell him how to do it. We had to deal with all these problems throughout the 1970s, and very difficult problems they were.

I am glad, as I am sure all those in the steel industry areas are, that the publicly owned steel industry has come through the fire as well as it has done. But it is at a much lower level than it was before, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham said. Sir Harry Spencer would never have dreamt that one would call successful an industry that was producing only 15 million tonnes, or whatever the figure is. Of course, the amount could be far greater if the Government had given the steel industry the support they should have given it over a much longer period. I had hoped that they would be willing to do so now, but the Bill offers us no such hope.

I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman what guarantees he can give. He can give none, because he is handing over the business to someone else. Can he offer guarantees of the sort that we gave Ebbw Vale during the rundown of 1976 and 1977? We put £70 million then into the new tinplate plant. It is partly because of that that it enjoys the profits it now has, which have contributed to the profits from the rest of the industry. That is the sort of investment that was put in back then and we need that sort of investment again now in Ebbw Vale to sustain and expand our tinplate finishing plant.

The same applies to the steel plants that are represented by my hon. Friends. They all want to know how they will be able to obtain the necessary amount of investment in the future. It is a question not only of guarantees for Ravenscraig—although I am all in favour of that being clarified—but of how a range of different steel plants will receive their investment in the future. It is an industry from which one does not receive short-term returns or short-term profits; one must have long-term reports and long-term investment to secure the improvements about which the Minister is now boasting.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The right hon. Gentleman is talking of a much bigger steel industry, 10 years after the problems that he and I have been describing. Is he asserting that 15 million tonnes is not enough? Does he realise that 32 million tonnes of excess capacity has been taken out of western Europe over the past seven or eight years, yet there is still excess capacity? Does he not recognise the damage that has been done in the past by plucking these fanciful aims of bigger capacity out of the air and then investing in completely non-viable steel plants?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I suggest to the Chancellor of the Duchy that some of these points could perhaps be dealt with by the Minister who replies to the debate.

Mr. Foot: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has given a completely false account of what we propose and of what has happened. We have not campaigned for a much bigger steel output. The campaign for bigger steel output was conducted by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales when he introduced his so-called plan in 1972.

It is not a tremendous feat to say, "We have an industry that is now producing 15 million tonnes." We could have produced more than that in any case. I hope that there will be proper provision for an expansion of the industry, which is something that nobody can calculate.

Only the insane Government of 1979, 1980 and 1981 could have inflicted such damage on the rest of our industry that the cut in steel demand was so excessive. There was a collapse in our motor industry. Much of British industry was allowed to collapse or was driven to the wall by the appalling exchange policy of the Government. The Government inflicted the biggest single injury on the motor industry. Some Conservative Members—not the right hon. and learned Gentleman—know something about the motor industry.

British industry was devastated, which is why the changeover in the steel industry was made all the more difficult. I am gratified, as are many others, that it has come through all those problems. All credit should be given to the workers and trade unions, who were able to carry it through. As I have already said, credit should be given to Sir Robert Scholey, who has been the real manager of the industry and who should have been appointed at the beginning, instead of bringing a fancy manager from across the Atlantic and paying him hundreds of thousands of pounds to mess up the industry before moving on to mess up the coal industry. If Conservative Members want to criticise what I am saying about Sir Ian MacGregor they should consult their right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, who was subjected to a long visitation from Sir Ian MacGregor.

The Government are unable to tell us how they will be able to guarantee a proper future for those steel workers who made such sacrifices and for the industry, which has come through all those difficulties. Much better prospects should be ahead for the industry. However, the Government cannot say anything about this matter because they are handing it over for somebody else to deal with.

The tests in the future will not be those that we quite rightly applied in 1976, 1977 or 1978—the tests for the long-term future of the industry which have led to the present levels of productivity. The Government are handing over those decisions to a few entrepreneurs—private capital—to make the decisions. They, like the old steelmasters, will not have any objective view of how they will serve the long-term interests of the nation.

That is what the Bill is about, which is why it is such a disgrace.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), giving one of his inevitable performances as the Phantom of the Opera, carried us back to the heady days of 1963 when the British Steel Corporation's 10-year strategy for an output of 33 million tonnes was denounced by the Labour party as miserably inadequate.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister may be relieved to learn that I wholeheartedly support this measure. I say that as no doctrinaire partisan of privatisation. I still require to be convinced of the case for the privatisation of the water industry. I still have strong reservations about the apparent methods that the Government will use to privatise electricity. Furthermore, I am deeply suspicious of attempts to fatten up industries to make them more attractive to entrepreneurs. The steel industry is a conspicuous and welcome example of the opposite. It has been not fattened up but slimmed down to prepare it for privatisation.

I have not been altogether happy about the game of ping-pong that has been played with the steel industry in the past. First, it was nationalised, then denationalised, threatened and then threatened the other way. The world has moved on, and Socialist parties, with the exception of the British Labour party, are recognising the enormous advantages that can accrue from privatisation to workers in those industries. In that regard, we have the recent example of the National Freight Corporation, the privatisation of which has brought immense benefits to those who work for it. That particular debate, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister said, is over.

The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours)—who is no longer present in the Chamber—made a valid point, of which I know the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) is well aware, about the problems that arise when an industry is slimmed down to make it more efficient, resulting in enormous losses of jobs and the very large interval that occurs between the process of slimming down and the arrival of replacement jobs. In that context, I am not surprised that hon. Members representing Scottish constituencies express great anxiety about the future of Ravenscraig.

I should like to mention the experience that we went through in north-east Wales; I know that the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside is particularly concerned with this matter. The hon. Gentleman put up a heroic fight on behalf of his constituents for many years to try to maintain steel production at Shotton. I, from a constituency that at that stage closely bordered Shotton, gave him what support I could. The hon. Gentleman's reward has been reflected in the majorities that he has managed to maintain over a series of elections. He earned the grateful thanks of his constituents.

I am not criticising the hon. Gentleman — he will know that I have made this point before — when I say that in the long run he and I did a bad service to our constituents by delaying a decision that had to be taken. Had that decision been taken at the time that it was planned, the new jobs, which are now coming in to replace the jobs that we lost in the area, would have arrived much sooner and before the recession. Any hon. Member faced with a threatened closure in his constituency is bound to fight tooth and nail whatever the general arguments may be in favour of that closure against it. It is no criticism of the hon. Gentleman that he did so. My criticism is of Governments, in particular the Labour Government of 1974, for fudging the issue and postponing the decision. They are the guilty men. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Lord Beswick."] As my hon. Friend says, it was Lord Beswick who was the instrument of the guilt. I clear the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside from any guilt. It was a copybook example of how political pressures inexorably work against sensible commercial decisions in matters such as this.

There is a lot of talk about overmanning. In the course of looking into the steel industry, I went to Scotland and was taken to see the superb facility at Hunterston for handling ore imports. Alongside it is the magnificent direct production plant, which has never been operated from the day it was installed. I was struck by the ore terminal, which is one of the best equipped places I have ever seen. About a dozen men were standing on the quayside, and, looking at the clock, I said to the harbour master, "When are you expecting the next ship to come in?" He looked across the desk to his calendar and said, "I think it is on Thursday week." I said, "In that case, why are 15 men standing by the quayside?" He said, "That was the agreement we reached with the Transport and General. The ISTC were perfectly reasonable about this and said that they would send their chaps along when there was something to be done, but the only term on which we were able to open the facility was to have 15 dockers standing there, whether or not there is a ship."

Dr. Reid: Using the same logic, is the hon. Member saying that he will forgo his pay for those periods when he is at Westminster but is not speaking in the Chamber?

Sir Anthony Meyer: When I am not speaking in the Chamber, I am usually dealing with other parliamentry business. Those chaps were playing cards. It is a bit reminiscent of preserving the dinosaur hall at the Natural History museum.

Steel is no longer the dominant industry in Wales. Other industries, largely based on firms outside the country, have come in to take its place and Wales is moving steadily into the 21st century, but for as many years ahead as we can see steel will have an important part to play.

Shotton is renaissance; it has a new facility equal to any in Europe. South Wales has steel mills which are more competitive than any in the world. It is vital to ensure the future of the slimmed down Welsh steel industry. God forbid that we should think in terms of hiving off bits of it. It would be much better to keep the corporation whole, not as a shrine for the preservation of our industrial past but as a brightly gleaming beacon lighting the way to a new future for Wales based on an industry of the 21st century.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): I was not surprised to hear the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) say that he supports the Bill, because I remember that many years ago he urged denationalisation of the steel industry. I shudder to think what state the steel industry would be in today if his advice had been accepted.

We are debating a piece of pure dogma. It is the 11th commandment of the old Tory testament — thou shalt not make a profit and remain in the public sector. The Government consider that the only purpose of the public sector is to act as a hospital for lame ducks, to take over an industry which has been badly let down by its private owners because they have failed to invest adequately, then to put it right and restore its health so that it can be returned to the same private sector in which it suffered its earlier disasters. That is the Government's philosophy.

The industry has received substantial public funds. Much of that money has been spent on new capital investment, which was desperately needed when it was taken over in 1967. Another large chunk of money has been spent on closures and getting rid of over 100,000 jobs. The social pain of that is still being felt in steelmaking areas, including my own, where unemployment is 19 per cent., largely as a result of job losses in the industry.

The industry has gone through an appalling traumatic period, but at the end of it, thanks to the support it has received in the public sector, BSC has emerged as an efficient, competitive and to some extent profitable organisation. Let us not run away with the idea that the profits are enormous, because they are not, but at least it is profitable. Now it is to be restored to the private sector. Public pain for private profit is the keynote of the Government's philosophy.

Does anyone seriously believe that BSC would still be operating five integrated plants today if it had been in the private sector? Of course it would not. Would the stainless plant at Sheffield — which is now working flat out and bursting at the seams with orders, but which a little while ago was going through a difficult period — still have been with us today if it had been in the private sector? It would have been closed down. Even the works at Rotherham and Stocksbridge, which are part of United Engineering Steels — the biggest engineering steelmaker in western Europe — might have been closed during that difficult period a few years ago if they had still been in the private sector.

There has been a dramatic increase in the demand for steel, thanks mainly to the beneficial movement in exchange rates in the past year or two. Total output in January was 31·6 per cent. up on January of last year. In the Yorkshire and Humberside region — which includes the BSC plant at Scunthorpe and the BSC stainless plant at Sheffield, as well as the works at Rotherham and Stocksbridge — output is up by a staggering 49 per cent. My hon. Friends from Scotland will know that the increase in Scotland has been 35 per cent. But for the sustained campaign of my hon. Friends from Scotland, the trade unions, the Select Committee on Trade and Industry and the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger), Ravenscraig would have been closed a long time ago.

Where would the capacity have come from to meet the great increase in demand which is taking place? It is absolutely unthinkable that the capacity would have existed if the industry had been in private ownership. There is no doubt that public ownership has saved the industry from virtual extinction, as it has saved other vital industries when private owners have badly let them down by failing to invest sufficiently to match foreign competition.

As BSC is showing a bit of profit — we are not talking about a lot — the Government are rushing headlong to privatise it. We have no assurances about future investment or the availability of capital for investment in the industry. Sir Rober Scholey, the chairman of BSC, whom I have known since he ran the Rotherham works, has said that £300 million a year is needed for new investment. On present profit figures, that is sailing very close to the wind.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) asked why there is such unseemly haste. I think I have the answer: the Government are determined to get the industry on to the market before the full impact of the electricity price increases hits it and reduces its competitiveness and profitability. They want to sell it to the private sector before the cut-throat price war starts in Europe following the phasing out of quotas. Given those two circumstances — the considerable reduction in competitiveness because of electricity prices going up, coupled with a fierce price war against companies which will still have backing from their Governments, whether legal or not — the Government want to wash their hands of the whole industry, and that is a disgraceful decision.

Meanwhile, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham pointed out, there is no assurance that there will be any restrictions on foreign ownership in the privatised British Steel Corporation, or whatever the company is to be called. I have had correspondence with the Under-Secretary of State for Industry on this matter which is of great concern to people in BSC and in United Engineering Steels where 50 per cent. of the shares still belong to BSC. They want to know what is to happen to those shares. I wrote to the Minister and he replied that it is difficult because of EEC regulations. I wrote back and said that there were EEC regulations when Rolls-Royce was privatised, and how did he manage to get round that and provide a 15 per cent. limitation on foreign ownership in Rolls-Royce? My right hon. and hon. Friends will be amazed at the Minister's reply, which was that in the case of Rolls-Royce there was an additional factor: it is a strategically important defence contractor.

I have pointed out that without steel Rolls-Royce could not make a single engine. I can hardly think of an industry more important to our defence capability than steel.

Mr. Hardy: My hon. Friend's point about strategic interest is vital. He will be well aware of what happened when Britain invented Chobham armour. There are now only two firms in Britain that can produce it. The Government have invited Thyssens to tender for that which we invented.

Mr. Crowther: My hon. Friend is quite right. The engineering industry in south Yorkshire has expressed serious concern about that. It is an important defence issue.

Our steel industry has been saved at considerable financial cost and even greater social cost in the areas where the jobs have disappeared. My constituents and I wish to know whether all the sacrifices have been made only to provide someone with some private profit. That is what is upsetting my constituents. It is disgraceful that, after all the pain it has suffered, this great industry is now to be put at risk for the sake of doctrinaire Toryism.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I have noted down some of the topics on which I have received correspondence in the past week. I have received letters about a prisoner in Iraq, the life peerage of the Chief Rabbi, school buses in my constituency, the local post office which is under threat of closure, clause 28, the National Health Service, education and badgers. There has been not one letter about steel nationalisation. There is a steel works in my constituency, and not one person has written to me in the past week opposing the Government's proposals.

Three weeks ago I received a letter from the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation telling me that it was not going to oppose the Government's proposals because:

> "The union could spend large sums of money and considerable resources, as other trade unions have, campaigning against privatisation, but such a campaign would be a futile gesture. Steel is no longer one of the commanding heights of the economy nor is it a public utility. Instead, the ISTC is facing up to reality and must apply all its resources to safeguard the interests of its membership"

— the interests of its membership in the industry being denationalised.

Mr. Coleman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Holt: I shall not give way.

We have heard a great deal of statistics. One can wage a war with statistics to make one's case either way but this is not a debate about statistics. It is a debate about philosophy, attitude, and perhaps about dogma.

It was quite interesting that when I asked the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) what was the Labour party's policy, he said that the Labour party would renationalise the steel industry, which is about to be denationalised. Nothing could be more damaging.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The hon. Gentleman was not listening. Why does he not listen?

Mr. Holt: I was listening. That is exactly what the hon. Member for Dagenham said. He was unsure about the form, but he said that the industry would be taken back into public ownership. At least some of the more honest Opposition Members are nodding in agreement. That is what the Opposition Front Bench spokesman said, and that is what Hansard will reveal tomorrow.

Dr. Reid rose——

Mr. Holt: Perhaps the hon. Member for Dagenham will repeat what he said.

Dr. Reid: I shall repeat what he said. It is unfortunate that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) cannot repeat, parrot-fashion, what was said earlier. My hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham said that in his view such a strategic industry for Britain should be under some form of social ownership. Had the hon. Member for Langbaurgh not been so busy shouting abuse he might have heard my hon. Friend's reply.

Mr. Holt: I heard specifically what the answer was and it will be in Hansard.

[Mr. Holt]

The debate embraces a philosophical attitude. Langbaurgh on Tees has a steelworks which for many years was a hallmark of inefficiency. Today, it has less than half the work force it had five years ago and is producing 120 per cent. of the steel it was producing then. That is a measure of the improvement of production at Redcar and other steelworks, which include the Skinningrove steelworks in my constituency in the years since 1979.

I do not wish to deal in statistics. We are about to decide the future of the steel industry for decades to come. The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) waxed eloquent but he did not say a great deal. However, he did say that there had been a missed opportunity during the 1970s and that there was not the investment that there should have been. I agree with that. One of the reasons for the lack of investment historically was the ping-pong effect of nationalisation and renationalisation that has constantly occurred. If the private sector is asked to put money into a private industry which is liable to be renationalised when there is a change of Government, it will not invest.

The country has changed in its outlook. Twenty or 25 years ago very few people owned shares and young people did not know what shares were. I have a son of 26 and a daughter of 22 who are shareholders in a number of industries. That is not amazing but it reflects the change of philosophy between my youth and theirs and the outlook in the country today. The present opportunity to put the steel industry back into the private sector will enable young people such as my son and daughter and many others to invest in that industry. They will do so and the investment for the future will be there. The only thing that can stop that is the possibility that there will be renationalisation, when the dead hand of the Minister knowing best will return to the steel industry, as it has in the past.

Opposition Members have suggested that we denationalise industries only when they are making a profit. If Opposition Members can find someone to buy British Rail I shall guarantee that the Government will sell it, but there is no one foolish enough to buy an industry in such debt as British Steel was five or six years ago. All the money that was poured down the drain achieved nothing but it caused a greater change when the change had to come about. It may have been easy to phase in the changes to modernise the industry, but because there was a failure to address the problem between 1974 and 1979 it was important that it was done soon afterwards. Today the industry is much more realistic in its outlook.

I heard recently that a strike had been threatened by workers in Redcar during the past few days. British Steel said to them, "Strike if you will. If you do, we will close the plant and it will stay closed." What happened? British Steel prevailed and the men knew that the management meant what it said. They did not strike. They worked, and as a consequence they have kept the plant open and their future is secure.

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar) rose—

Mr. Holt: If the hon. Lady wants to make a speech, she should have come in and sat through the debate from the beginning, as I have done. Then she would probably be called and could represent her constituents in the same way as I am representing my constituents. I shall not give way to the hon. Lady. She has only been in the Chamber five minutes and that is not long enough for me to give way to her.

Everyone should know the history of the Langbaurgh and Teesside area. The steel mills were built there because of the juxtaposition of coal and iron ore. There is no iron ore left in the ground and there is not so much coal-mining. So we are concerned for the steel industry. The security of being in private hands will keep the steel industry on Teesside. If it were still to be in public ownership in the future, a "Yes, Minister" attitude might prevail over the Minister of the day who might be told to close this and that. I am delighted that, throughout the entire debate, although we have heard a hell of a lot about closing Ravenscraig, we have heard nothing about closing Redcar. That is because of the success of the complex on Teesside.

My hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) hit the nail squarely on the head when he dealt with the contribution of the hon. Member for Dagenham. I would have liked to use his words because they were so apposite in the context of the hon. Gentleman's speech. It was a poor speech, but I suppose one can understand that. When one has not got one's heart in a subject but has the commitment, as the Front Bench spokesman, to say a few words, it must be difficult. Apart from the Labour party, the only people who now want to vote against the Bill are the Liberal party, despite the fact that it said in its manifesto that it would vote with us. The unions and the people want steel to be denationalised.

Five or six years ago, immediately after the rundown of the steel industry, there was a very depressed air in Teesside. People were walking round with long faces. Unemployment was terrible. Today there is a new outlook and a new attitude. There is no longer so much unemployment. The number of unemployed is dropping. In every ward in my constituency there was a reduction in unemployment in the 12 months from January last year to January this year.

We now have the Teesside Development Corporation, which is working closely with the British Steel Corporation. A new attitude has come about because management, the workers and—yes—the unions in that area, want the industry privatised. They know that that will give them the opportunities and the security they seek. So the Government are not premature in bringing forward the legislation. It is spot on. This is the first time that they could have brought the steel industry to the market place after the years of decline and waste of money.

Let us think of what we might have done with the billions which have been wasted on steel. How many hospitals might we have built? How many other improvements could we have made to the social life of the country? What did we do? We poured all that money into a small, narrow area to sustain what was at that time a badly managed industry. I refute entirely what the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent said. It was only when Ian MacGregor came into the industry that he was able to put some backbone into the management which made it fight the trade union and tell it, "You do your job and we will manage the business." That is what is happening today. The management of British Steel wants privatisation because it wants the challenge. Anyone who disputes that should speak to any senior member of the board. All board members will say the same thing. They are looking forward to the challenge and the opportunity. The Government's proposals will create a steel industry for the future.

In years to come I hope that we shall be debating not whether to close down Ravenscraig but how to expand it, or how, under the private sector, it has been expanded. All the time one has to be realistic enough not to believe that we can produce steel for which there is not a market place. The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent said that there was no need to have a market place, because we do not have to sell steel and we are not in competition with other people. Of course we are, and within the EEC there will be even more ruthless competition. As a privatised industry, steel will be able to meet the competition because decisions will be made quickly and commercially and will not have to go through the procedure of ministerial approval and committees before we get anywhere, with the prospect of losing the market, the shares, the opportunities and the jobs.

That is the epitome of a nationalised industry. Invariably nationalised industries have been badly run. Today they are improving. One of the main reasons for the improvement has been the introduction of many trade union reforms, with the result that industrial relations are much better. In the steel industry in the sixties and seventies many days were lost through strikes. The position is not comparable today. After privatisation there will be even fewer strikes.

I am pleased to have had the opportunity to contribute to the debate. I am pleased to speak on behalf of my constituents because they believe, as I do, that the Government's decision is correct. The timing is right and we look forward to the expansion of the steel industry. That is what my constituents want. That is why I shall rejoice when I vote in support of the Government.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): I wish to make two declarations of interest. The first is that my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) and I are the only hon. Members who have attended the whole of this debate who served on the Standing Committee which saved the industry in 1967 by bringing it into public ownership. I am sorry that I have had to listen to the twaddle and claptrap that we have just had from the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt).

My second declaration of interest, which the hon. Gentleman cannot make, is that I represent the steelworkers. I am sponsored by the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation. I was authorised by the executive council, meeting in London last week, to say categorically and clearly in the House that the union is utterly opposed to the privatisation of the British Steel Corporation. That declaration was made last week by the executive council of my union.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): Is the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Coleman) prepared to tell us whether that is his view, or the view of the union that instructs him to say it?

Mr. Coleman: I assure the hon. Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) that I am an hon. Member of the House, and when I say something of that nature it is the truth. I challenge the hon. Gentleman to challenge me outside. If he says the same thing outside, I will take him — /Interruption./ I am not used to getting into fisticuffs of that sort, nor am I used to telling untruths. I assure the hon. Gentleman that what I said was declared last week in Swindon house, the headquarters of the union. Does that satisfy him?

Mr. Taylor: I merely wished the hon. Gentleman to make his position clear, and he has done so.

Mr. Coleman: We in the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation oppose the Bill because we do not believe that it would be in the national interest. The steel industry should not be taken into the private sector, as the Government seek. Nor is it in the national interest to disregard the fact that in the past 10 years about £5 billion of taxpayers' money has been expended on the British Steel Corporation, to make it the most successful steel industry in Europe, if not in the world.

That would not have happened had the arrangements for bulk steel production in Britain existing before 1967 still been in operation. My union says, too, that now the industry is showing itself capable of making profits, those profits should be returned to the taxpayer, not through tax cuts to promote the popularity of the Government, but in expenditure on the Health Service, pensions or some other desirable social requirements. That is how we say that the profits of the British steel industry and the investment by taxpayers in the industry should be spent.

Further, now that the steel industry is profitable, that profit should not fall into the hands of speculators, especially from overseas. I do not suppose, however, that that declaration by my union, the principal union in the steel industry, will influence Conservative Members not to swarm into the Aye Lobby to support the Bill. But nor will their action prevent me from demanding in this debate the safeguards that I want, and my union wants for the country and the people who work in the industry. We demand that, should the Bill become law, there will be no break-up of the British Steel Corporation. It must remain a single entity. It seems that the Government, the Secretary of State and I are on the same side. We in the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation say that the industry is best served by remaining one entity, because anything else will be a disaster.

We also say that whatever company the Bill spawns must be a wholly British-owned company, with a substantial Government investment. In other words, the Government must retain a golden share in the company. We have a right to demand that, because the taxpayers' £5 billion investment in BSC has made this publicly owned industry an attractive proposition, and the sacrifice in job losses in the industry that has gone on over the years must be taken account of, and that contribution recognised. Let the Minister tell the House that there will be a golden share in the company, and that he will undertake that the company will be wholly British-owned. We cannot accept any other objective. We demand that the Government make it absolutely clear.

We also point to the industry's importance to the defence interests of Britain. We demand from the Government that they make it clear tonight that those interests are safeguarded. It is vital that the House is assured on this point. It will be too late to make these demands if such needs arise. We must be sure that the nation's defence is not put at risk through the failure of the new owners of the steel industry to invest properly to keep the industry efficient, as it is now, or through cuts in capacity, especially if they are ordered by the European Coal and Steel Community, that could affect the British industry adversely.

Let us remind ourselves that never before has a bulk steel producer in private hands had to deal with the ECSC, which decides the amount of steelmaking capacity in Europe. It has the power to compel cuts. Conservative Members should remember that the circumstances of the British Steel Corporation are significantly different from the privatisations of British Telecom, British Gas, the water authorities or the National Bus Company. Hon. Gentlemen must remember that the European Commission has a say in steel matters and we are not masters in our own house. For that reason, British Steel might not prove to be such an attractive proposition.

While we are talking about the Commission, let the Minister tell the House tonight what will be the impact of lifting ECSC quotas in June 1988. It is important that we should know in this debate about the likely impact. I suggest that any investors would also want to know about that, and would think carefully about it before making their investment. They might be safer to put their money on a racehorse that I know about, which belongs to a co-operative of west midlands ex-steel workers. It is called "Springvale Campaign", and that name will not be lost on my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner).

Before I raise a matter that has a bearing on investors' interests in the privatisation of steel, and whether it would be such a good deal for them, can the Minister tell us the reason for the indecent haste that has overtaken the Government in selling off steel? From what the Trades Union Congress steel committee could glean as recently as 4 June last year, there was no intention to move as soon as this to privatise the industry. What is the indecent hurry? Perhaps the answer can be found in the Government's refusal to publish the full report completed a year ago by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. Is there, perhaps, something politically unfavourable to the Government in the report? I expect that the Minister will say that the report contains commercially sensitive matters, and for that reason they are withholding publication. Surely, if that be the case, investors or potential investors have a right to know about it before they buy the shares.

I look to the Minister for two further guarantees. First, will he make sure that the future requirements of British manufacturing industries are guaranteed? We must take care that those interests are safeguarded, and the Minister must make the point clear. Nothing else will do for the British industry. It must have guarantees on this matter.

The other guarantee that we must have is that employees' pension rights and conditions will be protected. These have already been paid for through redundancies. Part of the arrangements whereby job losses in the industry were effected concerned employees' pensions and conditions. We must have a cast-iron guarantee on those matters.

I look to the Minister to give satisfaction on those points before the Bill becomes an Act. He has a duty to the workers in steel, who made a sacrifice. Perhaps Conservative Members did not realise it, but without the co-operation of the union that sacrifice would not have been made and British Steel would not be as healthy as it is today.

The Bill is a betrayal of the country's investment in steel and of the workers' sacrifices. It does not deserve a Second Reading and it ought not to get one.

7.30 pm

Mr. Michael Irvine (Ipswich): I have a strong stomach, but it was tested to the full when I heard the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) say that British Steel's success of the past few years was a great advertisement for public ownership. He claimed it was under public ownership that the success had been achieved.

What the hon. Member overlooked was that this success was only possible under public ownership because this Government had the courage to follow a commercial approach, to take commercial decisions and to apply commercial principles. The Government applied the principles of private industry to a publicly owned industry. Over the past nine years hon. Members opposite have opposed just about every sensible decision that the Government have taken in relation to the steel industry. They have shown hostility to every hard but necessary decision. They have sought to make short-term political capital out of every difficult long-term decision that has had to be made.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy said that in 1978-79 the BSC's annual loss was £1·8 billion. That was in a single financial year. That is equivalent to £35 million a week. That is why my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) was right to draw attention to the scale of the losses which were being incurred, the draining away of public wealth.

It puts current disputes over the National Health Service into perspective. In my own constituency of Ipswich we are shortly to open a new, ultra-modern 86-bed hospital extension, which cost £4 million. So the weekly £35 million drain that the steel industry was imposing on the British economy in 1978-79 was the equivalent of something like nine hospital extensions of that kind a week.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. In terms of the points that he has been making about steel losses in the past, does he think that it is justifiable that those billions and billions of pounds of public money which were invested in steel to get it into the situation it is in today should simply be written off, because the price the Government will get for BSC will in no way compensate for that public investment? BSC should be kept in public ownership so that the profitability that came from that public investment can go towards repaying it.

Mr. Irvine: The hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe should remember that that trough in 1978-79 was the culmination of 12 years of steel in public ownership, and that what has happened since has been the application of commercial principles to a nationalised industry. Left to the policies, dogmas and doctrines of his party, the steel industry today would still be uncompetitive, overmanned, under-capitalised and fundamentally weak.

The great opportunity that privatisation will give to British Steel will be to enable those commercial disciplines to be maintained. At the same time, it will bring British Steel freedom from Treasury control. It will give it greater flexibility. It will make it much more likely that British Steel will be able to take part in effective joint ventures with overseas corporations.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East) rose——

Mr. Irvine: I should like to give way, but many hon. Members, particularly on the Opposition side, also want to speak.

The one baleful shadow that I see is that of the European Economic Community quotas. I acknowledge that there was a time when those quotas were necessary as a short-term measure to deal with the problems of over-supply while the steel industries of the various European nations were putting their respective houses in order. But the short-term value of those quotas has ended. At present those quotas are simply protecting the inefficient and at the same time penalising the efficient. Now, fortunately, British Steel is numbered among the most efficient companies in Europe instead of, as formerly, among the most inefficient. Those quotas are holding back British Steel from making full use of its capacity.

I urge my right hon. and learned Friend to make every effort to ensure that those quotas are phased out, and quickly. The shadow of those quotas needs to be removed from the scene. For all that, I am confident that this Bill, by making it possible for privatisation of the British steel industry to take place, will usher in a new era of prosperity and dynamism for the industry.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): In 20 years of public ownership, after much effort and expenditure, the steel industry has been transformed from the chaotic and rundown state under private ownership that my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Coleman) and I knew 20 years ago into what is today the most efficient and profitable steel industry in Europe, under a public ownership that could continue indefinitely.

Why, then, oh why throw it all again into the melting pot? The Opposition are totally opposed to the privatisation of the steel industry, which will contribute not a thing to the efficiency of the industry. It is a quite unnecessary threat to steel communities which have suffered huge job losses and which were looking forward to a period of stability in which they could build up employment again in more diversified local economies.

Nowhere are we more opposed to privatisation than in Motherwell, where Ravenscraig and its associated plants, which are fully competitive by world standards, have for years been picked out by BSC as next in line for closure. The privatisation announcement on 3 December set BSC free to take the decisive, irretrievable step next year with the closure of the hot mill, leading progressively to the loss of 11,000 jobs on top of our present level of 18 per cent. unemployment in Lanarkshire, much of it from past steel closures.

The threat is so grave that, out of common human concern and responsibility to our constitutents, my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) and I have had to concentrate on finding means of averting it. We have had to seek means within the letter and the spirit of the Government's competitive, free-market, private-enterprise policies, which they have the majority to carry through Parliament. We cannot afford the luxury of political posturing. It is a matter of survival.

Motherwell district council asked Arthur Young, the management consultants, to examine the impact of the privatisation of BSC on the future of Ravenscraig and Dalzell works in my constituency. I have deposited a copy of the report in the Library and I have copies for any hon. Member who does not have one already and who would like one.

The report concludes that, if BSC is privatised as a single entity, even allowing for a 30 per cent. increase in United Kingdom manufacturing output over the next five years, it would not be in the interests of BSC as a commercial enterprise to keep Ravenscraig open beyond 1991 or Dalzell beyond 1994. The director of the CBI in Scotland, Mr. John Davidson, described the Arthur Young report as "highly professional and interesting".

If Ministers are bothered about the date of the next election, I agree that uncertainties about the market and BSC's response could certainly shift the dates of the closures by a year or two, but the final closure of Ravenscraig is inevitable once the hot mill is closed and the plant allowed to run down. The increase in profits of BSC as a single entity from the closure of Ravenscraig would be about £100 million a year, and shareholders would want to know why Ravenscraig was not closed.

However, the Arthur Young report offered an alternative. It rests on the nature of the competition that the BSC faces. The present proposal to privatise BSC as a single entity assumes that the competition comes from Europe. That is the view as seen and presented by the chairman, looking out. It is part of the truth. Certainly European competition has set, and will set, the general price level, but the competition that has so effectively reduced costs within BSC, particularly in strip products, has been the fight for survival between works, as every hon. Member who represents a steel constituency knows. Ask any steel worker or steel manager.

That is the reality. That competition would be brought to an end if privatisation took a form that simply allowed BSC to close Ravenscraig. The pressure would be off at works level. No amount of comparison with a distant and different Nippon Steel, Thyssen or Krupp would have the same effect. Look at the struggle in Ford, even within the same company, to make comparisons stick between Dagenham and Saarlouis. Would Wales have won with such brilliance at Cardiff on Saturday if Scotland had not been 17-10 in the lead at half-time?

The Arthur Young study found that, by maintaining the competition, with Ravenscraig, Shotton and Dalzell forming a separate group, the competition would need to bring about only a 5 per cent. higher level of sales, and 6 per cent. lower variable costs than would otherwise have been achieved by a single entity, for the combined profits to equal what a single entity BSC could achieve by the soft option of closing Ravenscraig. Is competition worth no more than 5 per cent. on sales and 6 per cent. on operating costs? Production, employment, incomes, technical progress, and the contribution to the balance of payments from increased exports and reduced imports would be higher with the competitive solution. No direct jobs would be lost in north or south Wales, and the number of indirect jobs would, of course, increase. The only people worse off would be Sir Robert Scholey and the board of the British

[Dr. Jeremy Bray]

Steel Corporation. With a smaller corporation, £85 million a year of profits would go into the new company. Is it any wonder that Sir Robert Scholey does not like the idea, and did everything that he could to block even the study?

Let me deal with some objections. The force of objections is somewhat diminished when we have heard them coming first from Sir Robert Scholey — with his knowledge, but also his interest in the matter. They should nevertheless be fully considered. We have no interest in deception or in patronising obscurantism. First, people who argue that size gives strength have not followed all that has been happening in recent years. I quote from this week's Fortune business magazine, in an article on "Corporate Strategy for the 1990s":

"Most of the classical justifications for large size have proved to be of minimal value, or counter-productive, or fallacious. McKinsey's Bergsma goes through the list: Access to capital? That era is past. Better information? New third party providers are making information available to all. Economies of scale? Flexible manufacturing systems are driving out advantages of size. Markets for many corporate functions have developed — transportation companies, purchasing specialists"— and so on. The BSC has cut its research and development by 40 per cent. in real terms since 1979. For all its size —perhaps because of it—BSC makes practically no use of outside contract research. It recruited only two first-class honours graduates into its research departments last year. BSC is almost alone among large industrial companies in having no employee serving on any research council or research council committee. BSC could do with some pretty stiff technological competition in Britain. That is as important for the industry in south Wales and the Port Talbot laboratories and on Teesside and at Scunthorpe as it is in Shotton and in Scotland.

Secondly, it is argued that the two companies would not compete because—apart from Shotton—BSC is not in coated sheet. In fact, with its strip mills, BSC is most of the way there, and Shotton would not and should not accept hot rolled coil from Ravenscraig that is not fully competitive — any more than it does today. By the competitive solution, we would at least maintain the present level of competition, while BSC seeks the soft option of reducing it by closing Ravenscraig.

Thirdly, the Minister said that his consultants had access to commercially confidential information to which Arthur Young did not have access, and that they reached different conclusions. The Minister can do better than that. He personally denied that access and has refused to give information on the advice that he has received. As for the fig leaf of commercial confidentiality, Sir Robert Scholey would describe the position of a rugby ball in midfield as commercially confidential if he thought that would help his case. Remember that he has £100 million a year at stake. Sir Ian MacGregor will tell the Minister, as he told me, that cost estimates can be synthesised from the standard industry sources, and Arthur Young used them.

There is always room for argument about timings, capacities and forecasts. However, there seems to be no doubt about the principal points; first, the proposed closure of the hot mill, which all informed people agree means that the end would be only a matter of time. Secondly, there is no doubt that the proposed Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell group would be viable. That leaves as the only major question the extent to which continuing competition in the United Kingdom would continue to improve performance, and that must be a matter of judgment. With BSC having scarcely begun to tap modern advances in material sciences, there is still plenty of room for improvement.

Finally, Shotton workers would not like it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) knows, I have been there and have discussed the proposal with their trade union representatives. Like my hon. Friend, they have made their opposition transparently clear. I like the idea of industrial democracy. Perhaps we could have a vote on privatisation. The new group would give Shotton a much higher profile, with the head office and sales department of a sizeable company, with a full research and development laboratory, able to provide an outlet for the considerable untapped technological potential in new materials in north Wales and Merseyside.

It will take time to win acceptance, as change always does. I was told that Shotton would prefer a management buy-out. Well, why not? Why limit it to Shotton? With the shortages in hot rolled coil that were already developing last year, about which Ministers do not seem to have heard, it would not be sensible for Shotton to be without secure supplies. It is far too static a view to think that Shotton could rely on simply shopping around for spot supplies of hot rolled coil that could quickly cease to be available. Ravenscraig is the present and most appropriate source, and with it comes the strength of Dalzell's position in plates.

Mr. Barry Jones: On Saturday, Scotland's first quarter of play was some of the most robust and brilliant that I have ever seen. I know from my hon. Friend's remarks about his visit to my constituency to talk to my steel workers that he is an honourable and truthful man. Since I do not know whether I will catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, I can only say that my steel workers remain unconvinced and have urged me to emphasise their Welshness and their wish to keep their link with Llanwern and Port Talbot.

Dr. Bray: I entirely understand my hon. Friend's attitude and position. As an Englishman with the privilege to represent a Scottish constituency, and having been to school in Wales, I do not regard the Welsh or the Scots as a racist people. We all need time to work out just what our interests are on these matters.

Rugby is not the only thing that Scotland takes to Wales. Scottish financial institutions, not to mention Scots, are already playing a considerable part in industrial development in Wales, just as Welshmen are in Scotland. We even have them in Ravenscraig. Why be dominated by a London-based BSC, when one can run oneself better in Shotton? I would lay a fair bet with my hon. Friend that it would not be long before people were saying that, if privatisation had to happen, the new materials group was the best thing that could happen to Shotton.

I have been upbeat and buoyant because the alternative does not bear thinking about. The Arthur Young study has told us that Ravenscraig and Dalzell will not long survive the birth pangs of a BSC privatised as a single entity. But an operation can save them, and the parts of BSC can live. At the very least, that is a proposition that should be properly examined, not just by the Minister and his advisers, but by all the people who can make it come true. It will need time to be examined.

We are not talking about a conflict of interest between Welsh and Scottish steel workers, nor even about giving the steel industry in Scotland a chance of survival. For the Government, we are talking about whether the competitive free markets in which they believe are good for economic growth, or only for the shortest-term profits of restrictive private monopolies. Is not properly structured competition good for jobs and economic growth as well as for profits?

For the Opposition, we are talking about whether we can organise a market economy to achieve economic growth. The Arthur Young report has made it impossible for us to hide our heads in the sand, or make strutting cuckolds of ourselves by demanding assurances and making promises of support for Ravenscraig which we know to be empty.

In Motherwell, we have moved very far and very fast to glimpse a chance of survival. The proposal for the new group has the support of all political parties in Scotland, as reflected in the speech of the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), certainly in and outwith Motherwell, according to soundings that we have been able to take. It has the support of the trade union representatives of the 3,200 steel workers at Ravenscraig.

Lest my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside should feel left out, let me say that the trade union representatives of the 700 workers at Dalzell, demonstrating—I believe, of course, only for Scottish steel trade unionists — some of the vacillation and parochialism which is not the strongest aspect of trade unionism in the steel industry, and clinging to hopes of survival on their own which are denied even by their own management, have long worked on the principle of being against anything that Ravenscraig is for.

We all need time to work things out. With no mention of steel privatisation in either their election manifesto or the Queen's Speech, and no consultation before announcing the proposed single entity, the Government must now allow time for thoughts to be gathered. It was only last Thursday that the Arthur Young report was published. Nothing that the Minister or the Government can say will now stop the Ravenscraig-Dalzell-Shotton option being examined.

If Ravenscraig is to be killed, it will die with dignity. But the House will understand the politically explosive effects in Scotland if our largest fully competitive industrial unit were closed with the Government having denied the test of the market, in which they believe, of a course which would have allowed both Ravenscraig and it competitors to continue.

7.57 pm

Mr. Hal Miller (Bromsgrove): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) and to return to him the compliment that he kindly paid to me. He spoke with knowledge, commitment and compassion on his subject and did not baulk at the difficult issues involved. It is tempting to follow him a little further about where the political opportunism lay. Perhaps it was on the Opposition Front Bench. It is even more tempting to explore the difference between social ownership and public ownership and how that is to be made clear to the electorate in due course. However, I came late to the debate, for which I apologise, and many hon. Members are waiting to speak. Certainly those points will have to be explored on a future occasion.

This is an emotional evening for me because I resigned from my minor post with the Government in 1981 on the issue of British Steel unfairly competing, with taxpayers' subsidies, against private steel companies. The debate has shown Opposition Members to have selective memories when they claim that only public ownership could save jobs. They have not alluded to the number of people working in private steel mills, particularly in the west midlands, who were put out of work by that self-same public company and its subsidies.

I do not wish to go over those battles, but I am afraid that the journalist triumphed over the historian in the entertaining remarks of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot). It was his Government who shirked, or deliberately avoided—at any rate, he cannot deny that they postponed it—the issue of the Beswick report and the steel mill closures that it recommended. That was deliberately put off until the inevitable election. To claim that those plants were viable and, indeed, should have been expanded is an entertaining scenario for the right hon. Gentleman's constituents, but it cannot hold water with hon. Members.

The right hon. Gentleman also referred to the motor industry. Savage reductions have been made in our capacity and output, but the defects in quality and consistency of output rather put the boot on the other foot, leading to the decline in demand on the steel mills —despite the efforts of some, particularly at Llanwern, to improve the quality of their products.

Where do we go from here? A number of difficult points are outstanding. The hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Coleman) in particular drew attention to such problems as the EEC quotas. It should at once be stated that those quotas have not always been favourable to manufacturing industry. I am one of those who have been trying to secure the admission from abroad of high-tensile steel which cannot be obtained elsewhere for the manufacture of motor car wheels. Steel quotas have not always helped our industry to modernise itself or to improve its products.

As far as I am aware, the United States has not yet been mentioned. Many perils face our exports of steel products to that country, and the Government will still have to be involved in questions of trade. That is, I think, part of the assurance that Opposition Members have been seeking. It is not a matter of the Government removing themselves altogether from the steel scene, because they still have onerous responsibilities. It would be as well if my hon. Friend made that point in his reply.

The idea that the industry has succeeded only because it is in public ownership really cannot be sustained, and takes no account of the continuing unfair basis of competition with companies in the private sector—and even the basis on which the Phoenix companies, such as United Engineering, should work. That firm is of particular concern to me as it has a large plant in my constituency. We still have such firms as Walter Somers, in open hearth die steel, competing with Sheffield Foregemasters on a very uncertain basis, with the latter's access to the taxpayers' pocket.

I welcome the Government's early step to resolve the problems. I have argued all along, even when the privatisation of steel was not possible, that steel in public ownership must operate on a basis of company accounts so that it can be seen where the subsidy has gone and the basis of competition can be understood.

[Mr. Hal Miller]

I believe that this step had to come. It gives the workers so ably represented by the hon. Member for Neath the chance to take a stake in their own industry, and enables suppliers, consumers and the public to do the same. That is the sort of public ownership that we want, which is why I heartily support the measure.

8.5 pm

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Having intervened in virtually every other speech, I hope that there will be no interventions in mine, and I can promise a brief speech.

Let me say to the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) that, even given the Government's current highly dubious unemployment figures, 10,000 are now unemployed in the travel-to-work area of Shotton. The male unemployment rate is 18 per cent. I calculate that several thousand of those are my constituents, who have not worked since they lost their jobs when the Shotton steelworks were closed in 1980. That was a tragedy. The workers did not wish to surrender; nor did I, and nor did a single one of our local authorities. I felt that it was our duty to fight, and to propose new steelmaking at the Shotton works. Notwithstanding progress in the creation of a new economy, the existing unemployment figures proved right those of us who had wanted to fight.

On Saturday, I met members of the Shotton steel committee representing the works. They had told me in a letter that they wished to make a public statement. They write:

"We are convinced that any hiving off of the industry into smaller groups or units would not be in the best interests of the BSC as a whole or any works in particular. Having suffered the ravages of closure of the major part of the works with its subsequent loss of jobs on an unprecedented scale, we now feel that having weathered all the storms of the last eight years, we are now in an extremely strong and healthy position. The order book is full, investment is guaranteed and we have first class products which are in an expanding market. This can only bode well for the future. To maintain and continue this success story we need the security of the corporation as a whole, for future investment, continued research and development and marketing expertise. To this end we see no benefits by isolating ourselves from the mainstream of the industry. Job security, safe working conditions, fair wages, good pensions—these are what we seek and hope for our members. And we feel that these aspirations, plus the future prosperity of the Shotton works, with its benefits to the community, are best served by our continued association within the BSC and not by fragmentation of the industry however well meaning these proposals may be."

In an encounter on Saturday in my surgery in Connah's Quay, that letter was given to me by Joe Gibson of the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers, Ron Hill of the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation and Bob Butt of my own union, the Transport and General Workers Union. They told me that they did not want a management buy-out.

I want to emphasise briefly the achievements of the work force at home. Locally, we are seen as the "jewel in the crown" of the corporation's empire. We have slimmed down hugely; we have had immense demanning and have increased productivity at an astonishing rate—all under the leadership on the shop floor of local trade unionists who have sweated blood in difficult conditions. My constituents at Shotton can rival any Japanese or German work force for productivity. I cannot praise them too highly. They have made every sacrifice. I know that about £100 million in a decade has been invested in the Shotton works. Management and labour have collaborated effectively to compensate for the loss of 8,000 jobs in 1980, between Christmas and Easter. Arguably, that is the biggest ever loss of industrial jobs in Western Europe. It all happened in just three months. That is why my colleagues from the Shotton works came to see me last Saturday and gave me their considered thoughts. I support them to the hilt and respect all that they seek to do and all that they say.

I see the Bill as a step in the dark. I want to know what will happen to the privatised company if world trading conditions take a turn for the worse. Would the Government bail out that company?

I also have a question on imports. Is the Bill designed to lessen importation, or not? I advise the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Miller), that the Government told me that in 1986 our nation imported over £1 billion of foreign steel — mostly strip. I know the hon. Gentleman's interest in the motor industry and advise him, in addition, that in that same year, 1986, Britain imported 1 million motor cars at a cost in excess of £4·5 billion. Every car that is imported into Britain is foreign steel and foreign strip. Every right hon. and hon. Member knows that our balance of payments is in an unhealthy state. However, there has been £5·5 billion worth of imports which, as time goes by, I predict will prove to be an immense strain to the British economy. Does the Bill presage more imports or fewer?

I now address the subject of pensions. I seek a categorical assurance for my constituents at Shotton steelworks that the corporations' employees will not lose out. They tell me — I agree — that satisfactory arrangements are vital. Can we be sure that foreign companies will not be allowed to obtain a major shareholding in the new company? Like my hon. Friends, I see the steel industry as Britain's strategic industry. We need to guarantee that if the steel industry is privatised, a foreign company or a foreign power will never have leverage on our fundamental industry. I note that there are already cracks in the Government's approach relating to other privatised industries. Only earlier today in the statement, we had an example of that. I hope that if the Minister catches your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, he will address that national point.

I ask again, "Will there be genuine consultation and negotiating procedures, nationally and locally, about the future shape of the industry, and about wages and conditions of service?" When I talk to my steel workers, I know that they want me to seek guarantees about health and safety. We want more not less work in that vital area.

On training, can we be sure that there will be more, not fewer, apprenticeships? Economically, the future of Britain in the next century is related to the way in which we tackle training. We need more not less training in steel in the years ahead.

On research and development, if the industry is to prosper in the next century we need to know what the privatised company is prepared to invest under that heading because it is of crucial importance.

I ask the Minister to express concern for the environment because throughout Britain our citizens are now demanding improvements. Would a privatised profit-conscious company cut corners with regard to the environment? I hope not.

I notice that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury is in his place on the Treasury Bench. I should like to say to his face a word of thanks for the manner in which he has delivered speedily over £500,000 to constituents of mine with regard to top slice tax relief that should have been paid in 1980. He efficiently delivered it late last year, which is much appreciated in my constituency.

Finally, we will listen with care and interest to what the Minister says about the writing-off of debts. Your wish, Madam Deputy Speaker, is for short speeches; I hope that mine has been reasonably short. I warn the Government that this is a step in the dark and even at this late stage they should think again.

8.15 pm

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) spoke with passion, concern and great authority. Many Opposition Members have represented constituency interests strongly. I do not have a constituency interest, but for five years before I became a Member of this House I worked for the Association of British Chambers of Commerce which, in their individual capacities, have shown concern for individual steel plants and the effects of their closures, and in their national capacity have shown continuing concern for manufacturing industry and its competition. Indeed, through that work I learnt about the point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Miller) about the importance of the private steel companies being able to compete with British Steel.

I welcome the Bill because it is long overdue. Indeed, since calls for nationalisation are normally greeted with cheers by the Opposition, and calls for denationalisation — I hope that we can occasionally use that now outmoded word — are greeted with applause by Conservative Members and, I believe, by the country, I am somewhat surprised that this measure was not forecast either in our election manifesto or in the Queen's Speech, but perhaps we will have a response to that later.

In my election address on the subject of privatisation —call it what one will—I said that the interest of the consumer was paramount. I had in mind not only the two great privatisations of the previous Parliament—British Telecom and British Gas — on which continuing vigilance by this House and its Select Committee will be necessary, but also the two major privatisations that are predestined for the rest of this Parliament—electricity and water. I advise my right hon. Friends that I cannot guarantee that I shall take an entirely uncritical approach to those. However, I believe that steel is a relatively straightforward case.

I disagree strongly with those Opposition Members who have claimed that the value of public ownership has been proved by what has happened since 1979. Let us look at what has happened since 1979. Until my right hon. Friends took the industry by the scruff of the neck its history in public ownership had been one of political interference. It had been forced to keep open non-viable plants and, by 1979, West Germany, with a steel production work force only 50 per cent. higher than that of Britain, was producing more than twice as much steel. Indeed, profit figures have already been mentioned. In 1979-80 BSC lost £1,784 million but that loss has now been converted into a profit.

The measures that have been taken to bring BSC back into a competitive position have required unpleasant actions in a number of areas. I pay tribute to the success of the enterprise zone and the creation of new businesses in Corby that have led since 1985 to a 51 per cent. fall in unemployment.

I would remind the House that fewer steel workers now expect to remain in the steel industry for the rest of their working lives. The other day I met a taxi driver in my constituency—I have no idea of his political allegiance — but he had been made redundant from the Scunthorpe steelworks six or so years ago. He had had a difficult time in regaining a viable living. However, thanks to the enterprise allowance scheme, he has now set himself up as a taxi firm in Taunton. That is a success story for the Government's employment measures.

This is a historic occasion because the ownership of the steel industry has moved backwards and forwards from public to private ownership since the war. I have had an interest in such matters for some time. I should like to make two points with reference to the historical perspective. I do not believe that everything that the private sector does is good and, many years ago, there were occasions when private steelwork owners were open to criticism. Correlli Barnett, in his book, "The Collapse of British Power", states:

> "The evidence given before the Iron and Steel Industries Committee in 1917 portrayed a generation of industrialists in whom ignorance vied with complacency. These were men for whom their own old curiosity shops of foundries represented the summit to which progress might aspire and for whom the sophisticated metallurgical science of foreign competitors was not a matter worthy of the attention of a British iron or steel-master."

Mr. Austin Mitchell: That is what we will go back to.

Mr. Nicholson: No, not at all. We need to be aware of history and be warned by past events.

Let us consider another lesson from the past that points to Government policy regarding the economic conditions in which industry operates. I quote from a book which I had the honour to edit, "The Leo Amery Diaries". On 19 November 1925 his diary read:

> "Committee of Civil Research which is now getting near the summing up stage on the Iron and Steel business. Philip"——

Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister, then President of the Board of Trade—

> "summed up ably and temperately in favour of a safeguarding inquiry;"—— the aim was to give a tariff to the industry.

> "Winston"——

then Chancellor of the Exchequer—

> "naturally to the effect that the evidence had obviously shown that we could not grant one"——

an early Cabinet split—

> "I as naturally in the opposite sense comparing all these efforts to wriggle out of the proper and obvious solution of all our difficulties to bluebottles buzzing in a fly trap."

Those quotes demonstrate the position of the industry and the economic circumstances surrounding it.

I hope that privatisation will help us regain at least part of the 40 per cent. of the market that we have lost to foreign imports. I emphasise that the success of the industry depends upon the Government's attitude, for example, to exchange rates. Those rates caused us considerable difficulties in 1980 and I hope that the Government will address that point.

The Iron and Steel Trades Confederation journal for February 1988 states:

> "The union could spend large sums of money and considerable resources — as other trade unions have — campaigning against privatisation. But such a campaign would be a futile gesture. Steel is no longer one of the 'commanding heights' of the economy, nor is it a public utility. Instead the ISTC in facing up to the realities of the situation must apply all its resources to safeguarding the interests of its membership"

I am sure that that is correct and that shows that certain trade unions—more and more, I hope—do not take the strongly ideological opposition to this measure that I fear has been adopted by Labour Members.

8.24 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): If the Bill is passed unamended, it will be a death warrant for the Scottish steel industry. It will send, virtually unencumbered, a corporation into the private sector whose senior management's antipathy to the Ravenscraig complex is well known and well documented. It is a relatively simple matter to map out the bleak future for Scottish steel if the Bill is passed. Indeed, the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) did so extremely professionally.

Over the next seven years successive parts of the Ravenscraig operation will be closed as alternative capacity becomes available elsewhere. First, the strip mill, then one of the blast furnaces and finally the rest of the operation — no doubt in good time to meet the ministerial promises of seven years' iron and steel production at Ravenscraig.

In Scotland we know when bad news is coming. It is preceded by statements from Tory Central Office entitled, "Good news for Scotland". Indeed, it was with that banner headline that the Tories greeted the closure of the Gartcosh finishing mill. I have absolutely no doubt that someone is beavering away at this very moment attempting to interpret the Britoil announcement as more good news for Scotland.

In December the Minister suggested that hon. Members representing Scotland should be pleased with the equivocal assurances of seven years steelmaking at Ravenscraig, yet it is another example of the Government's track record of deceit. If the Minister wishes to prove us wrong he should re-word the guarantee to include all steel operations at Ravenscraig, Dalzell and Clydesdale.

Bevan said "Why look at the crystal ball when you can read the book?". In Scotland we do not need a crystal ball to divine the intentions of the BSC. We need only to refer back to 1982 when it had to be prevented from closing Ravenscraig by political intervention. Those were the days when Scotland still had a Secretary of State who considered it part of his responsibilities to fight Scotland's corner in the Cabinet. The right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger) may have lost more battles than he won, but he is infinitely preferable to his successor who has not lost a political battle because he has fought no fight at all.

Let us consider the absurd spectacle of the Secretary of State, in what was billed as a major speech and, apparently, in all sobriety, proclaiming the virtues of privatisation for the Scottish economy—that in the week that has seen the sell-out of its largest company, Britoil, because of the Government's failure to keep promises made at the time of its privatisation. The Bill aims a dagger at the heart of the Scottish steel industry as a result of more privatisation.

The decision to sustain Ravenscraig in 1982 was clearly correct. The work force has broken production record after production record. Ravenscraig has been operating at well above design capacity. It has been crucial to the build-up of profitability in BSC and that, of course, has made viable the privatisation we are discussing. Unless the Bill is stopped or substantially altered, those efforts will be rewarded by a long lingering death for Ravenscraig over the next seven years. Just as BSC was wrong in 1982, so it is wrong about Ravenscraig in 1988. As an integrated unit Scottish steel could face an outstanding future, responding to the revival of the oil market in the 1990s. As a peripheral plant in a privatised BSC there is little or no prospect for survival.

The implications for the loss of the steel industry go far beyond the direct and indirect impact on the economy and beyond the social consequences for individual communities. When uncertainty surrounds Scottish steel all business, which uses up primary material, is under threat. What country will develop or expand a steel dependent industry when there is a clear danger that a steel rundown will remove Glasgow as a basing point for pricing steel products? The effect will be further to catapult industry towards the midlands, which is the hidden agenda behind the Government's pursuit of steel privatisation.

There is a case for the privatisation of steel. It is not a case which I support, but it is one which is arguable. There is only the poorest case for the privatisation of steel as a single unit. If the BSC is sold as a single entity with dominant market control in the United Kingdom, its capacity will inevitably be reduced below the level which will pertain if it is kept in the public sector or sold as two or more competing units. Over time, the new privatised BSC will reduce output to maximise profitability and will meet excess demand through further imports.

Such is the option open to a company sent into the market with neither the constraints of public accountability nor major domestic competition. The measure smells of opportunism, the chance to make a quick buck in a tidy fashion without the complication of having to think things through. Privatisation in that form will be bad for all the steel industry. Ravenscraig could well be the first casualty, but, most certainly, it will not be the last.

Our colleagues in Plaid Cymru are extremely worried that a free market force will further emasculate the industry in Wales. Since the war, the number of steel workers in Wales has dropped from over 100,000 to under 20,000. As in Scotland, whole communities are dependent upon steel and their future is in the balance.

In its aftermath, the Bill will bring political changes. The threat to the Scottish steel industry may convince many Labour supporters, and perhaps even a few Labour politicians, that the state of the United Kingdom is not compatible with the health of the Scottish economy. The remaining Tory Members from Scotland face a dilemma this evening. Here is a measure which is both anti-Scottish and anti-competition. It is against not only the principles of the SNP, the Labour party and the alliance, but what should be the economic principles of the Conservative party.

I offer the remaining Tory Members this warning, or at least I would do if there were any in the Chamber tonight. If, as Opposition Members suspect, the Bill is the preliminary closure notice for Scottish steel, it will most certainly be the final closure notice for the Scottish Conservative party.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Steel, iron and ironstone have been an integral part of the economy of my constituency. We appreciate how important the Bill is for the constituency and the future of steel work there.

In our debate, we have discussed whether steel workers welcome the measure. My predecessor was a Conservative Member and, in the last general election campaign, the future of the British Steel Corporation and the question of privatisation featured prominently. Before the campaign started, my predecessor was all for privatisation and demanded that it be brought forward as soon as possible. Quite amazingly, during the campaign, he changed his tune and said that there would be no privatisation during the life of the next Conservative Government, and that privatisation was many years away. Ministers who visited my constituency during the campaign repeated the message that the BSC would not be privatised for many years.

We can already see what has happened, in the first Session of a new Parliament. If the Government can be so dishonest towards the electorate, particularly when the manifesto and the Queen's Speech made no mention of the proposal, how can people trust the Government? During the election campaign, it was evident that the people of Glanford and Scunthorpe trusted the Labour party more than the Conservative party to defend the interests of steel workers and the future of the steel industry. I do not intend to break faith in the confidence that those people put in me when they sent me here to represent their interests.

I want to talk about the interests of steel workers and of the industry. The Bill makes no mention of pensions, protection of jobs or protection against foreign takeovers. It makes no mention of giving the work force a share in the benefits of the industry. Perhaps the Minister will tell us whether he wants to see speculators in the City take all the short-term benefits or whether he intends to give a free issue of shares and a share in the industry to the people whose productivity has made a turnround possible.

In some ways, Scunthorpe has recovered from the shattering blow of the steel closures. Eighteen thousand people were employed in the steel industry there. The current figure is 7,500. That was a tremendous blow to the town. Is that tremendous sacrifice to be thrown away when the industry is now back in profit and Scunthorpe is breaking all productivity records and is capable of competing with any other steelworks? Are we to lose the sacrifice of all those families who lost breadwinners when they were put out of work?

In a reply, the Minister told me that, since June 1979, £5,151 million have gone into the BSC. All that is to be written off. Let us make no bones about that. That debt is to be wiped off to enable the industry to be sold. When the industry is in profit, as a result of public investment, it is wrong and irresponsible to write off that debt and not to keep the steel industry in public ownership to make its contribution to paying back that investment.

I fear very much for the future of the industry. In world and European terms, the BSC is not the largest steel producer. The advantage of public ownership is that it evens out the cycles which affect the industry. When the flotation is announced, will the Government warn small investors just what a high-risk investment it will be? The problem of over-production in Europe has still not been resolved. The industry is vulnerable to currency fluctuations. It is a high-risk investment and does not compare with the natural monopolies of British Gas and British Telecom, which were privatised at some considerable loss.

It has been argued that the measure would free the industry from state interference. I wrote to the Minister and asked him how much the BSC advertising campaign was costing. He replied that that was a matter for the board and not for him. There does not seem to be much control when the Minister allows a public corporation to spend its money in a way which blatantly advertises privatisation through its slogan, "The shape of things to come". I do not oppose the BSC marketing itself. It has had a considerable achievement and should be proud of that.

Those people who work in the industry in Scunthorpe are proud of their achievements and their contribution to the industry. It is an act of irresponsibility to write off those debts when the industry is in profit. My constituents tell me that the Humber bridge board, which affects my constituency, has debts of £300 million. It costs £1·50 each way to cross the bridge. It is affecting the economy of the region, as it represents a cost barrier, yet the Government refuse to write off the £300 million debt when they think nothing of writing off a £5 billion debt.

Those are the Government's priorities. That is hypocrisy. The Government are prepared to plunge steel into the uncertainty of private ownership for short-term gain and pure ideological commitment. When steel is doing so well, why not keep it as it is and let the people who work in the industry have some security and let taxpayers enjoy the returns on their investments over so many years?

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): I shall be brief because many of my hon. Friends want to participate in the debate. I want to put on record my response to the cheap political jibe from the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt). I am learning to know and hate his jibes. I was not in the Chamber because I was serving on a Committee, and it is difficult to be here all the time.

Let us be straight about what the Bill is about: short-term profit. It is about selling off the assets of British Steel cheaply. Steel communities such as Redcar know what it is to have seen the industry made lean in previous years. My hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) put the point succinctly earlier when he said that we are suffering public pain for private profit.

The hon. Members for Langbaurgh, for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) and for Darlington (Mr. Fallon), all of whom inhabit the Conservative Benches, have frequently told us that the workers on Teesside are sitting and longing for privatisation to arrive; they are desperate for privatisation and the chance to buy shares. If the matter is put to them in terms of quick money and profit, people will respond in the way that Conservative Members tell us they will, but it is important for Conservative Members who represent Teesside to realise what has happened.

I quote some of the differences between the current prices of shares and the issue price for privatisation. The issue price of British Petroleum was 363p, its current price is 248p; for British Gas, the figures were 135p and 130p respectively. For BAA, the issue price was 245p, and the currrent price is 104p. So Conservative Members should be straighter when talking to workers on Teesside about what the price of shares will bring them in the long run——

Mr. Fallon rose——

Ms. Mowlam: I shall not give way, because Conservative Members did not.

Let us examine the issues of privatisation that concern the workers on Teesside. I shall explain the worries they have expressed in my surgeries. They are concerned about guarantees of their pensions, terms and conditions—the Bill offers none. As my hon. Friends have said, the workers see public money being spent for private profit. Clause 14 clearly explains that public money will pick up the cost of advertising. The Minister will not tell us how much that will cost, now or during privatisation. In answer to a parliamentary question on 18 January we were told that the advertising cost for British Telecom was £11·7 million; for Britoil, £3·1 million; and for British Gas, £11·5 million. So we have some idea of how much public money will be wasted on the privatisation.

We have also heard quite a lot about the debts that will be written off to make British Steel a more profitable bet for the private sector. The Minister shakes his head, so we look forward to hearing from him why this privatisation will be different. Why will it be different from 1980, when £100 million was written off for the National Freight Corporation, and when £160 million of Government loans were written off for British Airways? Perhaps it will be different because the Government already wrote off £3,000 million for British Steel in 1981, and another £1,000 million in 1982. Perhaps the Government have managed to write off some debts through the back door already.

I am a new Member and I do not completely understand clause 5, so perhaps the Minister will clarify it for me. It states that the Government will be appointing —I presume, after the Bill becomes law—nominees for the purpose of the issue or allotment of securities. If the DTI's press notice of 1 February is correct, I presume that that has already been done. I know that my hon. Friends have already asked this question, but the answers were unsatisfactory. Has clause 5 been pre-empted before the Bill came before Parliament?

As my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Coleman) said, the ISTC has fought hard, nationally and locally, to show what British Steel can do, along with workers and management in the industry. On Teesside, we want economic progress and not financial speculation. That will be achieved by leaving British Steel where it is now—in the public sector.

8.45 pm

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) who made an eloquent, passionate and committed speech on behalf of his constituents. It was based on his expertise in the steel industry and on a feeling that pervades the whole of Lanarkshire and Motherwell —of fear for the future of the jobs, families, community and steel workers, because of the threat to Ravenscraig. His eloquence stood in marked contrast to the Minister's speech.

The Minister started off with a philosophical ramble around the privatisation houses. He informed us in the course of discussing old battles that the battle is now over and won and the ideological tussle finished. I do not want to get into a philosophical dispute with him, but he is mistaken if he thinks that. He mistakes minutes for hours. Although he may have made advances in the past few years, if it comes to the choice between unfettered free enterprise, irrespective of the consequences for human beings, and a planned, sensible intervention in the economy, in the course of time the Minister's philosophy will be washed up on the shores of history like the anachronism it is.

There is some nostalgia in the debate, because there have been battles. In my case, the nostalgia is bitter, because almost a quarter of a century ago my predecessor, in his maiden speech, argued strongly for the necessity of returning British Steel to the public sector because of the desperate need for investment, job security and long-term security for the industry. Today we are debating the very opposite — the Government's dogmatic insistence that the publicly owned steel industry, no matter how healthy, profitable, productive and efficient, should be returned to the private sector and hived off for private profit to the Government's friends in the city.

Privatisation is a bad deal for the taxpayer, the work force, Scotland and Britain. In the first instance, the taxpayer will, as usual, get the worst deal. As was admitted earlier today and is recognised on all sides, the taxpayer subsidised the steel industry through its loss-making period and through rationalisation to the tune of £5 billion. The same ordinary taxpayer, for whom the Government shed crocodile tears in their publications and propaganda, has footed the bill for the massive investment that accomplished the turnround in British Steel's fortunes. That long-suffering taxpayer bore the burden of redundancy payments and the benefits paid to unemployed workers thereafter, and it is our friend the taxpayer who will continue to pick up the tab for any future cost of maintaining labour shed by the British Steel Corporation.

With such commitment, sacrifice and financial investment being made by the taxpayer, it might just be expected that he could expect some return now that the television commercials every evening bear testimony to the strength and profitability of the British Steel Corporation — but no such thing. The Government and their financial friends have entered upon a peculiar sort of contract with the British taxpayer. It can be summed up as, "Heads we win, tails you lose." The sell-off of British Steel also represents the sell-out of the British taxpayers.

Another group has also been sold out by the Government. They have invested all they have in the now profitable British Steel Corporation. In the main, they have little capital to invest; they do not have huge bank accounts and cannot sell Picassos to buy block shares in the new corporation. I refer to the work force of the corporation, who have invested their lives, energy and efforts in making BSC the prosperous concern that it is today. They have accepted cuts in numbers, moderation in wage increases, flexibility in work practices and increases in productivity. What will be their share of the BSC bonanza?

What is in it for the steel workers at Belshill, Motherwell, Llanwern, Port Talbot or elsewhere? Will there be guarantees that their future and plants will be secure, or will there be, as there often has been in the past, the inheritance of ambiguity and threats of insecurity, which has always come when steel has returned to the private sector? Those workers and their families, particularly in my area, where the threat is greatest, deserve, at least, a guarantee that their future will be secure. The Minister refuses to give such a guarantee.

My constituents work in the shadow of the Ravenscraig steel plant at the less popular plant — less popular among the press — at Clydesdale tube works in Bellshill. Over the past few years, they have been struggling against a decline in their main market, which was directly related to North sea oil activity. In addition, as the Minister will know, fluctuations in the exchange rate have worked against them. They have suffered from a desperate lack of investment in their mills.

Despite those losses of market and difficulties with the exchange rate, the workers and management — to give them their due — at Clydesdale can take some pride in the fact that the order book is filling up, the shift pattern is increasing and losses have been cut steadily. Only yesterday we learned that over the past three months the books have been balanced.

Under public ownership, contingency would be made for short-term fluctuations. There is no evidence in the history of private steel ownership that a position such as that at Clydesdale would be sustained, even though it is suffering in the short-term from factors outside its control.

To safeguard the United Kingdom's strategic position in supplying the North sea oil industry, the Government must give an assurance that substantial production will continue at Clydesdale in the long-term. Indeed, recently the Minister — to give him credit — and the chairman of BSC were able to confirm a more optimistic long-term future. Will that view still be taken when Clydesdale, along with the other plants, is pushed out of the public sector and into the quick-buck private sector? Will we be able to intervene in the long-term interests of the work force, the local community or the British people? Will we be able directly to influence the management about the need to maintain future investment? We will not be in a position to do so, and the Minister knows that only too well. Part of the reason for privatisation is to avoid those obligations if BSC were to remain in the public sector.

The Chancellor of the Duchy told us — no doubt we will hear it again — that he recently came to the Dispatch Box with what he was pleased to call a guarantee for the future of Ravenscraig and the Dalzell works at Motherwell. He made a statement to the House and waved his papers in the air and said:

"subject to market conditions, there will continue to be a commercial requirement for steel making at Ravenscraig for at least the next seven years . . . there will be a similar requirement for plate rolling at Dalzell."—[Official Report, 3 December 1987; Vol. 123, c. 1107.]

That was an extremely convincing performance; the Minister is not without charm. I had to push continually from my mind the analogy of Neville Chamberlain waving a piece of paper and promising peace in our time. We were promised steel in our time, subject to market conditions.

I have learnt that a Conservative Minister — Mrs. Thatcher's lieutenant — calling upon market conditions is rather like Pontius Pilate calling for the hand towel and soap. Effectively, that was not a guarantee but a timetable for execution laid out by the Minister for those who had eyes to see.

The paper was as worthless as that waved by Chamberlain. Had he been more honest, the timetable for Ravenscraig could have been summed up as "legislation in 1988, flotation in 1989, amputation in 1990 and termination in 1991". That sums up the Minister's statement. The Bill is a further extension of that.

Market conditions — which were referred to as a get-out for the Minister — were dealt with to some extent by my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South. We could not gain access — primarily because of the intervention of the Minister and the chairman of the BSC — to all the available market conditions criteria and information. My friends on Motherwell district council employed Arthur Young and Company to commission the study that was referred to earlier by my hon. Friend. Time prevents me from elaborating on that study, but the case has been made for an investigation of it in greater depth by the Minister and his Friends.

The Minister referred earlier to the fact that, along with merchant bankers, the Government investigated various forms of privatisation. There is a duty on the Minister — if not tonight, at least in Committee — to make the evidence, conclusions and details of that investigation available to the Committee so that we can ensure that every option has been explored.

The Minister described public sector interest in steel as interference. He blamed us for taking an interest and accused us of lobbying the management of BSC. If it had not been for that lobbying and interference and the political messing about of hon. Members, Ravenscraig would have been closed in the early 1980s. It has been kept alive only by that political pressure. If the Minister boasts of the guarantees that were extended politically by the Government on the one hand, he can hardly decry political interference on the other as being something associated with the public sector that is detrimental to BSC.

We have all heard the lesson before, but the ultimate irony of the statement that the Minister made in December was that it was couched in effusive congratulations — as was his speech earlier — for the record-breaking performance of BSC's workers, which is right. BSC made a profit of £190 million in 1987-88, which is an increase on the profit for 1986-87 of £187 million, and is in stark contrast to the massive losses of the 1970s. I have already mentioned the efforts of the Clydesdale work force, the ability of the Dalzell plate mill to produce a quality of steel that is unavailable elsewhere — which is vital to our defence industry — and the regular achievement of new production records at Ravenscraig.

During 1987, no fewer than nine of the 15 records for production in different parts of the plant were broken. Significantly, one of the only records that was not broken was that for the coke ovens, which was because no amount of physical ingenuity or effort of the workers could overcome the desperate need for further investment. Those factors explain the profits which now make the BSC such an attractive investment for the private sector.

Inherent in the Bill is the abdication of the Government's responsibility to steel workers and their communities. The potential effect of the productive rundown of the Scottish steel plants after privatisation would be disastrous for the communities to which they belong, not only to the steel workers. It is only natural that in highlighting those issues I should have concentrated on the interests of my constituents, but the implications of the Bill are bad for all steelmaking areas in the long term. This cannot be seen as just a Scottish problem; it poses serious problems for workers, steel consumers and local communities throughout Britain. The transfer from public to private ownership will affect future investment and the strategic trading interests of the United Kingdom.

The Government may win the vote tonight, but the real decisions will be made by the British people over a much longer period. In the long run, the privatisation of steel will be judged not on whether it fits the dogma of Conservative Members, was mentioned in the Tory manifesto or fits the philosophy of free enterprise. Privatisation will be judged according to whether it advances the national interest, provides sufficient investment to maintain the industry, protects a strategic industry through short-term cyclical downturns, continues to satisfy the needs of customers and is responsive to the needs of employees and communities. By all those criteria, the Bill and its sponsors will be found wanting in the long run.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport East): I thought that my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) was filibustering. In making such a long speech, he has not advanced the cause of Ravenscraig.

his is the second time that the steel industry has been denationalised — or privatised, to give it its more fashionable description. I remind the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that the last time the steel industry was handed over to private enterprise it was hardly a success. The steel industry lagged behind its European counterparts in technological advancements and suffered from lack of investment, which is why the Labour Government renationalised it in 1967. The industry today, relatively speaking, is thriving, albeit in a slimmed down state.

The taxpayers provided the resources for the rescue operation and essential new investment, and it seems now that the City is hoping to reap the profits. The operation is being carried out with undue haste, first because although British Steel is presently on a high, the industry is cyclical and subject to booms and slumps. Secondly, the Government, in order to pursue their doctrinaire ambitions, must keep up the revenue from various privatisation measures. Steel, being profitable at present, can play its part in the process.

Little concern has been expressed about the sacrifices made by the work force. In 1976 BSC employed 210,000 people and it now employs 72,000. The communities in which steel workers live have suffered badly from closures and redundancies in the past decade. I recall the traumatic experiences at Llanwern in my constituency, culminating in the slim-line operation seven years ago. That works has risen like a phoenix from the ashes, and I pay tribute to Mr. Bill Harrison, the works director, who has done a wonderful job, as has the whole work force.

I find interesting the attitude of the BSC higher management to the Government proposals. This is one of the few occasions when I have to disagree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) — after all, we are all a mirror of our experiences. To say that Sir Robert Scholey and the people surrounding him are in favour of the privatisation would be an understatement. Sir Robert Scholey has held important positions over the years in our publicly owned steel industry, but he hardly seems to be a supporter of the principle of public ownership, if his recent utterances are anything to go by. Over the years some Opposition Members have questioned whether the industry was in the right hands. That is a lesson for a future Labour Government.

Sir Robert Scholey's henchman, Mr. Llowarch, at a meeting of the parliamentary Labour party's steel group which I attended, indicated that a privately owned British Steel Corporation, to maximise its profits, would reduce exports below the 40 per cent. now being achieved. That is hardly a patriotic sentiment, bearing in mind our parlous balance of trade. In the same vein, that gentleman believes that British Steel would prefer to reduce capacity to the level where it would have to import steel during periods of high demand in the United Kingdom economy. There is no need for steel workers to look into the crystal; they can read the book. They are being warned about what lies ahead.

Of course, the trade unions' attitude must be considered. Mr. Roy Evans, the general secretary of the ISTC, pointed out that the trade unions have always been in support of public ownership of the industry and have advocated it since the 1930s. That sentiment means little to the Government. I agree with the unions that privatisation should be as a single entity. At least we can be glad for small mercies because the Government appear to accept that principle.

What assurances can the Government give about job security for the future? The Chancellor of the Duchy skated over that issue. Would the Government rescue the steel industry if, yet again, it got into financial difficulties? There is the vital question of the pension rights of the work force, and thousands of people who have been forced to leave the industry. There is a good deal of concern over that issue. I know that there were tremendous problems with the privatisation of the royal ordnance factories. The Government should be more forthcoming. We certainly need more solid assurances.

The Bill marks the end of an era. It will put the industry back into all the uncertainties and inefficiencies of the past. It will have an unsettling effect on the steel communities throughout the country which have suffered so much in recent years. It is an unnecessary Bill and Opposition Members are quite right to oppose it.

9.8 pm

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I rise in my customary position as number eleven in the batting order to bring to the attention of the House some points which have already been made. I shall put them into context and I hope that the Minister will be able properly to consider them. I made some points in an intervention, but I am sure that he did not understand what I was trying to say.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) referred to a meeting between the parliamentary Labour party steel group and the two most senior managers—the chairman and the chief executive—in the British Steel Corporation. We asked them what changes would be brought about by the privatisation of the industry in the style of management, in the options for investment and in the way they went about their business.

They made four points. My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East has already mentioned that they thought an export quotient of 40 per cent. was too high and that if they wanted to maximise profit, they would bring that down. Another point they made, which would have serious consequences for the balance of trade, was that they would not want to run the industry at a capacity capable of meeting all demands. It is a cyclical industry. They would want to use imports at times of big demand because that would be more profitable than maintaining a capacity which would cover all states of demand. I hope that the Minister will deal with the consequences of that for the balance of payments.

Thirdly, they mentioned that there would be an attempt to buy stockholders so as to reduce competition in the middleman sector of the industry. The Minister must give attention to that. Is this what privatisation is about—the reduction of competition in the wholesaling part of the industry? Does he give credence to that suggestion? Does he think that it is worth supporting? Is privatisation about taking greater control of the wholesale part of the industry? Will that be good for consumers or will it simply give greater power to manipulate prices for the benefit of profit but not for the consumers of steel?

The last point that they made was one that I think we would all agree with, that finishing end investment should take priority over steelmaking investment for the foreseeable future. That is not controversial.

In the last two or three weeks, in the press treatment of privatisation, two other mysterious announcements have been made by Sir Robert Scholey. I hope that the Minister will deal with these in his reply. The first is that he plans a lot of joint ventures with other EEC steelmakers. Again, will we see a great reduction in competition throughout Europe if future investment is not contemplated so much by the BSC on its own but only for joint ventures with the Italian, French or German steelmakers in plate mills, section mills or whatever? Will this lead to a reduction in competition which will not benefit consumers? After all, we hoped that privatisation might bring benefits for consumers, if the Government meant what they said.

There has also been a strange reference by Sir Robert to workers' shares. He has said that he wants some form of employee share ownership within the industry on a long-term basis, where workers would not have the option of selling their shares. We asked the steel unions if they knew anything about this and they said that BSC had not said a word to them. What kind of privatisation is it which is presented constitutionally to the House, with other bits being leaked to the press which have not been discussed properly with the trade unions? The impression is that the interests of the workers are paramount, yet the trade unions have not been consulted. Is it part of the kidology with which the measure is presented?

We are told that privatisation is supported by workers and that it will benefit consumers. Yet it will really mean a reduction in competition, and, through a phoney mechanism which has not been discussed with the trade unions, workers will be told, "You will love this. We will not ask your permission to do it but you will have funny money shares which you will not be able to sell. That is why we have not bothered to consult the trade unions about it, because they might have had strong views."

That is not a good way to approach the privatisation of such an important industry. It reveals that the Government are in a rush to privatise the steel industry. I was interested in the comments of the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson) who made the point that this was not in the Queen's Speech or in the Conservative manifesto. The measure has been brought in because of problems with electricity and water privatisation. The hon. Member for Taunton was right to suspect that it has been slotted in well ahead of schedule, long before it was planned and long before it is proper from the point of view of investment. It is a rush job. There is every danger that it will be a botched job. For instance, for how long has the British Steel Corporation been making a profit? Roughly 18 months. Its finances are healthy and its performance has been magnificent. There is no question about that, but it has been in profit for only 18 months.

Would an investor honestly think it proper to take on an industry that has been in loss for most of the past 15 years and suddenly makes a profit once in that time? It has been helped by the fact that many of its investments have turned out to be very good and currency movements have turned in its favour, with the pound – deutschmark – dollar triangle working exactly right for most of BSC, barring the tubes division.

On the basis of 18 months' profitability, would it not have been proper to hang on for about three years of solid profitability before thinking about its sale? Its absence from the Conservative manifesto indicates that. There would be a much healthier price-earnings ratio after three or four years of continuous profits, and the investors and taxpayers could see how BSC had resisted changes in currencies and the trade cycle. If there is to be a downturn in the economy, as most commentators believe there will be next year or the year after, how will British Steel respond to that? Will it still be profitable, or is this sale an example of political opportunism, combined with "short-termism" in the City?

Although the Government will probably be able to sell British Steel this year, will they get the proper price for it? They will get the proper price only when purchasers can see three years or four years of continuous profitability. If the sale has to wait until the next general election, so much the better—for the taxpayers, who will know that they are getting the proper price, and for investors, who will know they can put a reasonable valuation on the industry. They would see that this is not just a fly-by-night job, dreamed up to fill the gap left this year because of the Government's difficulties with the privatisation of electricity, and because they do not know what to do about the nuclear power programme and the electricity industry, as they cannot privatise both. They are having difficulties with the water industry over splitting the regulatory side from manufacture. That is political opportunism. The Government needed a privatisation in this financial year. Steel made a good profit so the Government said, "Let us pull a rabbit out of a hat. Let us bring the steel industry down the slope to privatisation."

But the Government will not get a proper price-earnings ratio for the sale of BSC because the record of profitability is so short. That is why I believe privatisation now is an appalling way to deal with an asset of huge importance to taxpayers and, above all, to the communities that depend on it and the workers in the industry. This unholy rush will leave the management in charge of the industry and determined to shrink it for the sake of profit maximisation, rather than to expand it for the good of the country's balance of payments, the communities, and the workers in the industry.

9.17 pm

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): The debate started with the Minister mourning the fact that steel is the stuff of political controversy and is very often in the eye of the storm and subject to pre-emptive strikes from Governments of the Left and the Right. I suppose that that is self-evidently true, but I am not sure that it advances the argument very far.

At times, this has been a slightly quaint debate. For example, the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) appeared momentarily in our midst to argue that those who work in the industry wanted it to be privatised. He offered personal testimony of that fact. I suspect that the hon. Member for Darlington is the sort of man who imagines that his constituents want the poll tax, so I am not entirely convinced by his arguments.

The Minister, in his opening, showed a touching interest in our intentions as a party when we return to power. I have to say to him that the question is not whether it is right to renationalise steel in a few years' time, but why we should privatise it now. Why sell off a major industry in the way that the Government propose? For the right hon. and learned Gentleman to complain about our political approach is a piece of cheek. He smells dogma in our midst. Considering the Prime Minister's ruthless charge, he doth protest too much.

I thought that the Chancellor of the Duchy was in a very illogical position. He gave much space to management achievements within British Steel and how it had triumphed despite what he described as the restraints of the public sector. He went on, very properly, to draw attention to the advances in productivity, efficiency, the export record and a very large number of factors in the undoubtedly excellent performance of the industry in recent years.

If that is common ground, the question that then shouts out for an answer, and was not answered, is why in those circumstances do we privatise. Is the industry unable to modernise itself? Has it got a poor efficiency rating? The answer, of course, is no, and the Minister very fairly said no. We have come through — and many Opposition Members almost personally bear the scars, at least in constituency terms — a dramatic, indeed a traumatic, period, with perhaps 1980 being the low point in that cycle. But in Consett, Corby, Scunthorpe and Workington, and in various places in Wales and Scotland, we have seen the most horrible and horrific social consequences of closure. These have been borne with considerable courage by those communities, which have worked through them, in many cases, to a position of success, which has been recorded in recent figures.

It is extraordinary to remember that in 1974 in my own area, in the south Clyde region, British Steel directly employed 24,500 people, and today it is under 5,000. If one looks at results — and again this point has been made — man hours per tonne of liquid steel have come down in eight years from over 14 to under six. As for profit — and the Minister referred to this with some satisfaction — in 1986-87 it was £178 million, and in the last half-year for which figures are available it was about £190 million.

So again I ask: why the change? Why plunge this industry into confusion and uncertainty? Why must we have privatisation when we have a successful steel industry that is beating some countries such as Germany, where it is already a private sector operation? It really is an odd belief that is offered by the Minister and one or two of his supporters that in some way we want to do it because, while putting the industry into the private sector, we can sanitise it, withdraw it from political controversy and hand it over to the clean, ethical, sharper world of business.

Anyone who looks at the industry, at the politics of the European Economic Community and at the problems that will arise over steel quotas in the next few years will know that there are probably many sacrifices still to be made. There will certainly be attempts to force us into further cuts in capacity. In particular, there are difficult issues with the talk about contraction of another 7 million tonnes in European terms. It is living in the land of make-believe to imagine that somehow steel can be extracted from that political climate and handed over to commercial interests which will run it in some way beyond controversy and in tune with the wider needs of the country.

I do not think that the case has been made out, and certainly, as a Member who comes from Scotland and represents, in this at least, all the steelmaking areas, I can say that there is a deep resentment about the uncertainty and the difficulties that lie ahead after privatisation.

For Ravenscraig in particular — to concentrate on that for a minute or two — we have the so-called guarantee of steelmaking for a seven-year period. This has been presented on occasion as if it were immutable, bankable and copper-bottomed, but of course it is open to considerable qualification, as the Minister has conceded. It is "subject to market conditions", and the Minister says, after all, this was true of the old guarantee. But the difference is a fundamental one. As has been pointed out again and again by the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) in his capacity as Secretary of State for Scotland, under the old arrangements, under the guarantee that is about to expire, it was a political decision that was keeping Ravenscraig safe. It was said again and again that if there was any threat it would have to be considered at Cabinet level. It was that political element, properly paraded as a badge of honour by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that was the key to the matter.

If that is replaced by what is no more than a business projection in the private sector, without that political backing, it is an illusion to pretend that it is on the same basis as what has existed up to now. I do not believe for a moment that, without that political hold, we can face the future in a privatised steel industry with any great confidence.

I do not want to weary the House with a long history of the relationship between Ravenscraig and the management and higher management of British Steel. However, I was amazed that the Minister failed to understand that there was a problem of credibility in that respect. I do not think that he is a stupid man, although he is many other things. On this occasion, he was being disingenuous, and indeed probably perverse. Anyone — I do him the credit of assuming that he is someone in this respect — who has examined Select Committee reports over the past six or seven years, who has read the press reports and who has met and talked to Sir Robert Scholey, as many of my hon. Friends and I have done, knows that there is an inherent hostility and a feeling that there is an excess of capacity and that for all sorts of geographical and, perhaps, almost mythical traditional reasons it is assumed that Ravenscraig is the plant at risk.

Few believe that that situation will change as if by magic simply because privatisation has been brought in by fiat of the Prime Minister. The hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) recognised that fact at least, and I am grateful to him. He said that the guarantees given were valuable. Perhaps we can compromise on that. They may be worth something, and I am relieved to hear, on the small print, that the guarantees will be included in the prospectus when privatisation comes, if we reach that stage.

I put it to the House that there is still a substantial problem that will not go away and to which any honest hon. Member representing steel interests will have to address himself. What happens now? Are we to turn over the steel industry—Ravenscraig and Dalzell in particular—to a future in which the profit motive rules and in which an opportunity to increase profits from £400 million to £500 million a year will be taken, whatever the social cost and the cost to the public interest? We must ask ourselves the genuine question how we can expect the directors of a public company to reconcile their loyalty to their duties under the Companies Acts with their wider social concerns and economic responsibilities to the community.

The best protection for Ravenscraig or any other steel plant in this country is the defeat of the Bill. Opposition Members aim to retain, if at all possible, a structure that allows sensible balanced decisions in the public interest to be made and controlled in the House. As realists, we have to face the fact that the scheme that the Minister has espoused may be bulldozed through, and there is no doubt that he is determined to pursue that course. If that happens, there will be a great deal of anxiety and dismay in my area and in many others.

I fully understand the arguments advanced by my hon. Friends the Members for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) and for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) about the report produced by Arthur Young. That report has been with us for only a few days but it is clearly intended as a serious contribution to the debate. It is right as a general principle that this House should consider every option if this misconceived scheme of privatisation is to be pushed through. As my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North argued effectively and forcefully, it would be wrong to slam the door on any contribution to the debate before it has been properly examined, and the report cannot yet have been properly examined.

I resent the Minister's implication that those who have the genuine concerns of Ravenscraig at heart have been rushing around in a desperate search for someone to rubbish good news. If that were true, it would, indeed, be a cynical exercise. However, very few people view privatisation as good news and no one is interested in rubbishing anything. We are interested in finding correct solutions and some protection for a fundamental industry that provides the livelihood of a whole community.

Our opposition is fundamental. If privatisation goes ahead we shall continue to fight to save the industry—whether Ravenscraig or any other major plant. I must protest against the idea that the proper realism shown by my hon. Friends from all parts of the country about the difficulties and dangers should be condemned by Ministers as defeatism or an attempt at knocking copy. Again, it was the hon. Member for Eastwood who recognised the reality of the arguments and the difficulties. The sooner that that kind of common sense prevails in the thinking of Government Front Bench spokesmen, the better for everyone in the debate and in the communities which depend upon the steel industry.

Of course, I accept, as was said by my hon. Friends the Members for Motherwell, North and for Motherwell, South that, with the closure of the hot mill at Ravenscraig, the whole plant will be in great difficulties. That is true. But we do not want the closure of that hot mill. Perhaps the Minister would turn his mind to his guarantee for strip production at Ravenscraig. He referred to 1989 with an air of pride, but 1989 is tomorrow for the steel industry in terms of its planning. The greatest contribution that he could make towards giving some credibility to his good intentions would be to take the decision now that strip mill production should continue at Ravenscraig.

Given British Steel's profitability and record, there is no case for the closure of major capacity. If I may pray in aid an unlikely ally for me, I was interested to see this week in The Economist—a magazine which is not hostile to the idea of privatisation; I would not pretend that it was—that there is a survey of the industry and the article concludes:

"That should not mean closing British plants, now efficiently run and unsubsidised."

That is right. There is no such case, whether it be in a nationalised or a privatised industry. That is our approach and that will be our attitude to any threat, whether it be in Ravenscraig or South Wales, in Teesside or any other part of the country where that threat may materialise.

The Under-Secretary of State has a number of questions to answer. There were some extraordinary doubts in the speech of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, which was remarkable for what he did not have to say. My hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) asked him specifically about the timetable and form of the flotation. It is right that the Minister should lift the lid of the box a little way and let us see what creepy crawlies are within. It is important that he should be a little franker than his senior colleague was about exactly what is proposed.

Several of my hon. Friends have properly pressed the Minister about the matter of control and ownership. For example, my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) fairly and frankly put the point of view of his work force and also raised the whole question of foreign ownership and control in a privatised industry.

Mr. Barry Jones: My hon. Friend also heard our views from Wales on what might happen with regard to organisation after privatisation.

Mr. Dewar: Yes, indeed. My hon. Friend made a concise and straightforward speech, as is his style, but the point that I was making concerned control and ownership and it is important that the Minister should say something about that.

We know from the statement made in December by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that the control or restriction of foreign shareholdings did not instantly appeal. He said that almost in an aside. It is owed to us to know whether there have been second thoughts on that or whether that is the Minister's last word.

I can understand the scepticism of hon. Members from both sides of the House on this issue, given the Government's record. Indeed, that scepticism must be in a remarkably healthy state on the day in which the capitulation over the independence of Britoil has been announced from the Dispatch Box. The whole concept of the golden share has been well and truly devalued. But there are, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham said, other possibilities. For example, there is the 15 per cent. limit in the Rolls-Royce equity.

No one would question the fact that there is genuine public anxiety about the possibility of the kind of opportunistic raid upon a privatised British Steel Corporation that has been carried out, largely in conditions created by Government incompetence, by the Kuwaiti Investment Office on BP. It is important that the Government explain exactly where they stand, and, if the alarming silence in the Chancellor's speech is to be taken as meaning that there will be no control, no attempt at protection or safeguards, I must give warning that that is a serious matter which will be open to widespread criticism far beyond the Opposition Benches.

Our position on privatisation is clear. I make that point because, with all respect to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce)—whose speech entertained me greatly—I have to say that I had considerable difficulty in understanding where he, or indeed his party, stands on the privatisation issue. [Interruption.] I am a simple person: I simplify all great and complex matters, and I shall always think of his party as the Liberal party.

The hon. Gentleman outlined three or four options that might become relevant after privatisation, and was careful to make it clear that he advocated none of them. It may well be said that he could have advocated all of them, and what he said would have been as important and as relevant.

What I found even more remarkable was that the hon. Gentleman was very unclear about his attitude to privatisation itself. Fortunately, those of us with long memories can remember the Liberal party's election manifesto, and also the exchange of letters in Scotland between the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) and myself during the election. In a letter written on 18 May, the right hon. Gentleman made it clear that he was in favour of the privatisation of the steel industry. I suppose that that is no surprise. The Liberal amendment welcomes the Bill because of British Steel. After all that, all that I can do is congratulate the hon. Member for Gordon on managing to get himself into the right Lobby at the end of the day, for it seems to me that the confusion in that camp is remarkable.

"it paves the way for the successful flotation"

Let me conclude by saying that I fear that the Government will show a brittle inflexibility on the issue. It is remarkable—this point was fairly made by the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson)—that no mention was made of the measure either in the election manifesto, which I had remembered, or in the Queen's Speech, which I had not remembered until he reminded me. I believe that it has been pushed through with indecent haste.

With a group of my Scottish colleagues, I went to meet the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster shortly after his appointment, in the aftermath of the general election, and we went to see him again in January. He gave us some hope at that time. He went out of his way to say that strategic decisions about investment and structure in the steel industry would not be conditioned by privatisation considerations. The impression that was given was of a lengthy time scale. The right hon. and learned Gentleman did not disguise the fact that privatisation was at the end of the road as the Tories saw it, but our clear impression was that it was way down that road, perhaps several years away. That impression was gained not only by me but by all my hon. Friends at that meeting, many of whom are in the Chamber now.

It is extraordinary to discover that we are now debating the Second Reading of this Bill—a Bill which has been introduced with a haste which means that almost every interest will be bulldozed, and which will exclude any consultation, any imagination or understanding of the fears and problems that will arise. The only argument for the Bill can be stated in the language of short-term financial gain; there is no other logic. I also hold that it is hardly an honourable exercise, even in terms of popular capitalism.

I was amused by the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that investors would be able to form their own judgment on the merits of investment. What will really happen is a ruthless hard sell, glitzy and cynical, with all the ethics of the most primitive of market places—television, advertising and all the drama and promise of profit with no proper consideration of the risks and difficulties.

This is a shoddy measure which promises destabilising uncertainty. It is totally irrelevant to the real interests of the industry, and it is based on dogma. The Labour party is unequivocally, implacably opposed to it, and we shall vote accordingly.

Mr. Morgan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to be licking and sealing 28 envelopes during a debate on a very important topic? Will it not give a very bad example to new Members such as myself—reverse Privy Councillors, as we like to refer to ourselves—and is there not an office for the purpose in the Duchy of Lancaster?

Mr. Holt: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you say that it is not in order for Opposition Members to eat in the Chamber?

Mr. Speaker: I hope that we shall all keep the standards of the Chamber.

9.39 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins): We have had an interesting debate today and to that extent I am delighted to be able to summarise it in the short time available to me. Indeed, I am pleased to have less time, because that has allowed other hon. Members of all parties to make speeches that they would not otherwise have had the chance to make.

I must confess that, having sat here throughout the whole debate, I am fascinated by the fact that although this was supposed to be one of the most controversial issues facing the Scottish Labour party, prior to the wind-up speech of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), there has not been what one might call a full complement of the Scottish Labour party present this evening.

To make progress, I should like to try to summarise the debate—[Interruption.] If Opposition Members would keep quiet, I might be able to answer some of the points that they have raised during the debate. If they are going to shout all the way through, they will not get the answers until they choose to serve in Committee. The sooner they learn that, the better for all concerned.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), who opened the debate this afternoon for the Opposition, gave the lie to the new trendy Socialism to which I noticed the hon. Member for Garscadden referred at the culmination of his speech when he talked about "glitzy", show business, television, walking on cliff tops and a variety of other things. He even mentioned red roses which, dare I mention it, were pinched from my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and those other Lancastrians who deserve to wear them— [Interruption.] It is no good Opposition Members ranting. I shall answer the debate in my own way, and if they do not like it they can do the other thing.

The hon. Member for Dagenham raised several questions to which he wanted answers. However, he will understand only to well that many of those questions cannot be answered immediately becaue, as he knows, the Bill is an enabling Bill, and not one to privatise the British Steel Corporation, as it is presently stated. In those circumstances, some of the questions that he asked—for example, about the date of flotation, pension arrangements and share arrangements generally — will be considered, answered and discussed in Committee when we get there.

However, there was one question about the so-called golden share. I emphasise what my right hon. and learned Friend stated: we think that there might be a case for an anti-takeover provision, but we are not yet persuaded that specific restrictions on foreign ownership are necessarily required. On consideration, that view may change, but at the moment that is what it is and what we believe it should be.

The hon. Member for Dagenham gave us the new Socialist leadership's views on life. He thinks that he might renationalise the British Steel Corporation, but does not know how. Despite the image of yuppie Socialism, he is still in favour of clause 4, but is not entirely certain what he will do, or how he will do it, if he comes to renationalise.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell issue is not one for commercial judgment. We beg to differ. We think that the achievement of the British Steel Corporation has come about because of commercial judgment, which is why we believe it to be important.

My hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw), who apologised for not being here for the wind-up speeches this evening, made a speech that we all recognise as one of considerable knowledge, having held this post as the Minister responsible for the steel industry before the previous election. My hon. Friend welcomed the Bill and made an effective contribution, especially in his remarks about the hon. Member for Dagenham, whom he squashed most effectively. My hon. Friend, more than most, understands the industry. He asked questions about the European regime; the House will be aware that my right hon. and learned Friend will deal with that matter in detail after this debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey and others asked about the so-called writing off of debts. Let me make one thing absolutely clear: no subsidies and no writing off of debts are involved. Anyone who says so has got it entirely wrong.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) thrashed around looking for options to evade the commitment that he gave in the alliance manifesto during the last election. The hon. Member for Garscadden also made reference to that. We — I suspect that Labour Members share our view — were conspicuously unimpressed by the difficulties he had in changing the view he held at the election. His performance summed up the many alliance and Liberal parties that we presently have in the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) spoke with some knowledge and authority about the issues as he sees them. I intend to answer the points that he and other hon. Members have made.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The Chief Whip is making notes.

Mr. Atkins: It would help if Labour Members, having posed questions, tried to listen to the answers. At this time of the evening the House would expect a Minister to try to answer the debate. People who have made contributions deserve comment upon them. Labour Members who have asked questions will get some answers if they belt up. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"]

The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), who has an emotional and lifelong commitment to nationalisation, made a speech with which I cannot take great issue because of his stance over the years. We will just have to agree to differ over the conclusions he draws. I defer to his experience and knowledge in this issue because he represents a steel constituency and he speaks with authority on the matter. None the less, I disagree with him.

Much reference has been made to the Arthur Young report. The Young report looked at the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell option, but without, as hon. Members on both sides of the House have said, all the facts. Because of the commercial confidentiality involved in providing the information to Arthur Young, my right hon. and learned Friend believed that it was not right to provide all the facts, and I agree.

It must be borne in mind that the Government must look at the industry as a whole, whereas Arthur Young was commissioned to look at the industry as it particularly related to the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell option. Incidentally, even the Arthur Young report commented that there was no need for substantial capital expenditure on the RSD option over the next five years. Reference was made earlier to the fact that there should be more capital investment, but even Arthur Young has discounted that argument.

For reasons of confidentiality, Arthur Young was not privy to all the information available to BSC, the DTI and its professional advisers. The Department and its advisers had no hard and fast rule in the early stages about the break-up or whether the corporation should be sold as a single entity. Indeed, Samuel Montagu, which examined the matter closely in the spring and autumn last year, made it quite clear in its conclusions that it was firmly against the break-up of the corporation.

Throughout the debate, reference has been made, especially by the hon. Members for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) and for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray), to the involvement of Shotton in the RSD option. I can do no better than to reiterate what the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) said, in a number of interventions supported by other hon. Members representing Welsh constituencies, in supporting what Mr. Joe Gibson, the chairman of the joint unions committee at Shotton, said:

"We feel that our destiny must continue to lie with the big unified BSC and not with any carved-up small units as suggested. We feel that this would be in our best interest and probably be so in the long run for Ravenscraig too.

We see our future as staying with the corporation rather than splinter groups. We are happy about our future and we have expansion and good investment".

That effectively destroys the arguments by Scottish Members, including the hon. Members for Motherwell, South and for Motherwell, North. The unions disagree with them.

Dr. Bray rose——

Mr. Atkins: Time is pressing, and I should move on. It is also the case——

Dr. Bray rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the Minister does not give way, hon. Members must not persist.

Mr. Atkins: It is also the case that the executive of the ISTC——

Dr. Bray: Chicken.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is no good hon. Members shouting in that disgraceful way.

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman is behaving like a headless chicken.

It is also the case that the executive of the local ISTC rejected the studies sponsored by Motherwell district council and backed by local Members of Parliament. Supporters of the idea argued that it would make for a viable, integrated company and remove doubts about the plant's future, but union representatives, particularly from Shotton, doubt the scheme's feasibility. The executive argued that, if British Steel is to be privatised, it should be sold as a single unit. [Interruption.] Opposition Members may not like that, but I am only telling them what they have already been told and what has been expressed publicly by Opposition Members from Wales about what they think of the division as proposed in the Arthur Young report. Hon. Members may not like it, but it happened to be the case.

Let me remind the House of the solemn assurance given by the BSC in December:

"Subject to market conditions, BSC expects that there will continue to be a commercial requirement for steel making and continuous casting capacity of the five integrated plants for at least the next seven years."

That is exactly the same as in the previous two three-year extensions.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was right when he suggested that the Labour party is turning over every stone in an attempt to find something nasty to say about the very plant that it wants to keep open. The hon. Member for Motherwell, South has even resorted to seeking advice from so-called Right-wing groups, such as the Institute of Economic Affairs and the Adam Smith Institute. It seems slightly odd that he has to resort to his opponents to try to justify his case. The continual knocking of Ravenscraig and what it stands for is scarcely likely to help Opposition Members, but that is largely what we have come to expect from them.

About a month ago, I had the honour to lead a trade mission to Poland, during the course of which I visited Huta Lenina, which is the largest steelworks in the country. It employs over 30,000 people, using equipment more than 30 years out of date. Some of the expert business men who were in the mission with me reckoned that the figure of 30,000 could be cut to 10,000 because that was all that was needed to run the plant more productively, effectively and profitably. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to listen to what the Minister has to say.

Mr. Atkins: The Poles who met us at the steelworks wanted to know about the British Steel Corporation and why it had achieved such efficiency. They wanted to know what equipment the British Steel Corporation was using — [Interruption.] I am fascinated by Opposition Members. They have made great play of the Bill being controversial and of how concerned and upset they are, and all they can do is giggle and laugh about the issues that they claimed were serious. That sums up the fraudulent, synthetic opposition to this important Bill. We shall not forget the attitude Opposition Members are adopting— [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must ask the House to listen to the Minister answering the debate.

Mr. Atkins: The attitude of the Poles who were running a steel works to the success of the British Steel Corporation is a measure of the scale of the achievement of the work force and management of the corporation and one of the chief reasons why it is right that the corporation should once again be returned to the private sector.

During the debate on the nationalisation of steel in May 1965, the then Minister of Power, Mr. Fred Lee, took as a central theme the following:

"The crucial test of our proposals is whether they are well designed to meet the challenge of the future to which I have been referring."

A subvention by Government and taxpayers of £8·6 billion in public dividend capital since 1967 suggests that those proposals were not as well designed as that Minister suggested.

Later in the same debate, which I had the pleasure of watching from the Gallery, in a rare flash of far-sightedness, George Brown said:

"It has always seemed to me that if it is attempted to impose State control on people who have to earn their living by reference to the profit motive, one is bound to get the worst of all worlds."—[Official Report, 6 May 1965; Vol. 711, c. 1582, 1689.]

So it has proved.

If I may return to the theme of the speech made by my right hon. and learned Friend in opening the debate, British Steel must be given the freedom to take its own business decisions. It needs that freedom if it is to be sure of building on the solid commercial base it has now created for itself. It needs to know that it can take decisions quickly, without having to revert to Government at every turn. It needs flexibility and independence if it is to withstand pressure of an increasingly competitive international market. The British Steel Corporation has made outstanding progress in recent years. It has transformed its business into a modern, efficient and profitable organisation, which can compete successfully in world markets.

Hon. Members who understand the steel industry know full well what has been achieved in recent years. If they deny the success of the achievements of the work force and management, they fly in the face of the facts. I recognise that the corporation was not restored to health without a painful process of rationalisation; it would have been less painful, perhaps, if the necessary steps had not been shortsightedly delayed. My right hon. and learned Friend has described the efforts that have been made and the splendid results that have been achieved. I join him in congratulating the management and work force of the corporation on those results.

A number of the points raised by right hon. and hon. Members on both sides deserve and will get consideration as the Bill goes through Committee. But our record on privatisation, of British Aerospace and a variety of other companies—Rolls-Royce, the British Airports Authority —has been more successful than anyone would have expected, and gives the lie to the suggestion by Opposition Members that the British Steel Corporation will be anything less than a great success in the private sector. The time has come to embark on the next step in the transformation of the corporation into a successful commercial enterprise and to return British Steel to its right and proper place—the private sector. The Bill will pave the way for that step, and I commend it to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

10.14 pm

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 8560/87, the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Department of Trade and Industry on 1st December 1987 and 4127-88 on steel policy, 8803/86 and the proposals described in unnumbered Explanatory Memoranda submitted by the Department of Trade and Industry on 7th July 1986 and 15th July 1986 on trade with the United States of America in certain steel products, 8993/86 and COR 1 on aids to the steel industry (1984-85), and the proposals described in the unnumbered Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Department of Trade and Industry on 19th October 1987 on delivery levels of certain steel products of Spanish and Portuguese origin onto the rest of the Community market; supports the Government's commitment to a Community steel regime which provides a framework for a steady return to free market conditions; and endorses the Government's agreement of measures which place a temporary limit on steel exports to the United States of America, thus safeguarding access to the American market.

As the House has now satisfactorily sorted out the problems of the British Steel Corporation privatisation, it is obviously a suitable occasion to go on to this debate where we concentrate on the international, particularly European, aspects of the steel market. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will hon. Members, particularly those beyond the Bar, who are not staying for the debate please leave quietly?

Mr. Clarke: The debate arises from four European Community documents and four explanatory memoranda relating to the steel industry, which have been recommended for debate by the Select Committee on European Legislation. I apologise to the House for the fact that it was necessary in the best interests of the United Kingdom to agree to decisions on two measures, those concerning the future European Coal and Steel Community steel regime, and the RESIDER programme, before a debate could be arranged. Hon. Members who have followed the decisions that we took at the Council meetings before Christmas will accept that on both subjects the Government entered into an agreement which is non-controversial and is accepted on both sides of the House as in the overall interests of the United Kingdom and the steel community.

The documents as a whole deal with the international steel regime. The most important subject which they cover is the European steel regime based on quota shares of the market and an arrangement which protects steel producers against a catastrophic fall in prices. The European quota regime was introduced a few years ago when the European steel industry was going through a period of acute crisis. The regime is generally a tribute to the work of Commissioner Davignon and was brought into play at a time when there was huge excess capacity throughout the European Community. Prices were at risk of collapsing altogether. The likely reaction to a collapse of market prices at that time would have been that the various member states would have gone in for a competitive arrangement whereby each tried to cover the losses of its own industry, and they competed with each other by offering subsidies to try to sustain their industries.

The purpose of the system when it was introduced was to try to keep supply and demand roughly in balance to prevent prices from falling to ruinous levels while surplus capacity was removed. The arrangement was always meant to be temporary; it was never intended to be timeless. The aim was to try to create orderly marketing arrangements within the European Community to win time for the necessary changes to take place and for restructuring to be carried through.

As is so often the case with temporary arrangements, the arrangements have lasted for some years. In my discussions with my European colleagues, whether they be Ministers from other member states or people connected with other sections of the European steel industry, I find that inevitably some people are from time to time tempted to regard a quota regime as being desirable in the longer term. Certainly there are those within the steel industry who like to think of the industry as one which is naturally cartelised and is best arranged on that basis. It has the attraction, particularly for the weaker steel producers, that by such means prices are kept artificially high and the businesses can be kept open at levels of capacity far above those which would be necessary for viability if open market conditions were ever restored.

It is certainly not my view that the regime should be permanent or that cartel systems are desirable in anyone's interests. I do not think that it is in the interest of steel producers to try to share markets between basically inefficient producers. Certainly it would not be in the interests of steel users, and we must remember that in this economy, as in any other, more jobs are created by the use of steel than by its production. Anything which artificially inflates the price of steel from the steel producers is of no advantage to the general economy of Britain or Europe.

Therefore, once the temporary arrangements have served their purpose, it is necessary to go back to the reasonably free market conditions described by my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) in the previous debate as desirable and in the interests of consumers and the industry generally. We have reached a stage where the system is beginning to cause more harm than advantage from the British viewpoint. Consumers face higher prices than they would otherwise do, and sometimes encounter shortages, and certainly constraints on the supply of the raw material because of the quota effects on the market.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): That is the effect of the European Community.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that that is the great danger. When I meet some of the more robust defenders of the quota arrangements in the European Community, they seem to believe that we should set up a sheepmeat regime for the steel industry as a long-term process. The Government are against that proposal, as it is not in anybody's interests; nor is it in the interests of BSC.

In tonight's Second Reading debate I think we all agreed, in discussing the interests of the BSC, that it will thrive in freer market conditions. It is now among the most profitable and efficient steel producers in western Europe. Indeed, BSC's production costs are substantially lower than those in the United States of America, and in other leading European steel-producing countries. We are looking for a return, in the most orderly fashion possible and as quickly as possible, to essentially free market conditions.

A key problem, however, which is at the root of our debates this evening and on other occasions about the arrangements dealt with in the documents before us is over-capacity. The European market remains dogged by massive over-capacity in European steel production, which means that plant is still in place, providing only temporary jobs, and capable of producing steel that can never be sold in a free market. That is so even after the great restructuring of recent years. Over-capacity is estimated by the European Commission at 30 million tonnes, which is not much less than the amount of over-capacity already cut out as a result of processes in the past six years.

There were reductions of 32 million tonnes between 1980 and 1986, which I shall not trouble the House with this evening. We have made substantial progress in the past two years. Coated sheet and reinforcing bar were liberalised from quota from the beginning of 1986. Galvanised sheet was also liberalised at the beginning of 1987, and, on the Commission's proposal, we finally liberalised wire, rod and merchant bar, which are known in the trade as light long products, from 1 January 1988. The quotas are steadily being removed.

BSC is now the only company in the country affected by quotas, as the private sector steel producers are not affected by them any more. The great problem that remains concerns products usually described as flat products, such as hot rolled coil, cold reduced sheet and plate and also heavy sections. In those products, there is over-capacity of about 21 million tonnes out of the total of 30 million tonnes that I referred to.

Originally, the Commission proposed for these products a new production quota system from 1 January 1988 to last for three years. I was not the only Minister who found the original Commission proposals distinctly unattractive. That was the starting point of discussions by the Council of Ministers before Christmas 1987. I am glad to say that they reached agreements that will bring us steadily closer to the end of the quota system, on terms that we would find acceptable and attractive.

The discussions at the Council of Ministers on 21 September 1987, which was the first meeting that I attended after the long recess, brought unanimous agreement that substantial excess capacity still remained in Europe. The Ministers at least agreed on that as a good starting point, and it was decided that new quota arrangements should not be established for 1988 and beyond unless enough guarantees of capacity cuts were reached to ensure the future viability of the European steel industry. Having agreed that we saw no case for quotas continuing without excess capacity being reduced, I regret to say that in September there was little prospect of the Ministers present at the meeting agreeing on how that excess capacity should go.

Therefore, the Council agreed that we would invite the Commission to appoint three persons, who almost inevitably became known as the "three wise men", to advise by mid-November on how adequate commitments might be obtained. The idea of going to three outsiders with industrial experience certainly appealed to me. It was a German proposition put forward by the German Minister Martin Bangemann, and strongly supported by me on behalf of the United Kingdom. The three wise men thus began their consultations.

After the consultations with steel producers and Governments, the wise men reported that firms were not ready to give commitments to the level of capacity reductions that were being sought. They failed to come up with the necessary commitments. I am glad to say that the wise men recommended a phasing out of quotas to provide a gradual return to a free market.

That was the background to the Council of Ministers which I attended on 8 December, which considered revised proposals from the Commission along the lines of the wise men's recommendations. Quotas for flat products and heavy sections would be phased out over a six-month period, but with a possible extension until 1990 for some products if adequate guarantees of restructuring could be obtained.

In that Council I pressed for the earliest practicable return to a free market and for progress with the further restructuring which was necessary for the long-term stability of the market. The Council at that stage simply deferred the final decision on the future steel regime to a further Council meeting to be held on 22 December. The Commission was asked to make a further effort itself to secure from Governments clear and credible indications of willingness to reduce capacity by a sufficient amount. That took us to 22 December.

At that stage, after a long discussion, the majority of the Council were satisfied that we had at least got promising indications of willingness to remove excess capacity in plate and heavy sections, but some members, including me on behalf of the United Kingdom, were extremely anxious that we should not simply roll forward the quotas because we were making promising progress towards restructuring. We wanted the quotas extended for a very limited period while those indications were turned into some practical and credible signs that closures would take place in the countries in which they were needed.

The result was that we finally agreed that it was worth while to maintain the quotas on the products in question for six months, during which time binding guarantees of capacity reductions would be sought. If such guarantees, amounting to 75 per cent. of the over-capacity, were forthcoming, quotas would continue until 1990.

For hot rolled coil and cold reduced sheet, we put precise figures. We agreed that there should be a possibility of prolonging these quotas, provided binding guarantees of 7·5 million tonnes of capacity reductions in hot rolled coil were given by 10 June. I pressed hard to have these precise figures for capacity reductions required in the Council's conclusions, and they are there, as hon. Members will see if they look at the reports that I have given to the House in the past.

I believe that, if that very demanding target of 7·5 million tonnes is achieved, we shall have taken a very worthwhile, major step towards achieving a healthy and viable Community steel industry. If we do not get that restructuring put firmly in place as a commitment by our June meeting, under the terms of the Council's conclusions quotas for these categories will end. I must also say that, as a legal point, prolongation beyond June is dependent upon the Commission's being satisfied that the conditions of the treaty are met—in other words, that a state of manifest crisis, to use the terms of the treaty, still exists for hot rolled coil and cold reduced sheet.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Can the right hon. and learned Gentleman make it clear that the 7·5 million tonnes which he is seeking in capacity reductions will not involve closures in the United Kingdom or include the output of the hot mill at Ravenscraig? Secondly, can he explain how it came about, if there was that 7·5 million tonnes of excess capacity in Europe, that there is currently such a shortage of hot rolled coil in Europe, and why the delivery period has gone up to 17 weeks?

Mr. Clarke: I can give the answer that the hon. Gentleman would prefer. There is no question of the British Government offering any undertakings of closures to meet any of the targets. One obvious reason for that is that I wish quotas to be phased out as quickly as possible. Therefore, there is no way that I shall go to the Council of Ministers offering to restructure to help to achieve the targets. If other countries want quotas to continue, they will have to come up with the necessary closures.

Secondly, for all the reasons discussed in the previous debate, it is obvious that the British industry is far more advanced in the necessary restructuring than any of the other European industries. Therefore, no one could reasonably look in our direction. We believe that people should look first to the unprofitable centres of production and consider taking the difficult steps needed to get that unprofitable production off the market and permanently closed down.

I have no ready explanation for the shortages of products from mills. Sometimes supplies of products are interfered with by the quotas, which inhibit the ability of companies such as the BSC to move in quickly when there are delays in supplies, because it is not possible——

Dr. Bray: All the hot mills are working flat out at the moment.

Mr. Clarke: I do not think that the hot mills are working flat out anywhere in western Europe. They are working flat out up to their present manned capacity. To the best of my knowledge and belief—I shall look into the matter because the hon. Gentleman is extremely well informed in these matters and almost as close to the steel industry as I am—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I say that I am closer only because I am a Minister in the Department. I do not believe that the United Kingdom hot mills have been working up to their full capacity for many years. The problem in the British industry is that our hot rolled mills normally work at a lower capacity than those elsewhere in western Europe. We shall leave it to the corporation to decide that problem in future years. Everything depends on the ability to respond to the market, which will be helped if we can get rid either of excess capacity in western Europe or of quotas, or preferably both.

Let me return to the Council's conclusion of 22 December. If sufficient guarantees of restructuring are not received by 10 June, quotas for all products will end on 1 July 1988. I am determined to stick to those conclusions and I hope that the other Ministers will do likewise. In my experience, Council meetings sometimes start as though the conclusions of the previous meeting had never been reached. In practice, we have built on previous conclusions, and the conclusions of 22 December were agreed by us all to be binding on all member states.

I have already said that I shall not offer any restructuring for the United Kingdom. I believe that if sufficient capacity reductions are not given voluntarily to retain quotas, the ordinary pressures of the free market will force out the less profitable capacity, leaving profitable and efficient producers such as the BSC to take advantage of the opportunities in a more competitive market. We must ensure that we do not then return to competition in state subsidies. To ensure that companies do not cheat by falling back on subsidy, I shall continue to urge the Commission to enforce the ban on state aids as strictly and effectively as it has hitherto. I am sure that Commissioner Peter Sutherland is determined to do that.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): The Minister says that under the existing decision, if the commitments are not delivered by 1 July, quotas will simply stop. Could not the Council, by a majority at its next meeting, decide to extend quotas once again? The Government would not be in a position to veto such a decision, made by majority vote.

Mr. Clarke: It is not like that. I shall give my hon. Friend my understanding of the position, and if I get it wrong I shall correct myself by letter. The Council is governed by the treaty of Paris and not the treaty of Rome with which my hon. Friend and I are reasonably familiar.

As I understand it, if the Commission put forward a proposal, that proposal could be carried by a majority. However, if the Commission put forward no proposal, there is no way that the Council could impose its own regime, except unanimously. If the Commission takes the view that there is no need or legal basis for further quotas and that the undertakings have not been forthcoming, it would require the unanimous vote of all the member states represented in the Council to overrule the Commission's decision. There is no prospect of my failing to support the Commission in that situation. I am quite sure that at least one other Minister—the Dutch Minister—would not move from his position either.

Only if the Commission is induced, contrary to our conclusions at the last Council, to put forward proposals despite the fact that the commitments have not been forthcoming, will we reach the position where in certain circumstances majority voting will be an issue. Given all my dealings with Commissioner Narjes, it would be extremely unlikely if, at this late stage, after all the meetings that I have described, any such proposition were forthcoming.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: My right hon. and learned Friend may be in danger of being too optimistic, despite the super fight that he is putting up, bearing in mind that in paper 640 of 30 November, the Commission made it quite clear that it did not agree with all the conclusions of the three wise men.

Mr. Clarke: Yes, there is always the danger of being over-optimistic. I am always startled when I get to these Council meetings to find that one or two Ministers will launch upon their contributions as if they had never been present, let alone agreed to the conclusions of the previous Council. But, as we go through the various meetings, they steadily realise that time is running out on that kind of proposition. The expectation that every Minister took away from the previous Council was that, unless commitments to a restructuring of the size that I have described are forthcoming, quotas will come to an end. I have no doubt that some will fight a rearguard action.

I do not want to be over-optimistic, but at the moment I feel extremely confident that we have taken the important step towards getting these restructuring commitments. Removing all that spare capacity from Europe would get to the root of the problem more than anything else. Without restructuring, there will be no quotas but a free market, and, as I have said, no competing state aids within that free market.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): The Minister referred to the danger of state subsidy if the quotas are ended because there is no agreement. I am relieved that the Minister is not prepared to concede extra cuts in our own quota, but is he aware that there have been allegations that the Italian steel industry has already been trying to get around the regulations by such means as giving unrealistic delivery dates with a built-in delivery penalty, thereby not making the delivery date and paying the penalty price as a way of subsidising the price of steel? How would the Minister deal with such examples?

Mr. Clarke: I shall deal with the document on state aid in a moment. I have certainly heard such allegations and others. The Commission investigates and enforces the present arrangements. This is a tricky area because several corporations are in such a desperate state that their Governments are seriously tempted to go into state aids. I am glad to say that, whenever this is discussed, in the end the Council unanimously confirms its commitment to enforce the ban on state aids. In the end, it is up to the Commission to ensure that everybody in practice is following that. If there is any solid evidence to support what the hon. Gentleman says, which I do not find too surprising, I would be happy to look at it because we are keen that the ban on state aids is enforced.

Mr. Morley: As the Minister will be aware, such evidence is hard to come by, but does he not agree that it is better to have an orderly return to a free market rather than a sudden end to quotas with dangers of the type to which I have just referred?

Mr. Clarke: These things are alleged to be going on within the quota regime. There are some horribly loss-making businesses in western Europe at the moment, as the hon. Gentleman will know. At the moment it is quite important that the ban on state aids is properly policed and enforced. Of course, we are in favour of an orderly return to the end of quotas. Those were the words used by my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw). I am quite happy to agree to that. Occasionally, that word is used by people who really mean a slow return to a free market and who rather resist the end of quotas. If we do not get this restructuring, 1 July is a perfectly suitable date to bring the quota regime firmly to an end.

Let me briefly touch on the other documents, to which I hope I shall do justice without taking up too much time. One concerns the regional fund. As an integral part of the effort to remove the Community's over-capacity, the Commission has also proposed to introduce a regional programme under the European regional development fund, which will provide assistance for steel closure areas.

That programme rejoices in the name of RESIDER. The Commission also proposed to set up a scheme of special social measures, predominantly funded from the European Coal and Steel Community budget, directed at aid to early retirement and re-employment. In order to cover a funding shortfall for these social measures, the Commission proposed to transfer a sum to the ECSC budget from the general budget of the European Communities.

The RESIDER programme was agreed in principle on 22 December, and adopted on 2 February. I welcome its adoption. The programme provides for some 300 mecu —about £208 million—in the European Community for various measures for small firms, similar to the existing business improvement services produced by the Community in the past, and for infrastructural development. We expect it to support my Department's enterprise initiative. I am anxious to see that as many areas of the United Kingdom as possible will qualify, but it is still too early to judge which those areas will be.

However, the Council did not agree to the proposed transfer from the European Community general budget to fund special social measures. The Council urged instead that the Commission should fund any shortfall in resources for 1988 from the ECSC reserves. On behalf of the United Kingdom, I opposed the budget transfer in view of the tightness of the EC budget, and because I remain to be convinced that the sums required could not be found from the ECSC reserves which I consider to be more than ample for any ordinary purpose, and for this one. I shall continue to oppose any such proposal from the Commission for a budget transfer.

A document has been recommended for debate on state aid. As I mentioned earlier, the continuing strict enforcement of the ban remains an important and integral part of the regime. Document 8993/86 contains a report from the Commission on the application of the rules on aids to the steel industry as required under the previous aids code. The report covers 1984 and 1985, the final years of the old code. The current aids regime imposes a general ban on subsidy to steel.

A document has also been selected—EM 19 October 1987—on the position of Spain and Portugal, which are soon to be integrated fully into the internal ECSC steel regime following the end of their transitional arrangements. In the case of Spain, the arrangements expire at the end of this year; those for Portugal expire at the end of 1990. The memorandum of 19 October 1987 concerns one aspect of the transitional arrangements for Spain and Portugal—the establishment of the permitted levels of deliveries of Spanish and Portuguese steel products to the rest of the Community market.

Restriction of deliveries is permitted during the transitional period, while the Spanish and Portuguese steel industries are restructured and subsidy of their industries is permitted. The Commission proposed in July 1987 to raise the respective delivery limits for 1987. The accession treaty provides for such an increase if the Commission is satisfied with the progress of Spanish and Portuguese restructuring plans. The proposal to raise the limit for Portuguese deliveries was quite acceptable, as their level is negligible and we believe that the industry is genuinely making efforts to restructure.

The increase in Spanish delivery levels, however, caused the United Kingdom and other member states some concern, as we were not satisfied that Spanish restructuring was proceeding as it should. In spite of our repeated requests, insufficient information has been provided concerning progress with restructuring plans, or showing that Spanish firms will have achieved viability by the end of the transitional period as required by the accession treaty. The Government were not prepared to agree the increase, but our position was unfortunately not shared by enough member states to prevent a majority. The increase in delivery levels was accordingly agreed by the Council of Ministers in November 1987.

The final documents—I apologise for the number of documents, but they have all been selected by the Committee for debate — concern the European Community's trade in steel products with the United States. United Kingdom exports of steel to the United States, like those from the rest of the Community, have been subject to some form of quota restriction since 1982. At that time, the EC-US steel arrangement was limited to 10 categories of steel. It has been subsequently extended and now covers 36 categories, semi-manufactured steel products being the most recent addition in September 1986 —and also, incidentally, the most difficult to agree.

In early 1986, the United States imposed unilateral restrictions on Community exports of semi-finished steel products. The Community, in accordance with our rights under GATT, responded by introducing retaliatory measures against imports from the United States. Trade disputes are always extremely unfortunate, and we in the United Kingdom took the view throughout that, in the event of the Community and the United States concluding an agreement on European Community exports of semi-finished steel products, it would no longer be sensible for the Community to maintain its retaliatory measures.

Such an agreement was reached later that year. Under it, I am glad to say, both the Community and the United States agreed to repeal their unilateral measures. The agreement has enabled the United Kingdom to send more semi-manufactured steel products to the United States than was possible under the unilaterally imposed United States quotas. There was in effect a 50 per cent. increase in Community quota for 1986 and annual increases until the end of the arrangement. The Government considered it sensible to enter into that arrangement. The extension to the EC-US steel agreement came into effect on 15 September 1986.

The arrangement is one of several that the American Government have entered into with other steel-producing countries. At the moment, all are due to expire at the end of September 1989. As the House will be aware, political events due to take place in America between now and September 1989 might affect the outlook. Taken together, I believe these measures represent good progress towards our objective of a more open world market for steel. We have taken the necessary steps to safeguard continuing access to the American market for producers of semi-manufactured steel products. Liberalisation of the internal European market is well under way, and might, with good luck, be completed by July. We continue to press for the removal of excess capacity and the enforcement of the rules against state aids.

I commend the motion and ask the House to give its general approval to the stance that the Government have taken.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): As the Minister's triumphant and deeply moving peroration, which I thought he read beautifully, will have suggested, we are dealing tonight with a kind of Euro-dustbin of accumulated measures which, frankly, should have been dealt with months before. Indeed, my first question is: why are measures relating to decisions, many of which were taken in December, only just being debated now? Why were we not able to debate them at the crucial time?

I do not want to go on about the detail of the measures; I want to come straight to the nub of the matter—the production quotas on steel—because they suggest that the Community is stymied on this issue. It cannot achieve production cuts and cannot agree to remove the quotas. In that situation, it got the three wise men to travel and deliberate. They reported in November-December that there was nothing in the manger—no infant cuts did the wise men discover which might grow to capacity, eventually matching demand. Indeed, they were between £20 million and £30 million short of the cuts that they wanted.

In that situation, the Minister is right to say that the United Kingdom has taken its share of cuts. Indeed, we are not opposed to him. We support him in saying that. However, we want to be assured that in saying that, he will stick to it and that we shall not have another performance such as we had when the Prime Minister went to Europe, saying one thing loudly and bravely, but coming back, waving a piece of paper saying, "No food mountains for our time." We want to be assured that the Minister will not be rolled over, as has happened in the past.

The cuts in the output of steel in this country since 1975 have been massive and far bigger than those of any other member of the Community. Production is now three quarters of its 1975 level, whereas those of other countries are at 80 per cent. or 90 per cent. and, in the case of Italy, at over 100 per cent. of the 1975 production levels. Like Herbert Smith, of the miners in the 1920s, who, when asked what wage cuts the miners had to offer said, "Nowt; miners have nowt to give", the Minister must say "Nowt" to Europe and say it firmly and absolutely. He must say it without hints, with no lawyers' talk about the fulness of time, and no nods or winks about commercial considerations——

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I seem to recall that historically Herbert Smith of the National Union of Mineworkers used to take his false teeth out first before saying "Nowt". Is my hon. Friend suggesting that as another tactic for the right hon. and learned Gentleman?

Mr. Mitchell: Yorkshire men know that Herbert Smith also used to wipe the sweat of his brow with the slack of his belly, but we shall not go into that tonight.

I hope that the Minister can assure us that there will be no nods or winks about the fulness of time and commercial considerations regarding Ravenscraig. Ravenscraig is central to Scottish manufacturing, steel and industry and Scottish national feeling. In Europe the Minister must hold exactly the same line as he has taken here. There must be no European double-talk that allies the possibility of capacity closures with the closure of Ravenscraig.

The steel industry is at a turning point. We are now getting the necessary return on public ownership. The massive investment and restructuring that took place in the 1970s to form five integrated plants and the loss of jobs and the sacrifices of the 1980s are now reaping success. We now have a lean, productive, competitive industry up to and beyond the best in European standards. What do we do in this situation?

The Government's response has been irresponsible and trivial—to seize the moment with gibbering gratitude for a quick return by means of the privatisation programme. The money will go into the Government's back pocket. That is despite the assurances of the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) during the election campaign that the steel industry was not an early candidate for privatisation and despite the statements of the chairman, Sir Robert Scholey, that the industry wanted to show a record profit before privatisation. The Government have rushed in to grab the moment for privatisation.

The Government have overridden all the assurances that they had given and they have overridden Sir Robert. They have made their traditional approach of the huckster and demonstrated asinine irresponsibility. They will hand the BSC to the speculators because they need the money and there is a hitch in the privatisation programme.

Given the situation, the response of any Government with the national interest at heart would be to use the new power, competitiveness and industrial strength of the BSC to expand production, compete and win back the ground that was lost over the years and to clobber the European competition. A response dictated by national interest would have been to go for quantity even at the expense of profit—to go for output—to rebuild the strength that has been lost.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Given that the hon. Gentleman is now getting carried away with his arguments about privatisation, is he seriously arguing that our approach should be to go for quantity of steel production regardless of profit? The point of the debate is that we are facing the fact that a number of European companies and Governments have taken such an approach for too long. When the hon. Gentleman comes back to earth and stops being carried away with his own rhetoric, surely he will agree that we must get rid of surplus capacity. Our problem is the need for restructuring. We are trying to close down the kind of plants kept open by people in the Mezzogiorno, who go round spouting the rubbish which the hon. Gentleman is now giving to the House.

Mr. Mitchell: I did not intend to give the Minister the chance to amplify his brief, he has already had long enough to read it. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman is more acquainted with silk than steel he should know that we have taken a much bigger cut in production than any of our European competitors. That is why the ground lost must be made up. The Government's motives are suspect. If their motive is to privatise, they want the maximum return on profit rather than the increase in output that is required by the national interest. Those two things are different. Because of the Government's obsession with privatisation, they are rushing through the privatisation of steel, and that is suspect.

If the Government are to rush blindly into privatisation——

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mitchell: I shall give way, but not at this moment.

We must face the fact that the Government intend to privatise the BSC. However, when the European quotas go —we want them to go—it will be a much tougher, competitive business. It is estimated that there are 200 million tonnes of over-capacity in the world, and 30 million tonnes in Europe. The Minister has mentioned Spain. He must be aware that, given that other European countries are building up their steel industries, the BSC is faced with two major disadvantages.

Governments in other European countries have shown that the steel industry is more important to them and their national interest than our Government believe it to be. They have shown that by taking smaller cuts, because they realise the impact of those cuts on the industrial economy, and by declining to take more. That is why the three wise men got such a short response. No volunteers were forthcoming. That shows that they will make every effort to support their steelmaking capacity.

The Minister has assured us that aid will be invigilated. How closely and intensively will he invigilate the invigilators? How can we be sure that no indirect state aid will be given behind the door? I have a copy of the 1985 report by the National Economic Development Office on indirect state aid in the EEC and its impact on the EEC steel industry. It is an impressive piece of research. I shall read some extracts from the document, as it is the fashion of the Government to turn to the executive summary rather than to the full deployment of the arguments. The report states that the term "indirect aid"

> "includes improvements in general infrastructure where industry does not subsequently meet the full costs (eg new ports), the region of social services which industry would otherwise be required to pay (eg certain severance payments), reductions in the costs of local services etc.".

The report distinguishes two areas where European Governments have been strong in support of their steel industries. In respect of transport, the report states:

> "All of the four countries subsidise their railways. The level of subsidy varies, being highest in Italy. France and Germany subsidise inland waterways to certain extent and some aid is available in the UK; all subsidise ports (with the exception of the UK). Road transport aid is harder to define".

The report also deals with labour cost reductions. It states that there are schemes for employees threatened with redundancy available in Germany and France. The report gives the figures for the total estimated indirect aid to the steel industry in Europe. In France, labour-related schemes receive £36·7 million and £94 million of transport aid is provided. At the other end of the scale, in the United Kingdom, labour-related schemes receive £12·4 million and a measly £2 million of transport aid is provided. In other words, a massive total of indirect aid is going to the industry in France, Germany and Italy, which is not going to British industry.

France provides a total of £2·25 to £7·22 of indirect aid per tonne of steel produced. The United Kingdom provides £0·78 to £1·66 of indirect aid per tonne of steel produced. Italy provides £2·88 to £6·18 of indirect aid per tonne of steel produced. Other countries provide a considerably higher proportion of indirect aid per tonne of steel produced than Britain does. The British industry is therefore asked to run in a competitive race with a ball and chain around its leg. The Government, who believe in the free market, also believe in slanting that free market in favour of finance and against manufacturing industry. They put up the value of the pound. In real terms, the pound has gone up by 13 per cent. since the last quarter of 1986, which removes the competitive advantage that British Steel has gained in the fall since 1986.

The Government have increased interest rates, which are a burden on the industry, and they are about to increase electricity charges, which are an even more considerable burden on the industry. The Government expect the industry to run with a ball and chain around both legs.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The hon. Gentleman talks as if it were a virtue to maintain unproductive steel capacity. How can the hon. Gentleman expect the Government to go on pouring money down the drain or proceeding with this massive distortion of resource allocation which he now appears to be advocating?

Mr. Mitchell: I should never give way to the hon. Gentleman. He looks more intelligent than he is. We are competing against those who support the industry indirectly in a way that we are not. That is not equal and fair competition. The Government say that they believe in the free market, yet they are slanting that market against the domestic manufacturing industry to which that industry is central.

As for the increase in electricity charges, I quote from a letter sent to my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) by the chief executive of United Engineering Steels:

"the proposed increase of 15 per cent. will put up our company's cost by at least £7 million . . . the 15 per cent. increase is equivalent to reducing our sales margin by 25 per cent."

If that is the cost for one steel producer, what will it be for the entire British steel industry? That is yet another burden that the industry is being asked to carry because of the Government's doctrinaire obsession with fattening electricity for privatisation for more money than they will get from the privatisation of British Steel. If the CBI has managed to get up from its knees and say that this is monstrous, it really must be.

The papers before us tonight are not the real issue. That is, what will happen to the industry in the 1990s, amid intensified competition? It is all very well for the Minister to smile blandly, because he is irresponsibly going for a quick profit while the window is open for privatising the industry—he will grab the cash while it is there. If that is the Government's record while steel has still been a public corporation, when they have been able to draw off money from steel through the external financing limits and to skimp on necessary investment—there has been no major authorisation for two years—how much worse will steel fare when it is flogged off and the Government have washed their hands of it, having given their limp, wet handshake to British Steel and told it to get out into the world?

If the Government weight the odds against British Steel in this way, we shall be launching it into an extremely difficult position, in a highly competitive European market, against competitors that are more effectively supported by their Governments than our Government have ever shown themselves willing to do. Unless the Government commit themselves to doing better by manufacturing industry, by supporting it and running the economy for growth, jobs, expansion, investment and steel, they will launch British Steel on a sea of troubles and wash their hands of the consequences of their own irresponsibility.

11.3 pm

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): When I read the motion on the Order Paper, I was worried by its tone, but having heard the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister, I was reassured that at last we had a Government who would go to Brussels and tell the people of the Common Market that time has run out and they must get themselves organised. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said that the Government—I quote his excellent rhetoric as accurately as I can—had extended to British Steel a limp, wet handshake. That is to ignore the billions of pounds that this Government, and the last Labour Government, have given British Steel to put it in the competitive position in which it finds itself today.

The standards of performance in the integrated strip mills in Ravenscraig, Llanwern and Port Talbot are as good as anything to be found in West Germany or Japan, in price, quality and delivery. We should be proud of those plants for what they have done. It is fascinating that, should any hon. Member want to go to any of those steelworks, he will amost certainly be taken around, as Opposition Members know, not by the management but by the trade union leaders. That is a measure of the confidence and integration of managers and workers in those companies, and of their belief in the future of the enterprises.

It is welcome news that, as my right hon. and learned Friend said, 1 July will mark the end of quotas. The ending of quotas is long overdue. British Steel and the Government have prepared our steel industry for the competitive nature that it will have to exhibit to stand up to its competitors in the Common Market and the rest of the world. We must stand for no more nonsense from the other members of the Common Market, which have had years in which to put their businesses in order. They have had plenty of time to get their work done, and we have set an example which they are long overdue to follow. When we look at the chances of success of British Steel, the sooner the quotas are lifted and the British companies can exhibit their qualities in the world market, the greater will be the profitability and employment in the steel industry.

I agree with the hon. Member for Grimsby also on indirect aid, which is totally unfair. It had been concealed effectively until recent investigations brought out that foreign Governments are prepared to go to Brussels, put their hands on their hearts and say that they will restructure industries, while shovelling money into the support of those industries, against what they plead are the grave and real intentions of the Common Market.

I agree with the hon. Member for Grimsby on one final item—electricity prices. It is gravely worrying that there should be an increase in the cost of the prime commodity which defines the nature of the production of steel—energy. We must not, if we can possibly avoid it, load that great organisation which has been built up with a burden which is not of its own making, which other Common Market countries are not burdening their companies with, and which will hinder the competitive capability of British Steel.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Warren: If I may conclude, I will be delighted to hear my hon. Friend's contribution later.

It would be wrong not to give credit to a former Member, who is now in another place, Lord Joseph. At a very difficult time in the steel industry he stepped out of the line of policy which one might have expected from him. He went straight into the heart of the Treasury and produced the resolute determination from the Government to get the British Steel Corporation on to a footing which it could get on to only by putting yet more taxpayers' money into it to make it the success it now is. British Steel, when it is privatised, will aptly repay the taxpayers for what has happened.

I view with some scepticism the Americans' attitude to access to their market. In another context I have dealings with American exporters around the world. They seem often to slip past Cocom, just ahead of us, but it is not always easy to get into their markets with traditional products. I hope they will realise that GATT is there for the protection of the whole world. They have perhaps been caught napping on that and may learn from it.

A statement was made in London today by the Japanese ambassador who, recognising the fortitude and capability of the management and workers of British Steel, said of British business that if an Olympic games were held today, our managers and men would be winning the gold medals; and that goes for British Steel.

11.9 pm

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I am speaking on behalf of my party as the Welsh affairs spokesman and as a member of a family who for three generations have worked in the steel industry in south Wales. For the past seven years we have lived with the European quota system; now we see a real sign of it ending. We welcome that, but we wonder whether Europe has the will power to bring that about. We are pleased to hear that the Minister hopes to phase out quotas by 1 July, but we wonder whether that will become a reality. Removal of the quotas would allow United Kingdom production to expand competitively; there is no doubt about that.

Our hot strip mills are running well below capacity, at around 70 per cent., which means that the fixed costs of the industry are not favourable in relation to output. As the Minister said, our production is the lowest of any EEC country. As hon. Members have said, our current competitiveness has been obtained only at great loss—the loss of 100,000 jobs in the British steel industry. Many of those jobs were in Wales. Before the cuts in the British steel industry, our work force represented 24 per cent. of the steel industry work force in the Community. Now it represents only 14 per cent. That has caused real hardship and has wiped out completely such plants as East Moors, at Ebbw Vale, and Shotton and Corby. There is a massive list of plants that have suffered in England, Scotland and Wales. That is because we have played the game.

There must be no further cuts whatever in the British steel industry. Our capacity is now about 13 million tonnes, which is low in comparison with the possible output of the industry. We are opposed to any further cuts in British Steel, particularly at Ravenscraig, where it is vital that the plant should be kept going. The production in Llanwern and Port Talbot has been outstanding. The investment in those plants has paid off because of the dedication of the work force, and has produced profitable steel at a high output. They are the profit powerhouse of British Steel, and the work force has responded magnificently to that investment.

If we agree to quotas in future, the future of Ravenscraig will be in severe doubt. If quotas remain, 3,000 jobs will be on the line, and 2,000 more jobs in support industries. However, if we are allowed more of a free market, Ravenscraig may eventually get increased investment, but that depends entirely upon what happens with the privatisation of the steel industry. If the Government privatise the industry, there is a need for more market opportunities. Clearly, the market must be freed.

Quotas are not the only factor. An analysis in the Financial Times of 13 November put the crux of the problem rather well:

> "The British Government has promised not to reconsider the future of Ravenscraig" for the time being. It continues:

> "West Germany is refusing to give up any of six hot strip mills on the ground that they are among the EC's most efficient, a position further complicated by the age-old rivalry between Germany's two biggest producers, Thyssen and Kloeckner. On top of that, the Italian and French Governments could suffer political crises if there were major plant closures at Italsider and Usinor-Sacilor."

Therefore, immense political problems are bound up in the business of quotas.

It is no accident that many of the steel plants in Europe are sited in areas of high unemployment. In the past, investment has been deliberately made to overcome some of those problems. It will take great political will on the part of those European Governments to grasp the nettle. I am not convinced that the Minister can push them hard enough and that he can provide cast-iron guarantees that the quotas will be phased out. Therein lies the rub.

The fluctuations in the pound also need to be considered, as they can affect the level of competitiveness. Indeed, I request the Minister to urge the Government to join the European monetary system as soon as possible. That would provide greater stabilisation of prices in Europe, and those prices would not be distorted.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and others spoke about state aid. There is no doubt that it is almost impossible to police state aid. It is one of the most difficult subjects that the Minister has to tackle. It is difficult to identify hidden state aid. Some of the plants that are under threat in Italy are in the south of the country. That area is very poor, and very difficult political decisions will have to be made.

There must be cast-iron assurances about the policing of state aid and the phasing out of quotas so that the British steel industry will be able to benefit from its new-found competitiveness.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): My worries about this proposal are reinforced by the speech of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey). There is a great similarity between what we are doing tonight and what the Prime Minister announced last week. She announced that we are to give an enormous amount of additional money to the Common Market because we have received assurances that things are going to get better and that agricultural spending will be curbed. When we pointed out that we had received exactly the same assurances in 1984, we were told that we were spoiling everything and that instead we should talk about all the exciting new developments that will arise because of stabilisers, restraints and goodness knows what.

Every hon. Member knows that the agreement to pour more money into the Common Market will lead to exactly what happened last time. Even if the so-called curbs were to work, the Commission could get round them quite easily by means of accountancy devices. Everybody I speak to in private conversations knows that it is a sick joke and that all we have done it to pour more money into the Common Market to finance what is already being done.

In 1985 we were given solemn, binding pledges, recorded in Hansard, that there would be an extension of quotas for a maximum of three years. We were told that three years might not be needed, but that three years would provide more than enough time to sort out the European steel industry. Tonight we are being asked to extend the quotas in the hope of obtaining assurances. But the cuts are not agreed. We are told only that the Government hope that they will soon be agreed and that quotas will come to an end.

The Minister referred to an extension of six months, but he did not have time to explain that it will not be just for six months. For plate and heavy sections there will be an extension to the end of 1990. According to my calculations, subject to metric measurement, that is not exactly six months.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My hon. Friend is referring to the proposal. We have agreed to a six-month extension, after which the quotas will come to an end, unless there is a commitment to restructure the industry.

Mr. Taylor: I am referring to the paper that was presented to us today by the Under-Secretary of State for Industry. If the restructuring pledges are not made and if the Commission then proposes another six months or a year, is there anything that the Government can do about it if a majority of the member states say that there should be yet another extension? Despite the solemn pledges of 1985, I fear that we have agreed to another extension, in the hope that something will turn up.

The British steel industry is at least as competitive as those of other European states, but what about the rest of the world? In its relations with the rest of the world, Europe is becoming more and more protectionist with every day that passes. We talk about competitiveness and free trade, but we impose the most horrendous restrictions on trade with the Third world and other areas where the costs of production are very low. I fear that we are making the Common Market into an organisation that will try to live by taking in other people's washing.

As to costs, Europe is becoming a high-cost economy, covered with protection in almost every area. Europe is awash with unemployment. The Minister from his previous position may be able to confirm whether I am right in saying that the current level of unemployment in the European Community is higher than in any other country or group of countries in the world with the exception of Tibet and El Salvador, where there are special considerations.

I fear that on agriculture and steel we are just getting pledge after pledge. We are congratulating ourselves in the hope that something will happen in the future, but all we do is pour in more money, become more uncompetitive with the rest of the world and thereby dig our graves on competitiveness.

I have two brief questions which I think deserve answers. We have been told that this is just for another six months and that if we do not get pledges of some kind in six months, quotas will stop. What happens if we get pledges? What happens if they say, as the farmers have said, "We will try to cut back." I am sure the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor will appreciate that it is difficult for farmers to give such assurances. The assurances they have given are like those one would get from a 12-year-old child if one said, "I promise to increase your pocket money if you guarantee that you will not grow by more than an inch a year." Most children would sign such a pledge quickly and mean to keep it, but it is very difficult for children to promise not to grow.

That is what has happened on the CAP. The farmers mean well, and the countries mean to do it, but they cannot, because of the pressures. What happens if we get assurances? What happens if the countries agree to cut their steel industries? Does that mean that quotas continue, or does it mean that they stop?

Secondly, if the countries do not agree, and give no commitment, what happens then? The Minister has been studying this for a long time and I am in no sense an expert. But my understanding is that, because this is under article 85, the Commission simply puts forward a proposal for an extension: the majority of member states agree, and quotas go ahead as before.

Finally, does the Minister not think that there is merit in the suggestion that, while we may be becoming more competitive within the EEC, we are becoming, in the rest of the world, more and more protectionist and high-cost, and therefore more and more awash with unemployment? Britain stands out like a beacon because of the Government's policies. Our unemployment is down, while Europe's unemployment, sadly, is the worst it has ever been. Therefore, we must ask ourselves if it is a good thing to have a reunion.

After the solemn pledges that it would be an absolute three-year maximum, with no question of it being continued, is there not a danger that the Minister will come back in another six months with the assurance that the countries are going to try to cut back, like the child and the pocket money pledge, or with a statement that he is afraid that we shall have to have another six months of quotas because the majority voted against doing anything?

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): The Chancellor of the Duchy has been handling the negotiations with considerable skill and determination in the short time that he has been Minister. I am sure he is aware that the problems which he has been dealing with in the steel industry go back many decades. He should not get too frightened about the talk of a necessity to work at 90 per cent. capacity. Other industries which are less capital-intensive have managed to survive with 70 to 90 per cent. capacity without the trauma that there is in the steel industry.

The problem comes from the incontinent behaviour on pricing. Selling steel is fairly complicated. Late delivery and such things make it difficult to identify a clear market price. Thought should be given to less incontinent behaviour that would ease the transition to a fully competitive regime. It should be possible to see beyond the preoccupation with excess capacity to the next stage, that of inadequate capacity. It takes about 50 years for the steel industry to work through that well-established cycle.

If one is reasonably optimistic about the course of development in world trade, with reference to the latest report by MEPS Europe that was used in the Arthur Young study, that points to the coming danger of inadequate capacity.

The problems that will arise if we reach a better balance in production concern the cyclical behaviour in the steel market, with stockists screwing the thing up totally and there being mystery about what is happening. Demand for steel will decline because orders are banged in quickly to get delivery in time. That trend tends not to affect final levels of demand, but it produces many headaches for producers who get into difficulties concerning allocation and plant scheduling.

Without wishing to add to the Minister's problems, I expect that this transition will be easier if the European Community begins to look outside at what is happening in the rest of the world. In industrial terms, the biggest tragedy of the modern world is its failure to use the immense industrial capacity of Japan. The loss of human capacity, in the rundown of Japanese industry, including steel, is a great loss to mankind.

The imbalance that that represents is the inability of the developing world to buy steel, to invest adequately and to build up infrastructures to meet its huge needs. There needs to be a shift of balance between the great funds that Japan has to invest overseas, the inadequate servicing of debt to American banks and the wish of the developing world to invest in infrastructure. That position could begin to change if the steel community was less obsessive about its capacity problems and more understanding about the directions of development of world trade.

I am not offering an easy or short-term solution. If the Minister is dealing with problems of inadequate supplies of steel a year from now — and that is possible in Europe — he will need to look much more widely for opportunities and sources, and study the nature of world trade then, and the problems at that time.

Dealing with the specific question of hot rolled coil, the problem is not in relation to capacity of hot mills, but the long pipeline of supply. Llanwern does not have sufficient continuous casting capacity and is not able fully to load up its hot mills. There are blockages in supply, and although there are manned capacity problems, they cannot be corrected overnight in the steel industry. There are very difficult problems to face in a planned market; there are considerable advantages in a much freer market, for which we are heading. But moderation of behaviour is needed from the steel industry in its commercial practices, which will be quite a test for it in the next few months.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I have just one question to put to the Minister. Did I hear him say that, on one aspect of the European Coal and Steel Community's job creation provision for helping to staunch job losses in steel closure areas, he hopes to be able to get most of the money for the United Kingdom for the enterprise initiative that he announced a month ago?

If that is correct, is he not saying that this is a reference to article 15 of the new regional development fund programme that was announced some two years ago? Will he confirm that since then his Department and the Treasury have been having a running battle with the fund as to whether the article 15 money is to be spent by local enterprise agencies, which is the view of the European Community, or, as is the view of the Treasury — naturally enough, given its interest in clawing back all the EEC money for central Government plans — is to be used as a way of saving the Government the money it wants to spend on regional development in this country?

Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not agree that it was rather naughty of him to claim one month ago that the enterprise initiative was a great new initiative that was going to create jobs in the regions? What he meant, if I understood him correctly tonight, was that the EEC would be paying for it, and, if he was not able to persuade the Community that that was a proper use of article 15, local enterprise agencies that could do the job very much better would be able to get their money from the EEC in the way the European Coal and Steel Community intends.

11.32 pm

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The last point was rather ingenious, bringing in the whole argument about additionality and wider issues on the European regional fund, rapidly switching to article 15 and the fund generally.

Some of the difficulties that we have encountered in making local propositions for funding to the European Commission have recently been resolved. To answer his point, I will let the hon. Gentleman have a note of where we are in trying to sort out the relationship between local government applications and the Government's view of European funding.

What I have described is the early days of the RESIDER programme. I do not think that we have yet addressed the issues that he is describing. It is certainly true that one of the principal beneficiaries of the funds from the RESIDER programme will be the enterprise initiative, but there will be more to it than that.

I will deal briefly with the points that have been raised in a debate which at one point was arousing rather more passion than I had expected.

The hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said that there had been some delay in arranging this debate, and that is certainly true. That is a matter that has to be discussed through the usual channels to try to ensure that we get on to these European debates in reasonable time in future.

From what I have heard, I do not think that the Government have taken any decisions in this field with which any hon. Members who have spoken disagree, so Parliament's interest has not been prejudiced in any way. It is also the case that large numbers of documents are referred for debate. I took up some time earlier giving the necessary detailed explanations of the documents on the agreements between the United Kingdom and the United States and the arrangements with Portugal and Spain. It was not surprising that these did not command wide interest in the debate that followed.

Not surprisingly, the debate concentrated on the key point of the future of production quotas and the effect this will have on the privatised British Steel Corporation when we get back to a free market. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) was very scathing about our prospect of ending quotas as we are going at the moment. We have now ended quotas altogether on long products. They came to an end at the end of last year. We are dealing now with flat products and heavy sections, and quotas on those two products will not continue beyond the end of June of this year unless credible assurances are forthcoming on getting the excess capacity out.

My hon. Friend asked again about the constitutional position. I am simplifying it, but I hope accurately. If the Commission puts forward a proposition, majority voting determines the outcome on the proposition by a system of weighted voting that is applicable to the Council. But if the Council of Minsters wants to put forward a proposition despite the Commission's opinion, unanimity is required for the Council to impose its own solution. No unanimity will be possible on anything that extends quotas, despite a lack of assurances, because the British and Dutch—I can speak confidently about the British—will not agree to any such Council proposal going forward.

It is possible that people will put pressure on the Commission to put forward a proposal, but the Commission so far has been resolute on this matter. Commissioner Narjes has been clear in his opinion, and I would regard it as an extraordinary reversal of every previous assurance on its part if it went back on them. It is not altogether true that it has gone back on matters in the past.

Mr. Teddy Taylor rose——

Mr. Clarke: I shall not tonight be drawn into the wider issue of the EC.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East waxed lyrical about what he described as solemn pledges given in 1985 and made it sound as though they had been given at least on cub's honour, if not stronger. In fact, the then Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry—before being interrupted by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East—said in the debate in 1986:

"The Commission also proposed the progressive liberalisation of the system to reflect the improvements now being seen in the market and designed to pave the way towards the return to a free market in 1988 or 1989".—[Official Report, 12 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 1032.]

That does not strike me as the most binding guarantee of the kind that my hon. Friend now says has been violated, and we have not yet reached 1989. Perhaps quotas will have come to an end by then.

I think I interpret correctly the remarks of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby when I say that, in the end, we have all been talking about the ending of quotas—that it is an agreed objective that we should, at a sensible pace, end quotas. As the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) said in one of the more understated points of the debate, it is essentially a political problem and a matter of political will in other countries.

As for where the unprofitable capacity is and where we are looking for the closure of steel plants, we are looking at some of the older industrial parts of western Europe; we are looking to the Mezzogiorno, to parts of the Saarland, to places near the border with East Germany and to parts of Belgium and Luxembourg which are heavily dependent on older industries.

That explains the difficulties which other Ministers encounter. I made some less than complimentary remarks about the behaviour of some of them at meetings. One is asking colleagues from other European ministries to do the equivalent in their parliaments of announcing the end of Ravenscraig. I suspect that I would find myself in some difficulty if I were to do that here.

Economic arguments and logic point to their doing that because we have surmounted some extremely similar hurdles in our time, leading to the closure of much of our unprofitable and surplus capacity. They must do the same if anybody is to have a secure future. We have that behind us and we are now into a more profitable stage. We are therefore able to say that we will not offer anything towards the restructurings proposed. We do not mind if the quotas go, anyway, so we have no motive to offer any further restructuring. We made our position clear on Ravenscraig in the last debate. We are in that position because we have a profitable British steel industry ready now to take advantage of the more open market.

Where I got nearest to misunderstanding the hon. Member for Great Grimsby was when he gave a long description of our level of output and the level of state aids that other countries give. I agreed with the analysis in the report to which he referred. I suspect it is true that indirect state aids are much higher in some other western European countries than they are in this country. That underlines how well the British Steel Corporation is performing; it is profitable compared with them.

The hon. Gentleman made it sound as though he was expounding a case for raising our output regardless of profit. Indeed, he said so at one point. He spoke as though he envied those great state aids and thought we should pour more of them into British industry. He will appreciate on reflection that that is exactly the conduct that all three parties in the House have been deprecating on the part of other member states and companies. It is the behaviour we propose to bring to an end, and it would be a disaster if Labour Members got drawn back into advocating it. They used to follow it, but I trust it is no longer their line.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: That has been the case ever since the present Secretary of State for Wales was Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. My point concerned raising output, if necessary at the expense of profit, but not going for profit as the Government are.

Mr. Clarke: I repeat that at the moment we are suffering from no particular lack of capacity. It was quite the reverse over Europe and the world as a whole. Some Members took a somewhat wider view. In the earlier debate, the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) acknowledged the wisdom of some of the strategies being considered by British Steel, which is going more for the finishing and added value end of the process rather than simply increasing the quantity of steel being produced in this country.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) dealt with our surplus capacity in hot strip—yet again. I made it clear that at the moment the mills are working to full manned capacity, but that that is only about 70 per cent. of the potential capacity. That remains one of the lowest uses of capacity in western Europe and reflects a particularly high level of demand throughout western Europe at the moment but one that the Commission does not think is likely to be sustained. We should all be delighted if the market recovered to the extent that we could sustain 90 per cent. capacity. That is not impossible. There are other industries that do.

The hon. Gentleman said that the mills were threatened by incontinent pricing. The cut-throat commercial practices that occur in the steel business and attempts to go in for very aggressive pricing when the opportunity arises reflect the excess capacity in western Europe, which we need to tackle and which lies at the root of the debate.

As we return to a more liberalised regime in the EEC and between Britain and the United States, and as the world's industry is sorted out, those in the steel industry will be able to address themselves to potential markets in Japan and so on. I particularly look forward to the management of the privatised British Steel Corporation addressing itself to the issues. As we emerge from the closed, cartelised and protected world imposed as a necessity on a steel industry in chaos, the British steel industry is emerging as the industry that has gone through the most effective restructuring and undergone the most dramatic changes in its production and marketing. It is now profitable and has low production costs and can look forward with great confidence to the future. The general view of the House is that we should ensure in our European negotiations that we get rid of the remaining impediments to BSC's competitive position in the European market and enable it to take full advantage of all that it has won so far, thanks to the achievements of its management and work force.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 8560/87, the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Department of Trade and Industry on 1st December 1987 and 4127-88 on steel policy, 8803/86 and the proposals described in unnumbered Explanatory Memoranda submitted by the Department of Trade and Industry on 7th July 1986 and 15th July 1986 on trade with the United States of America in certain steel products 8993/86 and COR 1 on aids to the steel industry (1984-85), and the proposals described in the unnumbered Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Department of Trade and Industry on 19th October 1987 on delivery levels of certain steel products of Spanish and Portuguese origin onto the rest of the Community market; supports the Government's commitment to a Community steel regime which provides a framework for a steady return to free market conditions; and endorses the Government's agreement of measures which place a temporary limit on steel exports to the United States of America, thus safeguarding access to the American market.

Maternity Allowance

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

11.42 pm

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Imagine the excitement in a household when a woman discovers that there is to be an addition to her family—a first child. She looks forward eagerly to the day when the baby will be born and to the benefits that will go with it. Then she finds that her application for maternity benefit is denied because of two things in juxtaposition: she has changed her job, and her present job is paid monthly rather than weekly. As a consequence, she is disbarred from receiving maternity allowance. Doubtless she will say, "That's a bit rough. I've been working for 10 years and paying my contributions. I deserve it." But she is not thinking like the bureaucrat with the bureaucratic mind, who, like Shylock, reads only about the pound of flesh and not about the blood.

My constituent, whose baby is now 14 months old, wrote to me to say that she has been disbarred from receiving maternity allowance because she does not satisfy the requirements. It appears that the requirements are twofold. First, the person must satisfy the strategic conditions appropriate to the nature of the benefit—retirement, incapacity, unemployment and so on. Disputes on that are determined by an independent adjudicating authority. It is a bit difficult to dispute the fact that someone is pregnant. It is reasonably easy to agree on whether a person is pregnant.

The second criterion is laid down in section 93(1) of the Social Security Act 1975. I cannot for the life of me believe that, whichever party was in power—it happened to be the Labour party—it was the intention of the legislators that a person could be disbarred from an allowance simply because he or she was paid monthly, not weekly.

To be eligible for the maternity allowances, a woman must have paid 50 benefit credits in the year preceding the delivery of the child. But if it so happens that one works for 49 weeks before 1 April, and the fiscal year begins on 6 April, that crucial week between 1 and 6 April becomes the 50th week of one's qualifying period. If, because one becomes a monthly paid employee, one's employer determines that one's credits are not paid over to the state until 30 April, because that is the nature of paying people on a monthly basis, one is deemed not to have paid one's credits for the first week of April or the last week of the preceding fiscal year, or, more crucially, the 50th qualifying week in order to obtain benefit. Therefore, one is disbarred.

That is lost in the mish-mash of bureaucratic language. I am told that the Secretary of State's determination is binding. Once the Secretary of State has made a determination, that is the end of it. I have a copy here of the Secretary of State's determination in the case of my constituent, Mrs. Watson. It says that she does not satisfy the second criterion for maternity allowances. That is cut and dried. At the same time, my constituent is told that she can appeal. How does one appeal when one has been told beforehand that the matter is cut and dried and that the law does not allow for any appeal?

In the past few years, I have had another case involving the Department of Health and Social Security. It started in 1985. A constituent of mine and his wife came to see me because he believed that his retirement benefit had been wrongly calculated, and he asked me to investigate. I did, and I found that the ministerial decision was that the DHSS was right and my constituent was wrong.

Last week, quite out of the blue, nearly three years later, my constituent received a letter and inside was a handsome cheque. On the back of the letter it said that on a point of law my constituent should not have been disqualified from his benefit.

I wonder whether, on a point of law, Mrs. Watson should not have been disqualified from her benefit. I wonder whether anyone has ever tested this in a court of law. I wonder whether that is what Parliament wanted. The logic of section 4(2) of the Social Security Act 1975 is that liability for the payment of national insurance contributions arises at the time earnings are paid, regardless of the period to which they relate.

Let us take the case of the lady who is a retained sales agent in the furniture industry—I know one such person — and is paid on commission only, at quarterly intervals. God help her if she becomes pregnant, because the chances of her getting the 50 weeks in before the three months are pretty negligible. Mathematically, I believe that they are almost impossible. So, by definition and by law, anyone who is over one month in a payment period and who is female and becomes pregnant must lose her benefits and allowances.

I may have approached the issue in a slightly lighthearted manner, but it is quite serious. I cannot believe that this is what was intended when the law was framed, or that the Government really want to leave such a stupid loophole, so that they now find themselves on the hook. I am sure that they wish to heaven that they could find a way out for Mrs. Watson, as they did for Mr. Gaines-Burrill, on a point of law, and send a handsome cheque for four hundred quid to my constituent, who has so far been denied it.

I shall leave the matter to my hon. Friend, to whom I have been writing and talking for several months, both semi-formally and privately over a cup of tea. I know that he is sympathetic; however, I also know that he is only the Minister, and as such has not the powers to rise above the bureaucrats and tell them that they have got it wrong. They will want to wave at him the piece of paper that says, "This is the law, dated 1975."

There are two things that my hon. Friend can do, if he is to do anything. He can bring in legislation to change the law, or he can resign. Either way, I want him to tell me how I can face anyone else who comes along to me and says, "I am in a terrible state. I am paid monthly, and I am pregnant."

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Michael Portillo): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) on obtaining tonight's Adjournment debate, and on pursuing the cause of his constituent so assiduously. As he says, he has taken up the matter with me on numerous occasions, both in correspondence and in conversations face to face, and I do not think that any constituent could have had a better advocate than Mrs. Watson has had tonight.

Mrs. Watson has certainly been most unfortunate in not qualifying for maternity allowance, and she has failed to do so by a hair's breadth. She claimed the allowance from her local social security office at Eston on 13 October 1986. To qualify under the rules that then applied, a women needed to satisfy two contribution conditions. The first was that in any one tax year she must actually have paid contributions equivalent to 25 times the lower earnings level at which national insurance contributions become payable, and Mrs. Watson satisfied that condition. The second was that she must in the relevant tax year have paid or been credited with contributions the equivalent of 50 times the lower earnings level. The relevant tax year is governed by the benefit year in which the claim occurs.

In Mrs. Watson's case, the relevant income tax year was 1984-85. Mrs. Watson was unemployed for most of that year. She was signing at the local unemployment office until 30 March 1985: that covers a total of 51 weeks. However, as Mrs. Watson went abroad for two weeks and was not available for work, she received unemployment credits for only 49 weeks. That still leaves one week unaccounted for—the very last week in the tax year.

Mrs. Watson started to work with South Tees health authority on 1 April 1985. Her employer paid wages monthly on the last working day of each month; Mrs. Watson's first pay day was, accordingly, 30 April 1985. As such, liability for contributions would fall in the new tax year, 1985-86. Her employment did not therefore assist her contribution record for 1984-85.

My hon. Friend has argued strongly that, because Mrs. Watson worked for the last week of the 1984-85 tax year, part of the contribution paid on 30 April 1985 should be reallocated to that year. I perfectly understand his reasoning, but unfortunately the legislation does not work in that way. Legislation cannot just be set aside in quite the way that my hon. Friend might like.

Liability for the payment of national insurance contributions arises at the time earnings are paid, regardless of the period to which they relate, as my hon. Friend accurately repeated. The extent of the liability is then determined by the interval at which the earnings are paid, known as the "earnings period". Thus, if, like Mrs. Watson, a person is paid regularly at monthly intervals, contributions are calculated by reference to a monthly earnings period and liability arises only on the date on which the earnings are actually paid.

There are a number of reasons for adopting that procedure. It evens out the liability for contributions, ensuring that, for a monthly-paid employee, there will be 12 payments of contributions in a year. More importantly, to ask employers to calculate contributions over split periods would impose a real burden on them which could not be justified for the handful of employees who might benefit from it.

In passing, I advise my hon. Friend that, whereas Mrs. Watson has been unlucky in this case and has fallen just short of a contribution record for a year, of course the way in which the contributions fall might in another case have helped her to make up the contributions in the following year if she had been deficient. One can fall either side of that line.

All this means, of course, that Mrs. Watson's contribution record for 1984-85 was 49 credits and she was one short of satisfying the contribution tests and qualifying for maternity allowance. I fully accept my hon. Friend's comment that, had she delayed starting work by one week, she would almost certainly have been entitled to a further unemployment credit and hence satisfied the test. It is, of course, an inevitable consequence that wherever one draws the line, someone may fall the wrong side of it.

My hon. Friend may feel that Mrs. Watson should have been better advised about this situation, but of course, that would have meant predicting that 18 months later she was likely to become pregnant and would seek to draw maternity allowance. To recognise the significance of the missing credit 18 months before is not a realistic proposition.

As my hon. Friend knows, Mrs. Watson appealed against the adjudication officer's decision disallowing her maternity allowance. By law, questions relating to contribution conditions are reserved for determination by the Secretary of State, although in practice those decisions are given through specially authorised officers of the Department. Mrs. Watson subsequently applied for a formal decision from the Secretary of State regarding satisfaction of the condition for 1984-85. All aspects relevant to the second contribution test were considered afresh.

In coming to a decision, the officer for the Secretary of State is strictly bound by the provisions of the Social Security Act and regulations. He has no power to waive or relax those provisions in any circumstances or in any particular case. The decision was that Mrs. Watson did not satisfy the second contribution condition.

However, it was open to Mrs. Watson to appeal to the appeal tribunal, which she did. As a matter of fact, it was just this morning that the appeal tribunal heard the case and gave the decision that there was no title to maternity allowance.

The combination of circumstances faced by Mrs. Watson was unusual. I reassure my hon. Friend that in 1986 there were 350,000 successful maternity allowance claims, so he can put the case into context.

I now want to make the important point that, from April 1987, the old rules that applied to Mrs. Watson have been scrapped. My hon. Friend called on me a moment ago to do something about this and I think that at one point he invited me to resign, so I assure him that the rules have already been scrapped. Instead, we have today statutory maternity pay, paid by the employer. We have also changed the rules for maternity allowance, which may still be payable where there is no entitlement to statutory maternity pay.

Under the new provisions, an employer is required to pay statutory maternity pay to an employee who has worked for him for at least six months up to and including the 15th week before her baby is due and whose average weekly earnings in the last eight weeks of that period are above the lower earnings limit — currently £39. If a woman does not qualify for statutory maternity pay, perhaps because she has recently changed jobs, she will be entitled to maternity allowance providing she has worked and paid full-rate contributions in at least 26 of the 52 weeks ending with the 15th week before the baby is due: in other words, a recent record of being in employment, quite different from the more distant record of contributions credited — the position that Mrs. Watson was trying to satisfy.

The distant reference period for qualification, which applied to Mrs. Watson's case, is no longer relevant today. Therefore, she is doubly unfortunate in that she failed narrowly to satisfy the former test and, if her baby had been due a few months later, she would have been eligible under the new rules. I hope that my hon. Friend does not consider that I am rubbing salt into the wound by telling him that if she were in a similar position today she would undoubtedly qualify either for statutory maternity pay or for maternity allowance. I am sorry that I am only able to give that disappointing answer to my hon. Friend, although I believe that he will be happy to know that the rules have been changed.

Let me say a word about the case of Mr. Gaines-Burrill. My hon. Friend has written to me about this matter and I owe him a response in due course. Mr. Gaines-Burrill claimed a dependency increase for his wife in January 1985 following his retirement. At that time, the adjudication officer disallowed the dependency claim on the grounds that Mrs. Gaines-Burrill was in receipt of an occupational pension of £85 per week that could be treated as earnings and that she was not to be regarded as dependent upon her husband. The adjudicating authorities at that time were satisfied that this decision was correct in law.

A social security commissioner's decision of June 1987 disturbed that view. The commissioner held that for certain benefits, including retirement pension, an occupational pension can be treated as earnings only if the dependant receiving it was at the same time engaged in employment. We were then faced with the problem that an estimated 1,700 past claims, similar to that of Mr. Gaines-Burrill, had been wrongly decided in the period between November 1984 and June 1987.

All practical steps were taken to identify the wrongly decided cases from departmental records. Mr. Gaines-Burrill was one of those identified and the earlier wrong decision of January 1985 was referred back to the adjudication officer for a revised decision. The adjudication officer's revised decision, following the social security commissioner's decision, was notified to Mr. Gaines-Burrill and at the same time arrears for the maximum period of 12 months allowed by the law were paid into his bank. Unfortunately, the notification of the decision was not sent to Mr. Gaines-Burrill until a week after he had received his arrears.

Mr. Holt: I am an innocent who believes that the law is the law. If the Department made a mistake in law according to the commissioner, and therefore had to pay the back pay, how can that total amount of back pay be negated to a maximum of 12 months by a subsequent element of law? Which law predominates — a law that says that a mistake was made and therefore that the total amount of money should have been paid or the overrider that says a year is a maximum?

In that case, if the adjudicating officer had not pulled his finger out and had not woken up for six years, Mr. and Mrs. Gaines-Burrill would still only have the benefit for one year and would have lost the benefit of five years. As it is, they have lost the benefit of 22 months and I do not see that there is anything fair in that. I should like that explained.

Mr. Portillo: I was coming to precisely that.

The Government believe that the commissioner's decision introduces an inconsistency into the law by treating a substantial occupational pension as though it were not earnings for the purpose of determining whether a person is dependent. In the Social Security Bill that is currently being considered in another place, we seek powers to reintroduce the consistency until the commissioner's decision is generally understood and applied.

What I am about to say is a matter of speculation, but the Government's view of the law as we now understand it, following the social security commissioner's decision, is that the law is so inconsistent that that must be changed. It does not make sense to us that one should regard some earnings as earnings but disregard an occupational pension. A person with an occupational pension of £85 cannot be regarded as being dependent on her husband. Although this is speculation, if the Government had become aware, before the social security commissioner's decision, that the law was as it has now turned out to be, we would probably have sought to put the law right earlier.

That is why it was right that, last year, we took powers to limit to 12 months the arrears payable in cases where an adjudication officer had decided a case in line with what was thought to be the law, but where that view was subsequently overturned by a commissioner's decision on a point of law. Otherwise, claimants would receive several years of benefit in respect of a matter which neither the Government nor Parliament had intended to be the norm and which had not been dealt with because the social security commissioner had not yet reached a decision. It has always been understood to be something quite different.

I shall write to my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh about the case of Mr. Gaines-Burrill, but I hope that the debate has given him an opportunity to understand the matter.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes past Twelve o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Nurses

1. Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many nurses in Scotland have left the National Health Service in each of the last 10 years; and if he will express that number as a percentage of the total number employed in each of those years.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): The number of nursing staff in the NHS in Scotland increased from 53,000 to 63,250 whole-time equivalent over the last 10 years. Information about nurses leaving the service could be made available only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. Reid: It is amazing that the Secretary of State does not know how many nurses leave the profession every year. It is estimated that, every year, 30,000 trained nurses leave the profession. Does the Secretary of State think that that is because morale is at rock bottom? Why are thousands of devoted health workers in Scotland taking further action today? Is it because, as his colleague the Minister with responsibility for health in Scotland pretends, they are all Militant clones, or because they care a damned sight more about the Health Service than do the Minister and his colleagues?

Mr. Rifkind: First, with regard to morale in the Health Service, it is perhaps significant that when the Royal College of Nursing met my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health it did not raise the matter of morale among nurses. As the hon. Gentleman knows, many of those who leave the nursing profession leave temporarily or for personal or family reasons. It is surely significant that, under this Government, there has been a major increase in the number of nurses and that the real income of nurses in Scotland has increased by 30 per cent., whereas it fell by 21 per cent. in real terms under the Labour Government.

Mr. Fairbairn: Will my right hon. and learned Friend note that today's day of action has nothing to do with soul baring by the nurses? It is a strike by NUPE, which is anxious to keep up its numbers and is unwilling to have competitive tendering. The whole purpose and thrust of the day of action is not to keep viable patients alive but to keep moribund unions alive.

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. and learned Friend is quite right. It will be interesting to know the Opposition's view on the damage that is being done to patients in Scotland by the industrial disruption that has been taking place over the past few weeks. For example, we understand that between 11 February and 23 February, in the Glasgow Royal infirmary and in Stobhill hospital, more than 330 operations were either postponed or cancelled as a result of industrial action; in Lanarkshire, more than 100 operations at Law and Strathclyde hospitals were postponed because of a 24-hour walk-out by non-nursing staff; and there were reports that more than 250 operations in Lothian were cancelled because of industrial action. It will be interesting to know whether Her Majesty's Opposition approve of the damage that is being done to patient care by industrial action of the kind that we are seeing.

Mr. Ernie Ross: The Secretary of State will know that nurses, ancillary workers and manufacturing workers are on the cobbles today because of serious concern about the National Health Service in Scotland. What comment would he make to a staff nurse who earns £65 a week less than a policeman earns?

Mr. Rifkind: The point that I would make to her is that her income has increased considerably under this Government, whereas it declined under the Labour Government. Those in the National Health Service who say that they are interested in the welfare of patients have a strange way of showing such interest if their actions result in operations being postponed or cancelled and the greatest discomfort to patients. If Opposition Members have the interests of patients at heart they should follow the lead of the Royal College of Nursing, which has never allowed grievances, real or imaginary, to result in harm to patients in Scotland or anywhere else. That is what real interest in the NHS is all about.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that what has come through clearly in the dispute is that the real professionals—members of the Royal College of Nursing, who care about patients—attend to their duties, as they are doing today? It is important to recognise that patient care is what matters, and not the care of trade unions, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) said.

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There has been a great deal of interest in waiting lists in Scotland over the past few weeks. It is significant that two things have happened with regard to waiting lists: first, that the Government have been able to make available an extra £3·6 million, which has reduced waiting lists; and, secondly, that industrial action by ancillary and other staff, which appears to be supported by Opposition Members, has led to the cancellation of hundreds of operations, which will undoubtedly add to waiting lists in the weeks and months to come.

Dr. Moonie: Does the Secretary of State realise that the industrial action in Scotland today is due directly to his folly and incompetence and that of his ministerial colleagues and their failure to recognise the depth of feeling against the damage caused by the Government? Does he not realise the contribution that low pay makes to ill-health in Scotland? Will he, even at this late stage, change his mind and act to the benefit of Scotland, instead of to its detriment?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman should understand the alleged purpose of today's industrial action. The trade unions have told us that it is not about low pay; it is about the Government's policy of competitive tendering. That is a means of ensuring that resources in the National Health Service will, so far as possible, be made available to help patients rather than anyone else.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Secretary of State accept that, for my part, I do not believe that industrial action is appropriate at this stage? If he wants to do something about the morale of nurses and support the work of the Royal College of Nursing, he should consider the problems of recruiting nurses in future because of demographic changes. He could do much to help and raise the morale of nurses if he would tell us the Government's reaction to the Project 2,000 proposals and put extra resources into the clinical regrading and restructuring that is necessary. That would keep nurses in the profession and prevent problems about recruitment in future.

Mr. Rifkind: I note the point that the hon. Gentleman made in the latter part of his question. Only a Liberal could analyse today's action on the basis that the Liberals were against industrial action at the present time.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that operations in Scotland are not being cancelled because of a shortage of nurses, but that they will be cancelled as a result of this politically motivated action by public sector unions with their snouts in the trough of taxpayers' money attempting to preserve their own privileges? Will he confirm that, because fewer than half the Scottish Labour Members are present today, the rest are on strike?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend must not draw too many conclusions from that. During the debate on Ravenscraig and the steel industry yesterday, only the hon. Members for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) and for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) chose to be present during the opening speeches and for most of the debate.

Mr. Harry Ewing: Is the Secretary of State proud of the fact that he is the only Secretary of State in the history of that great office to provoke the caring nursing profession into strike action? Is it only because he has now lost his own self-respect that he does not resign?

Mr. Rifkind: I remind the hon. Gentleman that, far from the nursing profession being on strike, the Royal College of Nursing has reported that since the beginning of the present industrial action there has been a large influx of nurses into the Royal College of Nursing from other unions. That has happened on a larger scale in Scotland than in any other part of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dewar: Is there a Scottish Office Minister among the ministerial group set up by the Prime Minister to review the funding of the National Health Service? If not, why not? Will the Scottish Office be bound by any scheme dreamt up by the right hon. Lady in this important and sensitive area? The Opposition unanimously feel that the day of protest in Scotland today is fully justified—— [Interruption.] It has been caused by the obstinacy of the Secretary of State, who insists on a policy of irrelevant privatisation, and by the continuing crisis over the funding of the Health Service. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that the Select Committee on Social Services has calculated that a 2 per cent. increase in real terms in the Health Service budget is necessary for it to stand still? In the right hon. and learned Gentleman's commentary on public expenditure, published this month, he says that a 1 per cent. increase is necessary to stand still, yet the figure for the hospital and community service programme shows that that figure is not being reached. Is it true that, having set his own criteria, he has failed to meet them and that that is the reason for the justified discontent in the Health Service?

Mr. Rifkind: I am glad that we now have that on record. The hon. Gentleman, with all the authority of the position that he holds in the Labour party, says that he and his colleagues are fully behind the disruption of the NHS. Presumably, they are accepting — [Interruption.] — full responsibility for the operations that are being postponed or cancelled as a result of that disruption. In the light of the hon. Gentleman's comments, I hope that in the weeks and months to come we will hear no more sanctimonious claptrap and synthetic concern from him about the length of waiting lists in Scotland and the problems of those who require operations under the NHS.

Hospitals

2. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many new hospitals are to be built in Scotland within the next five years.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): The current building programme includes 34 major developments providing 4,484 new beds. Of those, two are being commissioned, 11 are under construction and 21 are being planned. By the end of 1992 our continuing programme of hospital building will have enabled a further 15 of those schemes in planning to have been completed. This represents the biggest ever capital investment programme in the history of the National Health Service in Scotland.

Mrs. Michie: Can the Minister tell me what has happened to Oban hospital? Is he aware that people in that area have been waiting for that hospital for well nigh 30 years? Back in the 1950s and 1960s money was promised for that hospital, but it was reallocated. A former Conservative Secretary of State, now Lord Campbell of Croy, promised that money in 1972. Indeed, one of the Minister's predecessors promised that money a year before the general election. We understand that the site for the hospital has not even been bought. I should be grateful if the Minister could tell me, so that I can tell the people of Oban, when the hospital is to be built.

Mr. Forsyth: Approval was given for the new hospital at Oban in May 1986. It is now up to the Argyll and Clyde health board to progress the scheme to the next stage of planning. I should have thought that the hon. Lady would welcome the fact that we have announced our decision to build a new hospital at Campbelltown in her constituency at a cost of £4·2 million. She is right to point out the years that have gone by under successive Governments when neither of those hospitals progressed, but this Government have brought them to fruition.

Mr. Douglas: Will the Minister with so-called responsibility for hospital building in Scotland reflect on his decision, announced today, about hospital building in Fife? The decision is tantamount to government by diktat.

Despite four years and more of appraisal by the Fife health board, which came down unanimously in favour of option C, the Minister has sought, by diktat, to reverse that decision. It appears that the Minister believes that he knows best. When the Minister assumed office, would it not have been better if he had sacked all the health boards of Scotland and said that his office had subsumed all responsibility for hospital building? At least that would have been honest.

Mr. Forsyth: I am extremely surprised by the hon. Gentleman's remarks. He came to see me a matter of weeks ago and asked me to make a quick decision. Now he criticises us for having taken a decision that will result in a substantial improvement in hospital facilities in his constituency and in the rest of Fife.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Does my hon. Friend accept that it does not necessarily make the best sense and use of resources for hospitals if, as in Grampian region, attempts are made to close viable and popular rural hospitals and to centralise? Will he ensure that that aspect is considered in relation to new hospital building?

Mr. Forsyth: As I have said to my right hon. Friend on previous occasions, the proposals which Grampian health board has to consider regarding the rationalisation of maternity services will be subject to consultation. My right hon. and learned Friend and I will consider all arguments that are put forward, including those advanced by my right hon. Friend.

Domestic Rates

3. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimates he has of the effect on the percentage increase in domestic rates in Scotland in 1988-89 of restricting the non-domestic rates increase to the annual inflation rate.

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Mr. Ian Lang): Non-domestic rates will not be indexed until domestic rates are abolished in 1989-90. Therefore, no such estimates have been made.

Mr. Worthington: The Minister's answer does not surprise me. Roughly translated, it means that he cannot be bothered to work it out. Is the Minister aware that his attitude of studied indifference to the consequence of his policy resembles that of Marie Antoinette, because, in effect, he is saying, "Let them eat cake"—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman ask his question?

Mr. Worthington: Does the Minister agree that in 1987-88 the average rate increase for Scotland was 13 per cent., and that if a poll tax had been in force and a business rate had been indexed at 4 per cent., the average poll tax increase across Scotland would have been 25 per cent.?

Mr. Lang: I am anxious to help the hon. Gentleman, although it is a hypothetical and artificial calculation. If the new system were in place and if Strathclyde were to peg expenditure and increase the non-domestic rate by the rate of inflation, it would be able to reduce the community charge by about 5 per cent.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Opposition and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities have created a scurrilous campaign on the community charge and its effects on the non-domestic rate? Will he point out to the Opposition that the non-domestic rate, tied to a rate of increased inflation, will be of immense advantage to businesses in Scotland, because they can plan ahead knowing the maximum rate increase? That will be a tremendous advantage to the industrial future of Scotland.

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In the current year non-domestic rates rose by 15 per cent. when inflation was at about 4 per cent. That illustrates the extra burden that the non-domestic sector has had to bear. It is important to keep down non-domestic rates, in order to preserve jobs.

Mr. Andrew Welsh: Will the Government impose the uniform business rate system throughout the United Kingdom in 1990, or will it be applied only to Scotland as most people suppose? Is the Minister aware that the present unfair disadvantage to Scottish businesses through the rating system in commercial and financial terms compared with England will be mild compared with the problems posed for Scottish businesses if the UBR is implemented only in Scotland and not throughout the United Kingdom?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman has got it the wrong way round. The uniform business rate is coming in south of the border in 1990. Until we are able to harmonise the practice and the law on valuation between England and Wales and Scotland, it will be impossible to contemplate any move towards a national United Kingdom rate. In the meantime, index-linking gives excellent protection to the non-domestic sector.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Does my hon. Friend agree that in a year when the Government are increasing aggregate Exchequer grant by more than 8 per cent. there is no justification for any local authority increasing the rate above the rate of inflation? My hon. Friend said that there were considerable advantages to business men from index-linking. Will he comment on the rumour that the discussions between the Scottish Assessors' Association and the Inland Revenue valuers—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot hear what the hon. Member is saying.

Mr. Stewart: Will my hon. Friend comment on the rumour that the talks between the Scottish Assessors' Association and the Inland Revenue valuers are not progressing without difficulties? Does he agree that it is essential that those talks should be completed before revaluation north and south of the border in 1990?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right about the 1988-89 RSG settlement. There was an increase of 8·2 per cent., which was well above the rate of inflation. It was based on local authorities' own budgets for 1987-88, inflation and allowances for other factors. The talks between the Scottish Assessors' Association and the Inland Revenue are making progress, but the issues on which they are engaged are complex and it would be a mistake to rush the talks.

Mr. Maxton: Following the question of the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh), what assessment have the Government made of the damage that will be done to Scottish industry by a uniform business rate operating in England and Wales for several years before it operates in Scotland? When they finally introduce a scheme for Scotland, will it be linked into the United Kingdom scheme, so that there is one United Kingdom scheme and one uniform business rate across the whole United Kingdom, or will it be a separate Scottish UBR?

Mr. Lang: A separate Scottish UBR is not part of our programme. It is impossible to make firm estimates of the effect of what goes on south of the border until after the 1990 revaluation. It is important that local authorities should control their expenditure because high and growing local authority expenditure has greatly damaged the business sector in the past.

Cervical Cancer

4. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the figures for deaths in Scotland caused by cervical cancer for each year since 1975.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The figure for 1975 was 244 and for 1986 it was 199. I shall arrange for the details to appear in the Official Report.

Mr. Wray: Does the Minister agree that the Government have a deplorable record in dealing with this disease? They have allowed it to manifest itself, and their proposed scheme to provide a smear test for women between the ages of 20 and 65 over a five-year period is absolutely useless. It is time that they showed some compassion for the 2,000 needless deaths in the United Kingdom and the 200 deaths each year in Scotland since they have been in Government. They should support a scheme and spend the additional £20 million needed, bearing in mind the £5 billion that they spent on defeating the miners.

Mr. Forsyth: I am sure that Professor Strong and the other professionals who drew up the report on which we set up our screening for cervical cancer will be interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's views on the validity of their work. The Government have established a call and recall system for all women between the ages of 20 and 60 in Scotland, and it will be operational by the end of this year. I note the criticism that the hon. Gentleman makes of previous Governments for having taken no initiative in this direction.

Mrs. Fyfe: Does the Minister agree that a five-year span is inadequate? Is he aware that widespread opinion is that three years is a proper length of time between tests and that, if the Government were less insufferably complacent about spending on the NHS, that could easily be arranged?

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for pointing out that the Government opted for five rather than for three years. The reason is that 90 per cent. of deaths caused by cervical cancer are among women who have not been screened. We took the view that it was important to set up an effective call and recall system and to have the software in place, rather than to choose an over-ambitious recall period. We shall examine the length of time in the light of circumstances. I should have thought that the hon. Lady would have the grace to acknowledge that the Government have made considerable progress in this area.

The following is the information:

Deaths in Scotland caused by cervical cancer:

Farmers

5. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the executive of the Aberdeen and Kincardine branch of the Scottish National Farmers Union to discuss the problems facing farmers in north-east Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My noble Friend the Minister of State met representatives of the Aberdeen and Kincardine branch on 12 November 1987.

Mr. Bruce: Does the Minister recognise that the state of the agriculture industry in the north-east of Scotland is in particular difficulties and extraordinary circumstances? Does he acknowledge that particularly in the pig-rearing sector, which accounts for half of Scotland, the Government's failure so far to introduce a devaluation of the green pound or an adjustment in monetary compensatory amounts is causing genuine anxiety? What assurance can he give that the Government will press for an early and substantial devaluation?

Mr. Forsyth: The Government are well aware of the strong feeling among farmers about the green pound, and we shall certainly take that into account when we consider the extent of any green pound devaluation to be negotiated in the context of the annual Community price-fixing negotiations later this spring. I am sure the hon. Gentleman is aware that the devaluation that the United Kingdom secured under the 1987 price fixing substantially improved our competitive position in relation to our main competitors.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: Has the Minister had an opportunity to study the excellent document produced by Dr. Dalton in November 1987, which outlined the critical position of farmers, especially in the north-east of Scotland? How can we take any encouragement from his reply when Scottish Office Ministers do not attend our debates on agriculture, when Opposition Members argue strongly for support for that vital industry, which, in Grampian region, is responsible for 30 per cent. of the region's total output?

Mr. Forsyth: I am surprised at the tone of the hon. Lady's question. Surely she is aware of the initiative that was taken by my noble Friend in consultation with the National Farmers Union of Scotland? They have established a short-term joint counselling initiative to offer advice to farmers who are experiencing financial difficulties. The initiative involved not only the Department and the SNFU, but the Scottish agricultural colleges and the Scottish clearing banks. It is now well under way. I am not certain what the hon. Lady meant by her criticism about Ministers attending debates, but perhaps we can settle that later.

Mr. Andy Stewart: On behalf of my relatives, who are all farmers in Scotland, may I ask my hon. Friend to tell the House by how much the Government have increased expenditure on agriculture in Scotland during the past five years?

Mr. Forsyth: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Forestry

6. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he is taking to amend forestry policy in regard to the protection of areas of ecological importance, and in particular the flow country of Caithness and Sutherland.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the statement that I made to the House on 25 January, by way of a written answer, covering the protection of areas of ecological importance in the peatland of Caithness and Sutherland.

Mr. Hardy: Does the Secretary of State accept that Britain's conservation bodies, whether public or private, remain deeply concerned about the damaging scale of blanket afforestation in those areas, which seems likely to continue? Does he accept that the local, national and international interest suggests that greater priority should be given to the ecological importance of those areas, rather than to maintaining tax regimes which may assist a few people of celebrated importance?

Mr. Rifkind: I advise the hon. Gentleman that the Government attach importance to the ecological significance of the flow country of Caithness, which is precisely why we made the announcement that we did. The policy that we announced was welcomed by the Nature Conservancy Council, but it is significant that it was welcomed also by Highland regional council and the Highlands and Islands Development Board. We seek to achieve two legitimate objectives: to meet the ecological criteria, which we have done on a scientific basis, and, at the same time, to take account of the livelihood of those who live in that part of Scotland and who have a legitimate interest with regard to their livelihood and the work opportunities that are available to them.

Mr. Macdonald: With regard to the relationship between ecological forms of land use and forestry, does the Secretary of State accept that crofting is one of the most environmentally sensitive forms of land use? How can he justify taxpayers' money being given hand over fist to speculators who, frequently, are not resident in the Highlands and Islands, to engage in commercial forestry, whereas crofters are excluded from such access to commercial forestry? When will he progress from expressions of high sympathy for the crofters to doing something about that situation?

Mr. Rifkind: The opportunities that are available to crofters are similar to those that are available to, for example, tenant farmers elsewhere in Scotland. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that his tax question is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Sir Russell Johnston: Is the Secretary of State aware that I very much welcome the answer that he gave to the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), that we in the Highlands must consider not only ecological protection, but work and jobs. In return for that generosity, given that there are only five Conservative Members of Parliament present who represent Scottish constituencies, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman assure us that he might find some way of keeping quiet the raucous invasion from south of the border?

Mr. Rifkind: Whether in the Highland region or other rural areas, it is always essential to take into account the legitimate needs of the local community and the wider economic importance of forestry in Scotland. For example, we would not be able to have the major £250 million investment in a papermill at Irvine but for the availability of spruce in Scotland to service the requirements of that factory. We need to achieve a proper balance, and the announcement that we made in January, which has been welcomed by the Nature Conservancy Council, shows that we have achieved what many might have thought impossible — the reconciliation of those two interests in a constructive way.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that 100 per cent. of the Conservative party is here and there is present a miserable percentage of the Liberal party, mixed, and all at odds with each other, anyhow? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that his announcement last month was an acceptable compromise in the interests of all concerned, the Nature Conservancy Council, the sites of special scientific interest and the Highlands regional council, and aimed at creating employment? In addition to those important aspects, will my right hon. and learned Friend also bear in mind that, in the general context of the whole of Scotland, the most important issue is the beauty of the land, and we do not want too much blanket afforestation keeping away tourists and others who want to see Scotland as it really is?

Mr. Rifkind: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The Forestry Commission is to be commended on showing much greater sensitivity to those objectives in recent years. For example, it has insisted on broadleaved planting as part of a more general planting. There may still be improvements that can be made, but most objective commentators would accept that the Forestry Commission, and, indeed, those in the private sector involved in planting, have taken far greater account of environmental considerations in recent years than used to be the case.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is the Secretary of State aware that we, for our part, would strongly support the properly planned expansion of forestry in Scotland, but will he come clean about the position of the Scottish Office on the grotesque development of blanket tax incentives for blanket afforestation? Is he aware that, for once, his hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) was right when he told the House of Commons, in an Adjournment debate on 26 January 1987, that a new generation of absentee landlords was exploiting that tax shelter? Will he, just this once, listen to his hon. Friend and acknowledge that those tax incentives should be drastically overhauled before any more damage is done to the Scottish countryside or to the reputation of the forestry industry?

Mr. Rifkind: I acknowledge that the hon. Gentleman can speak better on behalf of absentee landlords than most of us, but fiscal matters are for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If we, like the Opposition, wish to see a proper planting programme and the benefits to the Scottish economy that forestry represents, we must ensure that whatever system exists there will be a proper planting programme and a proper availability to the wood pulp and other comparable industries of the raw materials that they require.

Public Expenditure

7. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library a copy of his commentary on Scottish public expenditure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Copies of the Scottish Commentary were placed in the Library on Wednesday 17 February.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Secretary of State confirm that there are no assumptions in the commentary dealing with the pay increases or other allowances that are expected in the fiscal year 1988-89? Does he accept that that makes it difficult for health boards, for example, to plan next year's finances, particularly when there is no reference to any special allowance for nurses' pay review awards? Will the Secretary of State undertake to use his influence within the Government to ensure that, whatever the review body recommends, once the Government have taken a decision and made an award they will fully fund it, so that the local health boards in Scotland will not have to use their own resources to meet in part the pay review award?

Mr. Rifkind: The Government have an excellent record on implementing the recommendations of pay review bodies. Obviously, I cannot anticipate what the pay review body will say. We shall have to consider that at the time on the basis of the criteria normally applied.

Mr. Hayward: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that expenditure next year on health in Scotland is to increase by £225 million, or 8·6 per cent., and that that will contribute to the preparation for the replacement of the acute hospital at Ayr?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, my hon. Friend is absolutely correct. The Health Service is in fine fettle in Scotland. That might explain why the industrial action today is not about the resources of the Health Services, but is about this controversy over competitive tendering.

Mr. O'Neill: Will the Secretary of State take account of the amount of public expenditure which has been put into the Castlebridge mine, which is in my constituency and forms part of the Longannet complex, whose future is endangered by the foolhardy programme of tendering for importing foreign coal? Does he agree that the flexible attitude adopted by British Coal and by the local mineworkers union in that area suggests that that investment should have a long-term future and should not be endangered by short-term rushes towards privatisation of the South of Scotland Electricity Board?

Mr. Rifkind: Naturally, we hope that the difference of view between the SSEB and British Coal will be resolved amicably, but the hon. Gentleman should appreciate the difficulties for all parties involved. There are difficulties for British Coal, for reasons with which the hon. Gentleman will be familiar, and for the SSEB, which has an obligation to its consumers, particularly its industrial consumers. The House is anxious that Scottish industry should be as competitive as possible and that Ravenscraig should not be put at a disadvantage. The hon. Gentleman must know that Ravenscraig, which is the largest user of Scottish electricity, clearly has an enormous interest in tariffs in Scotland being as low as possible. The SSEB must also take that factor into account.

Mr. Harris: Just in case anyone outside the House might be tempted to take seriously the latest manifestation this afternoon of whining and whingeing by Opposition Members from Scotland, will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that public expenditure per head in Scotland is, on average, higher than in England? Will he also confirm that spending on the Health Service amounts to £454 per head in Scotland, compared with £365 per head in England?

Mr. Rifkind: The level of Health Service expenditure in Scotland is determined by the Secretary of State from within the overall block available to him. It has been the practice of successive Secretaries of State to take into account the particular health requirements of Scotland and to make generous provision for health expenditure. A further £225 million will be available for that purpose next year.

Mr. Dewar: Does the Secretary of State accept that there are few signs of an amicable resolution of the coal dispute and that there is genuinely widespread disappointment at the negative stance taken by the Scottish Office on that matter? As the Secretary of State has a statutory responsibility for electricity supply, is he satisfied that it is in the public interest to substitute foreign imported coal for that produced domestically? If that occurs, what impact will it have on jobs and on stability of supply? Does he recall that, in a widely published speech last Friday to the CBI in Scotland, he listed coal as one of the group of important industries providing vital jobs? Does he not think it important to stop the hands-off negative approach and to do something to protect those jobs?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman must address himself to the difficult problems that must be resolved. He has not expressed any view today about the implications for consumers, including industry in Scotland. Last night he spoke eloquently about his devotion to the interests of the steel industry in Scotland. He must know that the most crucial question affecting industry is the cost of the power that it uses. When the Electricity Board and British Coal have certain interests in common, and certain differences of view, it is much more sensible to allow those two boards to come to a conclusion as to what is required than for the Government to interfere in what is ultimately a matter to be determined by those involved in the industry.

Council House Sales

8. Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the numbers of applications to buy public sector housing during 1987; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): Returns made to my Department show that about 39,000 applications to purchase public sector houses were made during 1987. This continuing high level of applications is making a major and welcome contribution to diversifying ownership of housing in Scotland.

Mr. Forth: I thank my hon. Friend and welcome those figures. Will he tell the House what is the rate of owner-occupation in Scotland? Is he satisfied with the rate of progress being made in that direction, and does he think that the excessively low level of council house rents in Scotland is perhaps a disincentive to people to consider buying their council houses?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Council house rents have risen considerably, although they are still much lower than those in England. Sales have been running at an extremely high level. Now, 10·3 per cent. of public sector house stock has been sold since 1979 and about 107,000 public sector tenants have purchased their homes. We have now reached the stage where fewer than half of all homes in Scotland are rented from the public sector. We can justly call that a Scottish success story.

Mr. Graham: Why do the Government have double standards? Is the Minister aware that a Ministry of Defence worker in my constituency who applied to purchase his house was denied the 49 per cent. discount that he would have received on a council house, and received a discount of only 30 per cent.?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There are certain exclusions. This is a matter primarily for the Ministry of Defence. The same also applies to certain police houses. There are exemptions on certain grounds, but, overall, we are very much in favour of the right to buy and we wish to extend it wherever possible.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that the figures that he has given on the sale of council houses last year and before show clearly that the Opposition, who fought the 1980 Bill tooth and nail, do not care, in the same way as they do not care about patient care? Does my hon. Friend further agree that our policies will continue to produce the results?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It will always be remembered that the Bill that we introduced was called the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Bill. That was to the credit of my right hon. and learned Friend the present Secretary of State.

Education (Strathclyde)

9. Mr. Michael J. Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to improve education facilities in Strathclyde; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The provision and improvement of education facilities in Strathclyde is primarily a matter for the regional council, taking account of available resources and, where, appropriate, the wishes of parents.

Mr. Martin: The Minister and the Prime Minister intervened in the proposed closure of Paisley grammar school. I do not begrudge that school remaining open, but the hon. Gentleman must know that in my constituency, Colston, Rosemount, St. Bede's and St. Rock's are all supported wholeheartedly by the parents, who want to keep them open. Why is the Minister making flesh of some schools and fowl of others? Why is he not prepared to intervene to help out those schools?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman mentioned schools in his constituency. He will know that St. Bede's is a denominational school, and the case may come to my right hon. and learned Friend for his consideration. I have already answered a question by the hon. Gentleman on that subject. As for non-denominational schools, where travelling distances are not excessive, and where the schools operate at less than 80 per cent. capacity, it is entirely a matter for Strathclyde regional council, with which I should have thought the hon. Gentleman had some influence.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Is my hon. Friend aware of the volume of correspondence that I am receiving from parents in Strathclyde, who want the Government to give them the chance to consider whether to opt out of the Strathclyde regional council system? Why is my hon. Friend so reluctant to move on the matter? Is he further aware that all parents, pupils and ratepayers in Strathclyde have a right to reasonable decision-making? Is it not a disgrace and an outrage that today Strathclyde regional council will be adjourned because Labour members are too indolent to attend, as they wish to wave NUPE banners rather than do the job for which they were elected?

Mr. Forsyth: The events of today and recent months, and the conduct of their elected representatives, will give the people of Strathclyde something to think about. With regard to opting out, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has said that we will consider any arguments that are put forward in Committee on the Bill, but my hon. Friend will recognise that we have no history of school boards or parental involvement in schools in Scotland——

Mr. Forth: It is time that my hon. Friend had some.

Mr. Forsyth: I say to my hon. Friend, who intervenes from a sedentory position, that the forthcoming Bill will give Scotland an opportunity to make progress on that matter.

Mr. Buchan: Has the Minister read the devastating document issued by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments condemning his squalid set of regulations? It said that the regulations were illegal in the sense that they did not comply with the Act, and that they were defective in the sense that they could not be corrected or understood. Should he not apologise for his part in the squalid conspiracy that led to the sequence of events, withdraw the regulations and have an early debate on the behaviour of himself in going over the head of the Secretary of State, in alliance with the Prime Minister, and his intervention in the proper, legal behaviour of Strathclyde regional council?

Mr. Forsyth: As the hon. Gentleman knows, there will be an opportunity to debate the regulations. His account of the criticism of the regulations is somewhat exaggerated. The House will have a proper opportunity to consider the matter. The validity of the regulations is not in doubt. I imagine that the people of Paisley must be astonished to be represented by a Member of Parliament who has campaigned so hard to prevent one of the most successful schools in his area having an opportunity, should Strathclyde decide to close it, to have the decision reviewed by the Secretary of State.

Mr. John Marshall: Will my hon. Friend comment on the schizophrenia of Opposition Members? The hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) asked for Government intervention, and the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) objects to Government intervention. Will my hon. Friend comment on the fact that Strathclyde regional council has the worst record in education of any of the Scottish regional councils? Is he happy that one pupil in four leaves Strathclyde schools without any qualification, a record basically equivalent to that of ILEA? Does he believe that the same treatment would be suitable for Strathclyde as is being accorded to ILEA?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend is right to point to the problems in Strathclyde. I understand that management consultants have been called in to help sort them out. As to the paradox that he identifies, it is a paradox that Labour Members are in favour of no Government intervention to save popular schools from closure, but call for Government intervention to keep open schools which are half empty and which parents do not support.

Mr. Norman Hogg: Is it not the case that the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments has revealed that the Government's instrument concerning school closures is ambiguous, badly drafted and in breach of the rules and protocols of the House? Does he not accept that the heavy-handed diktat which he has applied in this case has created a shambles? Is it not time to call a halt and to withdraw the regulations so that the confusion which surrounds the matter can be clarified?

Mr. Forsyth: The criticism of the regulations was that we had not observed the 21-day rule. We did not observe it for the reason which we explained, which was that the region should know the position. As to the regulations being unclear about who decides, it is clear from the context of the main regulations and the parent Act that it is up to the local authority to decide whether it must refer a case to the Secretary of State. I am sure that the people of Scotland will note that the hon. Gentleman, the official spokesman for the Labour party on education in Scotland, does not want the parents of Strathclyde to have the opportunity, should Strathclyde decide to proceed with closure, to have that decision reviewed.

Mr. Buchan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the grossly inadequate nature of that reply, I give notice that I shall raise the matter on the Adjournment. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is perfectly in order for the hon. Gentleman to do that.

Horse Sales

10. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to implement in Scotland the recommendations of the Farm Animal Welfare Council on conditions at horse markets and sales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Government's response to the council's report on the welfare of livestock at markets, announced in October last year, accepted that legislation should be introduced to cover horse markets and other sales. Proposals for a new order and code of practice to apply throughout Great Britain are now being prepared.

Mr. Greenway: Is my hon. Friend aware that the standards for cattle markets and sales are much higher than those for horses and ponies? As the Farm Animal Welfare Council has pointed out, those applying to horses and ponies are very unsatisfactory. Would my hon. Friend and Scotland like to set an example and make the proposed voluntary code statutory, so that horses and ponies receive better treatment?

Mr. Forsyth: I know of my hon. Friend's interest in the matter: indeed, he has a constituency interest. Our preference in general is to legislate only where there is a clear need for statutory safeguards. Guidance to those using and operating markets is, we feel, more a matter for codes of practice. However, the detailed proposals will be issued for consultation in the summer, and I am sure that my hon. Friend's arguments will be taken into consideration.

Mr. Ron Brown: Was there not a lot of horse trading going on when Guinness took over Distillers, which was an illegal and corrupt act——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is the wrong sort of horse.

Hospital Services

11. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what responses he has had from health boards to his draft circular on the privatisation of hospital services; and how many were in favour.

Mr. Rifkind: A letter of 11 December from the Scottish Home and Health Department set out the steps which boards are to take to test the cost-effectiveness of their support services by putting them out to tender. All boards have agreed to implement these instructions.

Mr. Ross: The Secretary of State will know that in Scotland today 50,000 people—not only Health Service workers, but workers from the manufacturing sector, miners and dockers — are demonstrating against the Government's cynical refusal either to fund the nurses' pay award properly or to fund technological changes in hospitals—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Ross: Those workers are on the streets because of the Government's cynical determination to ignore Select Committees of the House when they try to assist the Secretary of State, and the comments of his hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) last night implying that patient care was suffering due to the lack of emergency cover because of the current stoppages. The Government are determined not to fund the Health Service properly, either through salaries or through facilities required by technological change.

Mr. Rifkind: I noted the hon. Gentleman's comment that those taking part in industrial action included people with no direct connection with the National Health Service. He might like to know—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. Members must allow the Secretary of State to answer the question.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman might like to know that I understand that there was also a demonstration outside the offices of the Scottish TUC, with a placard reading "Stop the strikes and not the operations". He may also have noted the rather quaint advertisement that appeared in The Scotsman yesterday from Edinburgh district council, which, under the slogan, "Improving services and creating jobs", informed the public that it would be a waste of time telephoning the council today because no one would be there to answer the telephones.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm again, in the hope that it may penetrate the deaf ears opposite, that any savings made through contracts going out — and indeed, any savings in efficiency — can be devoted by the health board to patient care in its area? Does not the Opposition's attitude show a callous disregard for the real concerns of patients? Will my right hon. and learned Friend make that clear to the public in Scotland and to others outside the House, even though, inside the House, the Opposition will not acknowledge it?

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. Friend is absolutely correct. NUPE and COHSE have shot themselves in the foot by the industrial action that they are promoting. It will be in the best interests of those in the in-house services in NHS hospitals if they believe that they are providing the best service at the least cost to the NHS. They will then have nothing to fear from competitive tendering. As long as Opposition Members help to forment industrial disputes in the NHS, they will have themselves to blame for the problems faced by the service.

Mr. Lambie: What statutory powers does the Minister have to instruct members of health boards to put out contracts to privatise hospital services?

Mr. Rifkind: Health boards, whether under this Government or any previous Government, are agents of Government, and it has always been the practice of health boards that they carry out the policy of the Government of the day.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that efficient workers have nothing to fear from competitive tendering? If the unions are as upset as they seem to be, must there not be an awful lot of inefficiency around?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is correct. As has been said on numerous occasions, every penny saved by competitive tendering goes directly towards reducing waiting lists and helping patients in the NHS. If the Labour party is opposed to competitive tendering, clearly it is opposed to concentrating help, wherever possible, on patient care.

Mr. Norman Hogg: Is it not the case that the Secretary of State has no one to blame for today's events other than himself and his Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth)? These events have been brought about by his endeavours to thrust upon the health boards in Scotland his alien doctrines. Is it not also the case that what he is proposing has no support among the people in Scotland, and that public opinion stands four square behind those who are taking action to protect the NHS which he and his hon. Friends seem hell-bent on destroying?

Mr. Rifkind: As competitive tendering in England has already resulted in the transfer of over £100 million to patient care in the NHS, why the hon. Gentleman should oppose comparable benefits for patients in Scotland he has yet to explain. The House and the people of Scotland will have heard the hon. Member say that the Labour party stands four square with those whose actions today are resulting in the postponement and cancellation of much-needed operations. They will pay attention to the comments of the Opposition in future.

Mr. Harry Ewing: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No, I will take it after the private notice question.

VAT (European Court Ruling)

3.31 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South) (by private notice): To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement concerning the decision of the European Court of Justice to require the Government of the United Kingdom to impose value added tax on certain categories of spectacles.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Lilley): As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) yesterday, this ruling arises from the EC sixth directive on VAT, which was adopted in 1977. The Government will abide by the court's decision, but we need to study the judgment in detail—and consult interested trade bodies—before we can make any firm decisions about how to proceed. The United Kingdom has a treaty obligation to implement rulings from the European Court. Any amendment to United Kingdom law imposing taxation would have to be proposed to, and approved by, the House of Commons.

I want to make it clear that the court's decision has nothing whatever to do with the European Commission's proposals for the approximation of VAT rates. These are no more than proposals, and would require new legislation which could be adopted only with the unanimous consent of all member states. The Government have made it abundantly clear that we could not consent to proposals which deprived us of our right to apply zero rates.

Nor does this case have any bearing on the current infraction proceedings taken by the European Commission against the United Kingdom's zero rating of construction services, fuel and power and certain other goods. This concerns a different article of the sixth directive. The legal arguments are entirely different.

Mr. Spearing: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that this is the first occasion in over 300 years that any person or body has imposed a view on this House or the British Government concerning the taxation of our people? Therefore, are not this judgment and any resulting proposals of the Government of more constitutional importance than of health or financial importance, important though they be?

Secondly, in his answer yesterday in columns 140 and 141, the Minister said, as he has now, that the Government will ask the House to pass such legislation, even though it is against the will of both the Government and maybe of the House. If Parliament decides not to pass such legislation, it will be in breach of the treaty. What primary legislation will the House need to amend in order to avoid such an imposition?

Finally, the Minister may be correct in saying that the case that is pending on fuel and industrial building has no connection with the legal arguments, but does he agree that stemming from the sixth directive, the primary legislation and powers for such imposition also exist for those matters?

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Gentleman is correct to say that this raises constitutional issues, but he is not correct to say that it is unprecedented. He will recall that on an earlier occasion the British Government was obliged under the treaty of Rome, and as a result of a court ruling, to alter the balance of taxation between beer, wine and spirits. We are restricted in the laws that we can pass by the rulings that we have agreed with our partners in Europe.

The hon. Gentleman asked what primary legislation would have to be changed to free us from our obligations to enforce the rulings of the European Court. That would, of course, infringe the treaty of accession. Article 171 of the treaty of Rome requires us to adopt the rulings of the European Court of Justice.

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): Clearly, Britain must stand by its treaty obligations. However, if a court in this country makes a ruling on the scope of VAT which the House wishes to change, we have the power to do that. What mechanism exists for making such a change in the circumstances that my hon. Friend has outlined?

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend is right to point out that the British Parliament can overrule decisions of British courts. If we wished to change decisions of European courts made under European directives, we should have to obtain the consent of our partners.

Mr. Ronnie Fearn (Southport): My concern is for the poorer people who claim benefit in our community. May we have an assurance that the extra charges that they will now have to foot will be met by extra allowances? Can the voucher system be revised so that that is catered for too?

Mr. Lilley: I can reassure the hon. Gentleman that the poorer members of society are already eligible to receive vouchers for spectacles. Of course, they receive hearing aids free if there is medical need for them. Consequently, they will not be affected by the decision in any way.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Now that the Commission has found and taken advantage of this back-door method of obliging the British Parliament to impose taxes that it does not want to impose, will my hon. Friend say whether we shall be obliged to levy VAT on gas, electricity, water, sewerage, protective clothing and footwear for industry and all new industrial and commercial buildings, at an estimated cost of £350 million a year, if the European Court makes a similar judgment in a few weeks' time?

Will my hon. Friend urge his legal colleagues to look into the Government's constant assertion that we have a long-time right of veto? Is it not true that under the Single European Act that right of veto lasts until 1992? If by that time we have not agreed to a uniform, harmonised method of VAT, the Commission will be perfectly entitled to go to the court and require us to impose VAT across the board because we have not fulfilled the conditions of the Single European Act.

Mr. Lilley: On the last point, I can reassure my hon. Friend, who has fought an honourable and long battle against the legal basis on which this decision has been taken, that there is no question of our freedom to impose zero rates being time-limited by 1992, or any other date.

I cannot agree with my hon. Friend that this ruling is a back-door method. It was carried out in open court, and the European Court considered the matter over a long period in a perfectly formal and normal way. Just as in this country our courts have to interpret the detailed application of our laws, in Europe the European Court of Justice has the responsibility for interpreting the detailed application of EC directives.

There is no question of this ruling having a direct bearing on the entirely separate infraction case which is currently before the court and which has to do with zero rates on the goods and services that my hon. Friend listed. We still await that judgment. We have argued the United Kingdom's case vigorously and it will be some months before we know the court's ruling. The case will be separate and distinct, based on separate legal arguments and coming under a different part of the directive. Whatever ruling the court reaches, we have an obligation to enforce it in Britain. My hon. Friend is correct in that respect.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): This is a test case which clearly establishes the supremacy of the European Court and European institutions over this sovereign Parliament, or what was a sovereign Parliament. Is not the Minister's reaction wholly inappropriate? He is trying to pretend that this is not a major judgment and a major change in our expectations. Ought he not now to be looking at the treaty of accession and the European Communities Act 1972 under which we consented to join the European Community so that he can identify amendments which would give us a remedy for external tax impositions?

Mr. Lilley: I am sure that the powers exercised by the European Court came as no surprise to the right hon. Member, who during the referendum warned, as he saw it, the country against accepting these powers. He is right to say that fundamental changes amounting to an ending of our membership of the European Community would be required to exempt us from the powers of the European Court when interpreting the laws of the European Community.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Will my hon. Friend dismiss with contempt the hysteria of the last of the anti-EEC Mohicans who remain the the Chamber? Has he seen the remarkable leader in today's Evening Standard, which is not known for its passionate European views, which states:

"Britain has much to gain and nothing to lose from bringing her indirect taxes into line with Europe."?

Mr. Lilley: I read most of the newspapers, but I have not read the Evening Standard today, so I will not comment on that article.

I shall not dismiss with contempt the views of my right hon. and hon. Friends or of Opposition Members who have honourably opposed our membership of the European Community. They are free to do so. They have rightly drawn attention to the fact that some of the consequences of our membership are displayed in this ruling.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): Will the Minister place in the Library a copy of the arguments that were deployed before the European Court of Justice, so that we can see whether there is any truth in the reports in some papers that the problem lies with the way in which the Government have reduced support for the National Health Service in the provision of spectacles so that spectacles were no longer regarded as being provided in the NHS but as medical supplies which the public were able to buy?

Mr. Lilley: I am happy to place in the Library the ruling of the European Court, and the hon. Gentleman will see that his allegations are entirely without foundation. The matter is not even mentioned in the ruling by the court.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): I congratulate my hon. Friend on quoting the precedent of the cider and beer tax ruling as against wine, and remind him that the whole point of the Government's response was that, instead of increasing the tax on beer and cider, they agreed to a loss of revenue by decreasing the tax on wine. On that precedent, which he voluntarily quoted, will he now do away with any National Health Service charges for spectacles and testing which would be subject to VAT under this direction, on the exact precedent which he has quoted?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend will be pleased to be reminded that people who are in receipt of vouchers, who constitute about one quarter of those for whom spectacles are prescribed and dispensed, will not be affected by the ruling in any way, so there is no reason to do as he suggests.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): As the Minister seemed to approve the suggestion that the Government's attitude is supported by one newspaper, can he give us an absolute assurance that we shall not have, by any similar method, the imposition of VAT on books or newspapers?

Mr. Lilley: I can give the right hon. Gentleman the assurance that I did not place any weight on the newspaper article, which I had not read. In so far as the right hon. Gentleman's question concerns matters which are properly for the judgment of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I shall leave it to him.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Although it may be implied from his answer, will my hon. Friend reinforce the Prime Minister's assurance that VAT will not be placed on food?

Mr. Lilley: I can certainly assure my hon. Friend to that effect. It is in no way connected to our right to retain zero rating on all such goods and services, including food, as we promised at the election.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Minister confirm that our obligations under the treaty of Rome restrict the rights of the United Kingdom Parliament? Therefore, is not the Government's only option to introduce legislation into the House of Commons to repeal section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972? That Act places on the United Kingdom the obligation of imposing additional value added tax and other charges. Is it not important that the Government introduce appropriate legislation? As the Minister said, the charge is not unprecedented. It is irrelevant whether legal arguments are different. Other charges in the pipeline are to be imposed by the Common Market on our country. The majority of people are determined that we should leave the Common Market in the not-too-distant future.

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Gentleman is probably right to point to the legislative route that will be necessary to undo the ruling. I remind him that the directive that is now being implemented and determined by the European Court of Justice was unanimously adopted by member states of the EEC in 1977, and therefore was wholeheartedly supported by the Labour Government of the day.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my hon. Friend agree that the rhetoric of Opposition Members is empty and vacuous? They have failed to take account of the point that my hon. Friend has just made. In 1977, they failed to exercise the veto that led to the requirement being imposed upon Parliament. Will he reiterate the point that the Government have not the slightest intention of adopting a provision of the kind that was put up by Lord Cockfield in the Commission, which is unaccountable and unelected?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend is quite right. We have no intention of accepting proposals that would deprive us of the right to retain zero rates. He was right also to point out to the House the contradiction in Opposition Members' views. They originally supported the directive, the consequences of which they now oppose.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Does the Economic Secretary agree with the view that was recently expressed by Lord Cockfield to the Select Committee, to the effect that no member state of the EEC has the right to veto the introduction of VAT within that member state, but has a right only in respect of the rate of VAT charged?

Mr. Lilley: Lord Cockfield pointed out to the Committee that the treaty states that member states shall unanimously agree such measures as they consider necessary to bring about an internal market. Whether it is necessary in order to achieve that desirable end to approximate taxes is open to dispute. We dispute that it is necessary, and we shall certainly not give our support to proposals which we cannot accept.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Will my hon. Friend confirm that nothing in the judgment affects the Chancellor's right to decide at what level VAT shall be levied on any item? Therefore, there is absolutely no need for anybody to panic and think that spectacles will cost 15 per cent. more.

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend is correct. Spectacles and the other goods concerned already bear VAT up to but not including the retail distribution point. Therefore, the effect of the judgment is to require Britain to extend VAT to the retail margin. The National Association of Optometrists calculates that, at most, it will involve increasing the sale price of spectacles by 3 to 4 per cent. Of course, it is open to retailers to absorb the costs.

I remind the House that since we abolished the opticians' monopoly, the cost of spectacles to the final consumer has gone down by considerably more than that amount — [Interruption.] It is rich of Opposition Members to criticise our abolition of that monopoly when our action has reduced prices by more than the potential increase that we are discussing.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): Does not the Minister appreciate that the Government's way out of this practical difficulty is to supply corrective spectacles free of charge, as VAT would then not be leviable, whatever decision the European Court reached? Does not this incident underline the great importance of being careful about entering into obligations? Will he give an absolute guarantee to the House that the Government will veto all the proposals for VAT harmonisation?

Mr. Lilley: The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows full well that vouchers are available to those on supplementary benefit, family income supplement, children under 16, and students under 19 in full-time study. There is no problem with respect to those people.

However, I was interested—and I think that all hon. Members were interested—to hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman's implied slur on the previous Labour Government when he stressed the need to take great care when accepting obligations of this kind. I believe that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was a member of the Cabinet which entered into the obligations, the consequences of which we are now seeing. Is he saying that that Cabinet did not take due care?

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have noted the hon. Members who have not been called. I am sure that we will return to this matter on other occasions and I will bear those hon. Members in mind. We have an important debate today during which many of these matters may be canvassed.

Points of Order

3.51 pm

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that yesterday I raised a point of order about the Prime Minister's reply to my question. The Prime Minister stated that the contract between the South of Scotland electricity board and British Coal would come to an end on 31 March this year.

I understand that you, Mr. Speaker, have the discretion, in a matter of major public interest, to waive or moderate the sub judice rule. However, as I understood it, it was not on those grounds that you ruled that the Prime Minister was in order. I wonder whether you have had the chance to look more closely at this matter. I believe that papers were lodged with the Court of Session earlier this week. Can you advise the House on whether you can expand, amend or clarify the ruling?

Mr. Speaker: I have kept in close touch with these matters. I am informed that there has been no change since yesterday and that the matter is not yet fully before the court.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that I raised this issue with you yesterday and my comments are reported in column 163 of the Official Report. You said in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) that you believed that the matter was not sub judice.

I believe that I gave you a copy of a press release from British Coal which states that legal action was taking place after papers were lodged with the Court of Session in Edinburgh on Monday. I am rather puzzled by your ruling that the matter was not sub judice when the Prime Minister spoke on this matter yesterday.

As I said in my point of order yesterday, a dangerous precedent has been established because the Prime Minister advanced a case from the Dispatch Box which the South of Scotland electricity board's lawyer will be making in the courts. It is very damaging for a counsel to be able to present in evidence to the court a statement made by the Prime Minister.

Of course, I took the issue further than that in my point of order. I suggested that, although you had been adopting the practice of not taking points of order until after questions, there was a classic example yesterday of a situation where the Prime Minister should not have been allowed to get away with it as the issue was already before the courts.

I know that you, Mr. Speaker, are giving this matter fair consideration according to the procedures and past practices. However, in the light of what I have submitted to you in writing, the Prime Minister was clearly in the wrong to quote the brief from the SSEB when we know that the papers were already lodged with the court. I ask you, Sir, to give the matter due consideration.

Mr. Speaker: On the second part of the hon. Gentleman's comments, may I say that what he said yesterday and again today is not a matter of order, but concerns whether the Prime Minister gave the right answer. That cannot be a point of order; it is a matter of argument. I believe—I hope that the House will agree—that it is not right that points of order should be used as a vehicle to carry on Question Time. I am, of course, giving careful consideration to the matter.

I can only rule that a matter is sub judice when a date has been set by a court. No date has yet been set and I am informed that the situation has not changed since yesterday.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Further to that important point of order, Mr. Speaker. Mine may be considered a niggling point and I accept that. When I sought to raise a point of order with you at 3.30 pm, you told me that you would take points of order after the private notice question. My point of order has now changed. The purpose of taking points of order after other matters has succeeded today because the Member to whom I wanted to refer in my point of order has left the Chamber. Because I respect and agree with the procedures of the House, I will not now raise that point of order. However, that makes it much more important that you now consider the time at which points of order are taken.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the point of order that he was going to raise about a Minister's answer had anything to do with order?

Mr. Ewing: Yes, it had.

Mr. Speaker: It had not. The hon. Gentleman has said that his point of order concerned a Minister who has left the Chamber. Clearly, by definition, the hon. Gentleman was raising not a point of order, but a point of argument that he had with the Minister.

Mr. Ewing: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In a sense you are provoking me and I am surprised at you. To clear any doubts from your mind, may I say that I was not going to refer to a Minister or a ministerial answer, but wished to raise, as a matter for explanation, your selection of questioners. One hon. Member was called three times during Scottish Question Time, and I was about to inquire whether you kept calling him in the hope that eventually he would have something sensible to say.

Mr. Speaker: That is a perfectly legitimate point of order and one which I would gladly have fielded.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday I raised with you the refusal, last Thursday, of a Home Office Minister to answer questions from eight hon. Members on the ground that the matter was sub judice. Yesterday you were kind enough to make a ruling that, as far as the rules of the House were concerned, the matter is not sub judice. As we have the pleasure of the company of the Minister today, I wonder whether you would be kind enough to repeat that ruling, as I understand that his Department is still declining to answer questions on the sub judice ground. Perhaps you would make it clear to him, Mr. Speaker, that the sub judice rule is not something behind which Ministers who are unwilling to face questions from hon. Members, should shelter.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that that point has been heard. I draw attention to my comments in yesterday's Hansard.

Security Services (Parliamentary Scrutiny)

3.59 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to ensure effective Parliamentary scrutiny of the security services.

It is not part of my argument that there is no necessity for the security services. Even without large-scale terrorism and attempted spying by foreign powers, there would remain the need to provide protection for the state and its citizens. However, it is necessary to have complete confidence that the security services carry out their duties in a completely politically impartial manner. Indeed, they are required to do so by the Maxwell-Fyfe directive published in 1952. Paragraph 4 of that directive states:

"It is essential that the security service should be kept absolutely free from any political bias or influence and nothing should be done that might lend colour to any suggestion that it is concerned with the interests of any particular section of the community or with any other matter than the Defence of the Realm as a whole."

As it has been questioned that such political impartiality has always operated, the security agencies have become the subject of controversy. Those doubts existed before Wright's book. In my view, and in the opinion of my right hon. and hon. Friends, there should be a full judicial inquiry into Wright's statement that MI5 officers, including himself, were involved in the attempted destabilisation of the Labour Government in the mid-1970s. The sooner such an inquiry takes place, the better.

At the moment, there is no meaningful parliamentary accountability for the security services. Ministers are not willing to answer questions that relate to security services, therefore such questions cannot be tabled in the first place. Unlike what occurs in some other democracies, no one could argue that Parliament has any real say in these matters.

In many respects the security services are a law unto themselves. Certainly their intrusion into civil liberties must concern all those who value our democratic rights. For instance, there were the disclosures of a former employee of MI5, Miss Cathy Massiter, who resigned in protest at the work she was asked to undertake. I shall give an illustration of the sort of work which led to her decision to leave MI5. She told us publicly that anyone who was on the national executive of the National Council for Civil Liberties, who worked for that organisation, or who was an active member to the degree of being a branch secretary, would be placed on permanent record, and routine inquiries were instituted to identify such people and police help was sought.

It is no use putting a question to the Home Secretary about that. He simply would say that he was not in a position to comment either way. Are such routine inquiries still being made into the National Council for Civil Liberties? Is that a wise and correct way of spending public money?

My hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman), prior to coming to the House, was the legal officer for the National Council for Civil Liberties. There is, we are told by Miss Massiter, an MI5 file on her. Presumably there is a file on her because she was a full-time employee of the National Council for Civil Liberties. As I asked on a previous occasion, was my hon. Friend considered to be a subversive? Was she out to overthrow parliamentary democracy? Is that the proper way in which public money and time should be spent? Did the Prime Minister or the Home Secretary know that files were being kept on such people? Labour Members would be happy if all Conservative Members were as committed to parliamentary democracy and civil and democratic liberties as my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham.

What happened with the NCCL also occurred with CND, yet successive Tory Ministers have told us that campaigning for nuclear disarmament is perfectly legitimate. If that is the case, when a former editor of the CND journal resigned after some disagreement in the organisation, why was he asked questions by the special branch about the private lives of leading officials of CND? Why was he asked about the leadership style of the general secretary of CND? Why was he asked about who lived with whom and who was active in the organisation? That smacks more of a police dictatorship than a parliamentary democracy.

All that criticism does not come only from one side of the House. May I remind the House that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath)—he should know about such matters because as former Prime Minister he was head of the security services—in the debate on the Official Secrets Act only last month gave us an illustration of some people employed in the security services. If they saw someone on the tube reading the Daily Mirror their reaction would be to say, "Get after him, that is dangerous. We must find out where he bought it." I should like to know how many other such people are employed in the security services? How many Wrights are there who cannot make a decision between legitimate dissent and genuine subversion?

Miss Massiter deserves public credit for the manner in which, as an employee of MI5, she came to the conclusion that she could not carry out the work asked of her, and in my view she did the honourable thing and resigned and made her views known publicly.

We know from her disclosures about MI5 that there is a branch F which is subdivided. F2 investigates trade unions, F7 looks into teachers, lawyers and journalists, and F4 apparently puts agents into organisations. There does not seem to be any F grouping that looks into the City, the stock exchange or multinational companies.

We need to be sure that those who hold responsibility in the security services can and do make a distinction between mainstream legitimate dissent and a few extremist groups such as the National Front, and other Fascist or racist organisations or ultra-revolutionary groups. Can anyone believe that when Wright was holding a senior position in the security services he was capable of making such a distinction? How many other such officials remain employed in the security services?

The time has come for parliamentary accountability, in my view by way of a Select Committee. In that way the security services would no longer be a law unto themselves. I see no reason why a Select Committee should not be set up. I also see no reason why those Conservative Members who state that they are in favour of parliamentary democracy should be opposed to any such committee being established. Those who are given the task of combating subversion and defending our democracy must be accountable for their actions.

As long as the security services are the subject of the controversies that I mentioned today, that is not useful for their own good or for their image. I imagine that there must be a number of people employed in the security services who believe that we should have such parliamentary accountability as exists in a number of other western democracies.

The only change that has come about in the past few months has been the appointment of Sir Philip Woodfield as staff counsellor to the security services. I and a number of my hon. Friends wrote to Sir Philip Woodfield and asked him if he would have a meeting with us. We were asking only that the newly appointed adviser to the security services should have a meeting with Members of Parliament. I received a courteous reply, but the answer was no.

For all those reasons, I believe that I should be given permission to bring in my Bill, and that the reforms and changes for which I have argued should be carried out.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Who will prepare and bring in the Bill?

Mr. Winnick: It is unanimous. I believe that the Select Committee should be established in the very near future——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has made his speech. Who will prepare and bring in the Bill?

Mr. Winnick: I was going to say that the whole House——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Who will prepare and bring in the Bill?

Mr. Winnick: A distinguished list, Mr. Speaker.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Winnick, Mr. Peter Archer, Mr. Andrew F. Bennett, Mr. George J. Buckley, Mr. Tam Dalyell, Mr. Michael Foot, Dr. John Gilbert, Ms. Harriet Harman, Mr. Eric S. Heffer, Mr. Max Madden, Mr. Chris Mullin and Ms. Marjorie Mowlam.

Mr. Speaker: Second Reading what day?

Mr. Winnick: Unless there is a Select Committee then, 29 April.

Mr. David Winnick accordingly presented a Bill to ensure effective Parliamentary scrutiny of the security services: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 29 April and to be printed. [Bill 100.]

Public Expenditure

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

4.10 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Major): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the White Paper on the Government's Expenditure Plans for 1988-89 to 1990-91 (Cm. 288—I and II).

The broad lines of policy on public expenditure were announced last November in the Autumn Statement and were debated in the House last month. That debate enabled the House to consider the trends in public expenditure and the way in which priorities had changed between programmes. The public expenditure White Paper before us today builds on that and provides a more comprehensive account of what the Government are spending, the service that they are delivering, and their efforts to secure even greater value for money. What the White Paper does not provide is a new statement of policy. I suspect that that was not fully appreciated last month when many people affected to be disappointed that it did not contain fresh expenditure plans. Frankly, it would have been extraordinary if it had, only weeks after our plans were announced in the Autumn Statement.

The public finance cycle is clear. It begins with the Budget and the medium-term financial strategy in the spring. That sets out our taxation and borrowing policies. It continues with the public expenditure survey to determine future spending plans. These are set out in broad terms in the Autumn Statement. It concludes with the public expenditure White Paper, followed by this debate, which provides an opportunity to consider the Government's management of taxpayers' money. We are helped in this by the report from the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, which makes a number of interesting observations and recommendations. The Government will respond to these as soon as possible, and I shall refer to a number of them shortly.

It is crystal clear that the strength of public finances has created the conditions for a sound economy, and that the soundness of that economy has fed back to the public finances. The crisis so lovingly and frequently predicted by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has failed to arrive yet again. Like Bunter's postal order, that crisis is forever in the post. In reality, rising real incomes and corporate profits are boosting the revenue side of the account.

But a growing economy also brings benefits for expenditure, and that is perhaps less well understood. Nationalised industries are producing better results—for example, the rising profits of British Steel and the increasing passenger revenues of British Rail. Falling unemployment is reducing the growth of social security spending and a buoyant economy is enabling central Government, local authorities and new towns to step up their disposals of surplus assets. These are a combination of changes that few people would have predicted accurately a few years ago.

The lower borrowing that has resulted from these changes is reducing the costs of servicing the national debt. Debt interest has now fallen from its peak of 5¼ per cent. of GDP in 1981-82 to about 4¼ per cent. this year. We expect it to fall still further, and this will enable us to speed more on priority programmes. It is worth putting that in context. If the PSBR had remained at its 1978-79 share of GDP, cumulative borrowing would by now be about £80 billion higher, with increased debt servicing costs of about £8 billion a year. That would be the equivalent of an extra 7p on the standard rate of income tax, just to finance the debt. None of that extra revenue would have gone on education, social security or health; it would all have gone to our creditors. That would have been the result of the policies that the Opposition still cling to with such hidebound affection.

We are in the fortunate position that we have dumped those policies. That is one of the principal reasons why our economic performance is so strong, but it will stay that way only if we continue with the policies that brought us to this point in the first place. I offer the House the assurance that that is precisely what we propose to do.

In the survey of public spending conducted last year, we added £4·5 billion to the planned programme expenditure in 1988-89 and £6 billion in 1989-90, while, at the same time, thanks to a growing economy, still reducing public spending as a proportion of national income. That proportion has already fallen from 43 per cent. when we took office to 42 per cent. now, which is a decrease of more than 4 per cent. from the peak to which it rose in 1982-83.

But that has not meant cuts, because national income has risen over the past eight years by 19 per cent. The proportion of spending to GDP is set to fall further, to 41 per cent. by 1990-91. But with a growing economy that further fall does not mean cuts either. This is in stark contrast to the rising share of national income absorbed each year by public spending in the 1960s and 1970s and it is a welcome contrast, indeed, for taxpayers.

The plans contained in this White Paper show that, within the constraint that we have set ourselves, we have been able to strengthen priority services, such as health, law and order, education, defence and the inner cities.

In its report, the Select Committee has raised some important issues which need to be addressed on the Health Service, and I shall respond to these, but let me first put the position in proper context. Measured in all sorts of ways, the National Health Service is not in crisis but is expanding, improving and becoming more efficient, as the programme of cost improvements has clearly demonstrated. Indicators of health show significant improvements in life expectancy in recent years — I should have thought that this was a good output measure —and large reductions in deaths from a wide range of conditions, and indicators of the number of treatments show large increases in patients treated, whether as in-patients, out-patients, or day-patients. Since 1978 the output of the hospitals service has increased by over 20 per cent. or about 2·5 per cent. a year, and treatments are now being widely offered that barely existed a decade ago. I suspect that little of this would have occurred if the Government had not provided increasing resources. But we have.

Total spending on the Health Service has risen by 32 per cent. more than inflation. It has risen, too, as a proportion of public spending, and will continue to do so. It has risen as a proportion of national income. Gross capital spending, which was cut very savagely indeed by the Opposition when in government, has increased by 42 per cent. in real terms, helped partly by rising capital receipts.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): The Chief Secretary has described an optimistic picture of the Health Service, yet in counties such as mine five hospitals are about to close largely because of the non-funding of the nurses' wage award. Given the change in circumstances since the White Paper was originally drawn up, and as it appears that more money is available now than the Government believed was available then, will the Chief Secretary confirm that the Government could absorb the entirety of the wage awards without throwing their strategy off course?

Mr. Major: My remarks were not optimistic so much as realistic. They were a factual assertion, and nothing in what I said is not clearly and demonstrably fact. I shall turn to the hon. Gentleman's second point in a few moments, if he will be patient.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): If it were true that the Labour party was the party that cared about the Health Service, and if ours did not care, how is it that we are spending a higher proportion of total public expenditure and a higher proportion of GDP on the NHS than did the Labour party, which claims to care so much about the NHS?

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend has made a telling point. Indeed, I would not adequately be able to explain that point if I were a Member of the Opposition. Perhaps part of the explanation—nobody doubts that the Opposition care—lies in competence and in the fact that, with the reducing level of national debt, we have a far smaller deadweight cost in interest on that national debt. That absolutely reinforces the policies that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has followed in recent years.

In one of the most crucial areas of the National Health Service, the hospital and community health services, which are of great concern at the moment to many hon. Members, and to many beyond the House, current expenditure will have increased in 1987-88 by around 10 per cent.—well over twice the rate of inflation in the economy generally, and, what is more, faster than any measure of rising prices in the health sector specifically.

If one allows for that and also for the benefit of the cost-improvement programme,

"the margin available for service development" will have increased by nearly 3 per cent., comfortably ahead of even the most pessimistic estimate of demographic pressures. Therefore, it rapidly becomes evident that current difficulties faced in the Health Service are not simply questions of funding; and funding alone will not solve those difficulties.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside) rose—

Mr. Major: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I shall give way in a few moments.

The Government have recognised that there are important issues to be examined. We must consider whether there are other ways of delivering health care which meet people's expectations. In doing so, I offer the assurance that we propose to preserve the principle that a high standard of health care must be available for all regardless of means. That principle is not at risk in the fundamental review of the management and funding of health care in this country that we have set in hand.

As well as those fundamental issues, the Select Committee was particularly concerned in its report at the uncertainty faced by health authorities, which have to plan their budgets before the review body recommendations are finalised and before consequent decisions on funding are known.

I understand and sympathise with that concern and with the dilemma facing health authorities. The Government have examined the problem to see whether there is a way of resolving it without abdicating responsibility for the control of public expenditure. We are not prepared to commit ourselves in advance to accepting review body recommendations unreservedly or to funding resulting awards in full — nor should or would any responsible Government. Those decisions can be made only when the recommendations have been received and studied.

However, what we can and will do is remove this uncertainty for health authorities in the future. Therefore, we have decided in future years to bring forward the timetable for the review body reports, so that decisions can be made on them well before the beginning of the financial year. We hope that review bodies will be able to submit their reports in time for decisions on them by the end of January or, at the latest, by mid-February.

Mr. Barry Jones rose—

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): I welcome enthusiastically my right hon. Friend's statement, which will make great improvements in the future. However, for this year, can he give any information of the date by which a decision is likely to be made, so that health authorities need not make premature decisions on the issues that he has mentioned?

Mr. Major: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his welcome, especially in his capacity as Chairman of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. I shall turn to the specific point that he mentioned in just a second.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Will my right hon. Friend accept that this statesmanlike decision will be widely welcomed, because one problem facing all health authorities is that of making their spending decisions before pay awards? Because of the special problems that face them this year, can the Government find their way clear to say that they will fund, for this one year until the new scheme comes in, the pay award that they agree—I repeat that they agree?

Mr. Major: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his welcome. I shall deal with the position this year in a few moments.

Mr. Barry Jones rose—

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Before my right hon. Friend leaves that point, may I ask whether he is aware that some of us find the implication of what I think he said a little disappointing? It appears that we are to continue indefinitely to face a system of national monolithic pay bargaining and rate setting. Will my right hon. Friend concede that at least as part of the review that is taking place we should look at decentralising decision-making within the Health Service, and at greater flexibility in pay-setting in order to recognise the great variety of regional requirements, and skill and specialist requirements?

Mr. Major: I understand what my hon. Friend has in mind, part of which is being considered by the review body this year.

Mr. Barry Jones rose——

Mr. Major: I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Barry Jones: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way at last. In his intervention, my hon. Friend the Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) made an important point about Wales. None of us know of any health authority in Wales which, in our judgment, is anything other than underfunded. I advise the right hon. Gentleman that Opposition Members met his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales last month to tell him of our deep concern because we are certain that soon, if not now, the Secretary of State for Wales is to make a case to the right hon. Gentleman and to the Treasury for more funds for the Welsh Health Service. When the right hon. Gentleman receives that demand, will he please give it a fair wind?

Mr. Major: I certainly cannot prejudge any comments that may or may not come to me from my right hon. Friend. However, I advise the hon. Gentleman that I would consider with great care anything coming from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

I should make it clear that the new timetable will affect the reports of all the review bodies — the Nurses and Midwives Pay Review Body, the Doctors and Dentists Pay Review Body, the Armed Forces Pay Review Body and the Top Salaries Review Body. It will mean, in particular— I hope that the House will welcome this — that the outcome of salary awards will be known to Health Service treasurers before they finalise their budgets for the coming year. I hope and believe that that will remove a great deal of uncertainty for them in each future year.

We cannot, at this late stage, bring this year's reports on to this timetable, but we propose to try to minimise the period of uncertainty. In particular, it would be difficult to press the review body for nurses to hasten its report, because this year, as the House knows, it is considering a number of important and complex issues, including a new clinical grading structure. This seeks to reward skill and responsibility and to give better pay and career prospects to those nurses who choose to stay in areas of direct patient care, rather than move into administration. This meets precisely the point that so many Health Service professionals have drawn attention to in recent weeks. The review body will also be looking at special pay differentials needed to cope with localised recruitment difficulties— many hon. Members may also welcome that.

As I have said, we wish to minimise the period of uncertainty this year. Yesterday my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister reminded the House that last year the Government received all the reports of the review bodies between 1 and 14 April and announced all decisions on implementation and on funding by 23 April. She stressed that if, as we expect, the reports come in at a similar time this year, the Government will, for their part, be equally swift in announcing their decisions. We hope, therefore, to be in a position to announce firm decisions no later than the end of April.

In short, the position is as follows: first, we are carrying out a fundamental review of the management and financing of health care; secondly, the timetable for future review body reports will be brought forward so that the Government can announce their decisions well before health authorities finalise their budgets; and, thirdly, we hope that this year we will be able to announce our decisions on the review body recommendations and the financing of them no later than the end of April.

Decisions on review body pay in the Health Service are therefore only a matter of weeks away. As I have said, we hope to be in a position to announce our decisions by the end of the first month of the forthcoming financial year. In my judgment, it would be premature and unacceptable, therefore, to put into effect service reductions on the grounds of uncertainty. Moreover, the concerns of nurses, over the level of their pay, the structure of their pay and their career prospects, are all being comprehensively and speedily addressed, and the results will soon be known.

In the light of those assurances, there is one further point that I wish to add. In recent weeks only a small minority of nurses have decided to take part in industrial action. I hope that that minority will now realise that the strikes in the Health Service are unnecessary and damaging to the very service that they care about. If they continue, public and patients will draw the conclusion that the motives for such action cannot wholly lie in genuine concern for the Health Service or the pay and conditions of those who work within it. The action in Scotland today in unnecessary, pointless and damaging to patients, and it will not affect the Government's judgment on how to deal with that issue.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Does my right hon. Friend appreciate that the Opposition have claimed to support the so-called action in Scotland today, that it is a strike organised by the National Union of Public Employees to try to keep up its role of resisting competitive tendering, and that it has nothing to do with patient care or funding for the Health Service, but is increasing waiting lists, cancelling operations and making a sham of any claim that the Opposition may have to care for patients in Scotland?

Mr. Major: My hon. and learned Friend makes a pertinent point extremely well. Patient care is being damaged in Scotland today and operations are being postponed. It is extraordinary that that action should have the support of Opposition Members, who in recent weeks have accused the Government of not caring about the Health Service.

The requirement to test the efficiency of domestic and catering services by competitive tendering has released over £100 million for patient care in England in recent years. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Government are determined to ensure that that happens in Scotland as well.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Does the Chief Secretary agree that his much-trumpeted announcement has committed not a penny of extra money to the NHS? Does he accept that it is a wholly inadequate response to the immediate problems that are faced by health authorities, and that, without the commitment of extra money, he will do nothing to allay the uncertainties of health authorities, which are now having to discuss whether to close wards and cancel operations? Will he end the uncertainty today by giving an assurance that he will accept in full the nurses' and ancillary workers' pay award, and that he will fund that award in full? Will he give us those assurances to end the uncertainty?

Mr. Major: I detect the tang of sour grapes in that intervention. The hon. Gentleman clearly does not realise that the central part of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee's report asked the Government to deal with that uncertainty, and that is precisely what we have done. I have already answered the second part of what the hon. Gentleman said. As to the much-trumpeting of the statement, the fact is that it was trumpeted to no one at any stage at any time, and the hon. Gentleman looked as surprised as anybody else.

Mr. Brown: Will the Chief Secretary answer the central part of my question? Will he end the uncertainty facing health authorities by agreeing that he will accept in full the nurses' pay award, and that he will fund it in full?

Mr. Major: If the hon. Gentleman reads Hansard, he will discover that I dealt quite specifically and in detail with that point when, clearly, he dozed off a few moments ago. I trust that the hon. Gentleman will be more accurate when he makes his speech later than he has been about what I have said in the past few moments.

Mr. Brown: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the question? Will he accept in full the recommendation of the nurses pay review body, and will he fund it in full?

Mr. Major: I have no intention of repeating what I said before simply to pander to the inadequacies of the hon. Gentleman's attention a few moments ago.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Do not those interventions demonstrate clearly that the Opposition are incapable of understanding the facts about the NHS even when they are told them repeatedly, and seem incapable of understanding that the NHS will receive more money next year—£1·1 billion more; the largest cash increase ever? That increase alone is larger than the budget of the Department of Trade and Industry. Can we send all Opposition Members a large postcard with those facts on it so that they can read it at their leisure?

Mr. Major: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Judged by the inaccuracies of documents that the Opposition have recently published about making Budget day NHS day, I doubt whether, even if they were given the facts, they would understand or use them accurately.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North) rose—

Mr. Major: I shall give way for the last time.

Dr. Reid: Is it not the case that in 1985 a suggested pay award of 8 per cent. for nurses was dealt with in two stages to reduce the effect to 5 per cent.? Is it not the case that in 1986, when the nurses were awarded almost 8 per cent., the Minister delayed it for three months to reduce it to 5·7 per cent.? Is it not the case that the only time that the Minister and the Government have made a full award to the nurses was last year, when there was a general election? Will the Minister pay the nurses in full this year—yes or no?

Mr. Major: Before the hon. Gentleman makes such ill-judged interventions, he would do well to acknowledge the fact that nurses today are infinitely better paid under this Government than they ever were under any previous Government.

Let me return to the industrial action. If such action continues, either generally or in Scotland specifically, it will not influence the Government's decision. We propose to proceed as I have described in the past few minutes. I reiterate the message that I first gave when the White Paper was published—there need be no expectation of a public expenditure package in the Budget.

In its report, the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee drew attention to a number of other points to which I wish briefly to refer. It recognised that the Autumn Statement is now the primary vehicle for announcing the main results of the survey and that, as a result, the White Paper has, to a considerable extent, been upstaged. The Committee's resulting suggestion that much of the material from volume 1 should be incorporated into the Autumn Statement is attractive and has a great deal to commend it. We shall therefore consider that carefully and sympatheticaly, despite the obvious technical problems that would need to be overcome. We shall certainly bear in mind the Committee's strong support for that proposal.

The Committee also suggested that volume 2—now over 400 pages of information—should be published as separate departmental booklets, as the Estimates are now. We shall consider that proposal sympathetically, along with the corresponding proposals that were made by the Public Accounts Committee last year.

I sense that parliamentary opinion is running in favour of such change. The Treasury is already investigating a number of possibilities, and as soon as that work is complete we shall put the proposals before Parliament.

If we change the way in which information is reported, there will be consequences for the way in which it is debated. One possibility would be for the broad lines of expenditure policy to be debated as part of the Autumn Statement, for Select Committees to consider the departmental booklets and for one or more of their reports to be chosen for debate in May or June. All that will need further consideration, which we shall give as speedily as possible.

The Select Committee also invited me, in its report, to set out the public expenditure effect of the agreement that has been reached on the future financing of the EC.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South) rose—

Mr. Major: With great respect, I did say that I had given way for the last time, and I must stick to that.

The agreement concludes a far-reaching review of the Community's finances and policies. It provides effective and legally binding controls on spending, effective measures to reduce agricultural surpluses, and the preservation of the United Kingdom abatement as agreed at Fontainebleau, and there is to be no oils and fats tax.

In so far as domestic public expenditure is concerned, the agreement is likely to increase our net payments to Community institutions by some £200 million to £300 million a year. This is compared with what would have happened with a continuation of the 1·4 per cent. VAT ceiling — the assumption that underlies the public expenditure White Paper. Compared with the effective level of spending in 1987, which was already in excess of the 1·4 per cent. VAT ceiling, the increase will be smaller, at around £100 million to £200 million a year. In response to the specific question of the Select Committee, I confirm that the extra expenditure will be met entirely from the reserve and will not involve reductions in agreed domestic programmes.

The timing of the future financing agreement means that the 1988 Community budget will not be adopted before the end of the current financial year, so the Community's emergency financing arrangments, known as provisional twelfths, will continue into 1988-89 rather than end in 1987-88, as assumed in the White Paper. This will increase our net payments to the Community in 1987-88 by about £240 million, mainly because our abatement in the first three months of 1988 is being made at the rate of the 1987, not the 1988, budget.

[Mr. Major]

When the 1988 budget has been adopted, however, perhaps in May, we shall benefit from a much higher abatement, and the increased abatement will be backdated to the beginning of January. This will reduce our net payments in 1988-89, compared to the figure in the White Paper, by the same amount as the increase in 1987-88—around £240 million. Thus, in 1988-89 itself, the effect of the future financing package on our net payments will be very broadly offset by the effect of the delay in the adoption of the 1988 budget.

I am acutely aware that the breadth of public expenditure is such that, in the interests of allowing as many hon. Members as possible to speak in the debate, I have not been able to mention many important matters. I have not had time to mention the extra £240 million a year that we have added to the plans for spending on science and technology. Nor have I mentioned the £1·5 billion addition to our plans for capital expenditure in each of the next two years. I have not mentioned the extra £630 million that we are providing for education. That is £270 million more, even after taking account of the amounts allowed for teachers' pay and academic restructuring.

I have not referred to the extra resources that we are devoting to the inner cities and to the increased resources that we are attracting into the inner cities through creating a partnership with the private sector. I suspect very strongly that those increases will not find a place in the speech that we are about to hear from the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), either.

Those public expenditure increases have been made possible only by the sound state of the public finances and the healthy condition of the economy. I confidently predict that the complete and abject failure of the Opposition to understand those simple truths will again be in evidence today. They seem to view the hard-won progress of recent years as a kind of windfall, just as I suppose they imagine that the economic failure that toppled them was sheer bad luck. If they do not understand why the economy is doing so well, the public do, as they have shown very clearly on three memorable occasions, in 1979, in 1983 and in 1987, and as I suspect they will do again at an unspecified future date.

The Opposition will again talk of cuts where there have been increases. They will air their obsession with pounds spent rather than output achieved, and this, surprisingly, despite the awful illustration of ILEA, which spends more and achieves less than any other education authority in the country. All those points that they will make are as familiar as they are flawed. The public are not fooled, and I trust that the House will not be fooled either.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"deplores the under-investment in areas vital to the future of Britain which results from the public expenditure plans; urges Her Majesty's Government to take additional action to reduce unemployment and to strengthen Britain's productive and competitive performance; condemns the Government's antipathy towards public expenditure on vital community services; and in particular calls on Her Majesty's Government to recognise the strength of the evidence to two Select Committees and from the health care professions that the National Health Service is inadequately resourced, and to make extra provision in the Budget to end the funding crisis faced by the National Health Service and hospitals in particular."

The Chief Secretary's speech was characteristically full of statistics and typically overflowing with input and output measures. It was complete with the statutory Tory Central Office references to the last Labour Government. It was completely oblivious to the £60,000 million windfall benefits of North sea oil that the Government have been lucky enough to enjoy. Not a penny in extra cash is being offered for any part of the National Health Service. No health authorities will be better off as a result of any announcement that the Chief Secretary has made.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I shall give way in a moment.

The Chief Secretary's speech leaves completely unanswered the main public expenditure question of concern to the whole nation—the underfunding of our National Health Service.

Mr. John Townend: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I shall give way in a moment.

If the economy is doing as well as the Chief Secretary says, if public finances are as sound as he tells us, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer is facing his Budget with unique opportunities available to him, why cannot the Goverment afford to respond to the British Medical Association, the Royal College of Nursing, the National Association of Health Authorities and the recommendations of two Select Committees, and offer proper and adequate funding to the Health Service?

This week, uniquely, 100 doctors and consultants in Ilford have placed an advertisement in their local newspaper, saying that they cannot guarantee that patients will be able to get the hospital treatment they deserve.

Mr. Fairbairn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I shall give way later.

In addition, new information has become available this week about the £5 million that is needed to employ the cardiologists that we need in our hospitals, the £25 million that is needed to keep open all the children's cancer wards, the £30 million that is needed to make available nationwide the cervical cancer screening service. This week, behind closed doors, many health authorities are wondering how they can budget for the future settlements next year. They are no wiser today about how far the Government are prepared to fund the nurses' pay settlement, the doctors' and dentists' pay settlement or the ancillary workers' pay settlement.

Mr. John Townend: If this matter is so vital to the nation, will the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) explain why only about 16 Labour Back Benchers are present? What will he say to my constituents in Bridlington who have waited 40 years for a new hospital to replace two old hospitals? They did not get that hospital under the last Labour Government because they cut the capital building programme, but they will get that hospital this year. It is opening in two weeks' time, after expansion of the budget provided by the Government.

Mr. Brown: I am glad that the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) has expressed the concern that is felt throughout the nation about hospitals, nurses and facilities that are needed. Perhaps the Chief Secretary will explain why, when faced with the underfunding problems of the Health Service, the Cabinet, last Thursday, should have issued an unprecedented pre-Budget statement. According to that statement, as a result of the cash crisis, the Government will not consider forgoing tax cuts in the Budget for the top people in the country, nor will they forgo changes in capital gains tax or inheritance tax. That statement told us specifically that we could not expect extra funding for the National Health Service in the Budget.

Mr. Fairbairn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I shall give way in a moment.

Is it not typical of the Government's distorted sense of priorities that they should take the one Budget priority which unites all decent opinion throughout the country —the funding of our National Health Service—and, by an unprecedented act of malice, eliminate it from consideration in the Budget.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Brown: They then claim that the reasons for not mentioning the Health Service in the Budget are purely technical, as if taxes and spending are not inextricably linked and as if, in 1985 and 1986, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not announced in his Budget extra money for employment measures.

The reality is that, until 15 March, the Chief Secretary and the Chancellor will tell us that they cannot invest any more money in the National Health Service because of what the Budget is there to do. After 15 March, after the tax cuts, the Chief Secretary and the Chancellor will tell us that they cannot invest in the NHS because of what the Budget has done.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. The hon. Member is obviously not giving way at this moment. Hon. Members should desist from trying to intervene for a while.

Mr. Brown: The truth is that—[Interruption.] I wish that Conservative Members would listen. They might have addressed some of their questions about the funding of pay awards to the Chief Secretary when he spoke.

The truth is that no Chancellor has faced his Budget with so much money but with views that are so out of touch with the decent instincts of the British people. This is the Government who keep telling us that it is the people's money, not the Government's money. It is the people who must choose, not the Government. Is there any doubt about what the people would choose? They would choose to invest in the NHS.

Mr. Forth: As the hon. Gentleman develops his remarks, will he give the House and the country a commitment that a future Labour Government wil reopen any ward that has been closed, eliminate all NHS waiting lists and meet any pay demands in full? If he gives that commitment, will he tell the House what it will cost the economy and the taxpayer? If not, will he tell the House what he would do with the NHS?

Mr. Brown: That is exactly the question that the hon. Gentleman should be asking the Chief Secretary.

We are committed to funding the NHS properly. That is why, last Wednesday, in the light of the evidence that we have taken from the British Medical Association, the National Association of Health Authorities and the Royal College of Nursing, and in the light of the evidence available to the Select Committee on Social Services and the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, we announced that the proper sum required is about £2,000 million. That is money that the Chancellor should make available in the Budget.

It is not as if the Government are investing inadequate sums in the NHS so that they can invest more in other public services. Perhaps the Minister who is to reply to the debate will tell us why, in a year that is claimed to be one of unparalleled prosperity for Britain and at the same time as the Government are discussing the scope for tax cuts in the Budget, in the public expenditure White Paper the Government have cut the real value of the budgets of half a dozen Government Departments.

Perhaps the Minister will tell us why this year the Government have frozen the value of child benefit and will remove 1 million pensioners in April from all help with rent and rates, and why they have forced 4 million of our poorest households to pay rates for the first time, no matter how poor they are. Will the Minister explain why the Government have imposed dental charges and are imposing charges for eye tests, despite the Prime Minister's assurance in previous years that charges would never be introduced, and why, last week——

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Brown: I am not giving way. I shall give way to the Minister. I am happy to give way to him.

Mr. Major: Before the hon. Gentleman continues his misleading litany, perhaps he will explain to the House, if the Government are as he describes, why the increase in programme spending next year is £4·5 billion, with a further £6 billion in the second year of the survey?

Mr. Brown: Will the Chief Secretary tell me what was misleading in what I said about the withdrawal of rent and rate support and about the introduction of charges for eye and dental treatment? Will he tell us why, if the Government are so flush with money, last week, in new regulations on the social fund, the Government imposed a state charity fund, which will force thousands of our citizens to beg and borrow for vital necessities? The state is withdrawing from responsibility for the relief of poverty and passing it to the soup kitchens of the Salvation Army.

Mr. Fairbairn: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the fact that some doctors were in doubt as to what operations they might or might not be able to perform. Will he reflect on the fact that he and Scottish Back-Bench Labour Members are today supporting a strike which will guarantee that hundreds of operations cannot be performed? It is a political strike to frustrate more funds going to health care. It does not seem to me to support the principles that the hon. Gentleman is putting forward, when unions vote against the use of the £3·6 million of extra funds for operations, transplants and ophthalmic units. That has been given to Scotland in the past few weeks, thanks to the Government's success.

Mr. Brown: The hon. and learned Gentleman shows the difficulties that I have as a Member of Parliament in representing all my constituents. Will not the hon. and learned Gentleman put the pressure that he wants to bring to bear on the Minister? In Scotland, as a result of the Government's policies, waiting lists are 8,000 higher than in 1979. The number — [Interruption.] Conservative Members should listen. Waiting lists are 8,000 higher in Scotland than they were in 1979 and the number of acute beds in Scottish hospitals has been reduced by 2,000. That is the state to which the Government have brought the NHS.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Brown: I should like to refer to the detailed evidence and recommendations of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. In a non-party political way, I want to congratulate the Chairman of the Committee on the excellent work that his Committee has done. As the Chief Secretary did, we welcome the proposal that many of the public expenditure White Paper details should be included in the Autumn Statement. It is entirely right that decisions should be announced as quickly as possible and not delayed until the publication of a public expenditure White Paper in January.

I wish that the Chief Secretary had dealt with this matter in more detail, but we also welcome the Committee's view that greater use of price indices to give a proper value of the volume of expenditure should be part of the public expenditure White Paper exercise. That factor is of distinct relevance to the NHS. The cash figures show a rise, but inflation is 3·5 per cent. and the GDP deflator is 4·25 per cent., and the relative price effect to take account of NHS pay and prices is about 6 per cent. It is small wonder that the cash figures do not reflect the real position in the NHS.

We welcome the Select Committee's recommendations about the timing of the nurses' and other pay reviews, and the fact that the Government have taken them up. It makes absolutely no sense for health authorities to begin their budgeting year in the first week of April, for the pay review board to report in the second week of April and for the Prime Minister to make an announcement in the third or fourth week of April. That would make it impossible for health authorities to plan ahead. The problem is that nothing that the Chief Secretary has said today makes life easier for health authorities faced with cash problems at the moment.

The facts in the report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee were of great interest. They showed that the Chancellor had before him about £5,000 million more in revenue than he originally expected. Not only that, but the figures showed that, after higher than expected asset sales were taken into account, the net underspending was about £1,300 million—£100 million less on the Foreign Office budget, £200 million less on trade and industry, £400 million less on transport, and £700 million less on housing.

Next year, the Chancellor is likely to receive about £7 billion more in revenue than was anticipated, yet the clear message of the Chief Secretary's speech is that, even when this year he has spent less than originally expected and has received more than originally anticipated, and even when next year he will receive more than was projected, he still refuses to make a commitment to invest in the National Health Service or in any of our other great public services. It is not financial constraints that prevent the Chief Secretary and the Chancellor from acting, but the ideological constraints that they have placed upon themselves.

I ask the Chancellor and the Government to consider two areas where I believe that there is a developing consensus throughout the whole country, which extends beyond the Labour party to the British Medical Association, the Royal College of Nursing and the National Association of Health Authorities, and includes many Conservative Members.

Indeed, I was interested to read the Budget submission of the Tory Reform Group. The Chancellor may not like to listen to what the Tory Reform Group says. It is interesting that its patrons include the Secretary of State for Education, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and the Home Secretary; of course, its president is the Secretary of State for Wales. The Tory Reform Group says:

"The Budget . . . will be judged not by the size of the nest egg, nor by the Government's ability to accumulate it—but by the way in which they choose to use it . . . If this is the situation, it all becomes a question of priorities and high on that list will be education, employment, social services, the inner cities and, above all, health. . . . It would be deeply offensive to many people, in all parties, if the major 'bonus share' in this year's Budget were to go to those on higher incomes until or unless the most pressing needs of the NHS are also met."

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I cannot speak on behalf of the Tory Reform Group, but is my hon. Friend aware that when I visited the Queen Elizabeth hospital in Birmingham at the beginning of January, I went into the section dealing with cancer patients where I was shown two wards with 14 beds for cancer paitents which had been closed in the last year? When I wrote to the chairman of the regional health authority, he replied that, with the financial crisis facing the west midlands, there was no alternative. Does that not give the lie to those who argue that there is no crisis in the National Health Service?

Mr. Brown: I agree with my hon. Friend. The letter which had to go out from the Minister of Health to the chairmen of health authorities in December said that it would not be possible to transfer resources to the priorities which had been identified by the Government because of the cash restraints. It is not just the Tory Reform Group, which is patronised by a number of Cabinet members, which believes that the Budget should be used to help the National Health Service.

There may be some doubt about what lay behind the speech of the Secretary of State for Social Services at the Young Conservatives' conference. What is clear is that the Secretary of State believed that the Treasury had stopped him getting the best settlement for his budget. He said:

"It seemed to me clear, as many have said, we needed more resources, and I secured from the Chancellor increases on top of what we had in the last eight years . . . 11 per cent. in real terms, but I did not think that was enough in terms of the changes I would like to see . . . I wanted to see additional resources above and beyond what I secured."

If the Secretary of State for Social Services is right—he speaks with all the honesty of a Minister who was defeated on the issue—what weight can we put on the words of the Chief Secretary when, addressing the Select Committee on the Treasury and the Civil Service, he said:

"We reached a bilateral agreement on the programme and that tends to suggest an agreement means consensus . . . Every colleague had the opportunity of making whatever points he or she wished to make."

Who is telling the truth—the Secretary of State for Social Services, who said that he was defeated, or the Chief Secretary, who said that there was no battle? Perhaps there is no contradiction. Is it that the Secretary of State for Social Services fought so valiantly for his budget that no one noticed? Is it that the Treasury had simply stopped listening to the Secretary of State for Social Services a few weeks ahead of the rest of the country? Or is it that the Treasury is determined to stand up to the Department of Health and Social Security and has a different agenda, seeing in the current problems of the National Health Service an opportunity to narrow the scope of a public service?

Is it not the case that, when the Secretary of State for Social Services agreed with the presidents of the royal colleges of medicine that more cash was needed for health care, the Chief Secretary replied that that could come from the private sector? Is it not the case also that the main item being considered as part of the internal Health Service review is the expansion of the private sector in medicine? The electorate was not told about the review. Consultation will clearly be a charade. The review will be dominated not by the professionals in health care, who are not even included in its membership, but by people who use the National Health Service only as a last resort.

The Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), in the speech in which she urged people to give up second holidays, when millions cannot afford the first, said:

"There are many of us around now that feel that the time is right to look at radical new solutions to take us into the next century, solutions which revolve around the private sector playing a far bigger part in health provision in the future . . . We could be asking it to grow to £2 billion or more in a comparatively short space of time . . . We are talking about a thumping big growth of that sector the like of which we have never seen in this country before . . . We will have to consider whether they can do it by themselves or whether they will need help. And I don't just mean tax relief or whatever."

Is it not clear that for the Government the crisis in the National Health Service—for that is what it is—is not a challenge to statesmanship, not a call for compassion and care, not a call to avoid needless suffering in hospitals, but a new opportunity for the private sector, with an agenda to push more and more patients into the private sector and bring private profit right to the heart of the NHS, the one great public service that has so far resisted the Government's obsession with privatisation?

The NHS is to be considered for privatisation not because it is inefficient — there is no evidence that, compared with the private sector, the NHS does not secure far better value for money, is administratively far less expensive and is far more cost-effective than any private sector hospital—not because the private sector can offer a better deal, but simply because the NHS is there, next in line after electricity, water, coal, steel and the privatisation of local authority services. It is for Conservative Members the last great public service still to be captured by the speculative forces of the City. The response to eight years of neglect in health care is to withdraw the public sector systematically from a solution to the problems that the Government have created.

Mr. Forth rose——

Mr. Brown: I am not giving way to the hon. Gentleman again.

There is another area where there is a developing consensus in the country which excludes the Government. People are increasingly realising that the Government must invest more in training, in education, in research and development, in science and in innovation to ensure long-term economic efficiency and industrial success. As a nation we are already investing less in ourselves in the oil-rich 1980s than we did in the 1960s and 1970s. We are investing a smaller share of the national income than any other European country, with the exception of Belgium. The CBI has just reported that the shortfall in investment has serious implications for business competitiveness.

What sense does it make for the Government, who should be bridging the investment gap in those vital areas, to compound the problem by announcing, in the small print of the White Paper on public expenditure, cuts in the real value of capital investment in just about every Department?

There are cuts of £14 million in the capital programme for education and science; of £30 million in transport; of £90 million in trade and industry; of £120 million in housing; of £48 million in Scotland; and of £38 million in Wales. In real terms, capital investment has been significantly increased only in the Home Office prison building programme, because we need to build more prisons to cope with the increased crime levels. As the evidence to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee states, capital investment is to fall in real terms by 5 per cent. in central Government over the next three years, and by 14 per cent. in local authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West) rose——

Mr. Brown: I am not giving way again.

We know that more people leave school early without qualifications, and that our work force contains fewer people with technical qualifications than those of most of our major industrialised competitors. But the Government will not act, even when they recognise that there is a shortfall in the investment going into those vital areas, even when in other countries the public sector fills the gap and spends more, and even when it is admitted that market forces of themselves cannot do the job properly.

Was it not Sir Francis Tombs, the personal scientific adviser to the Prime Minister, whose Engineering Council said yesterday:

"Normal market forces will not work to make up the severe shortfall and provide the skills base needed by modern industry and commerce"?

Even when the Government know that there is a shortage of investment and the market will not fill the gap, they refuse to back public sector investment to the extent that they should. We need a Government who open doors to young people; to provide opportunities, break down barriers and help young people up the ladder of opportunity. Instead, we have a Government who, by failing to invest to the same degree as our competitors, are slamming doors shut in the face of many young people who need the best possible technical training and skill qualifications if we are to succeed in the modern world of the future.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher) rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) has already said that he is not prepared to give way at this stage.

Mr. Brown: The same is true of the problems that we face in research and development, problems that are not answered in detail in the public expenditure White Paper or in anything that the Chief Secretary has said. Let us take the science budget. After the pay awards and the new spending announced for AIDS research, it receives no extra money. Professor Sir David Phillips, chairman of the advisory board for the research councils, has said that decisions by the Government are "leading progressively to an unstable situation".

The board says that the budget

"does not provide the means to move our nation's scientific capability towards the twenty first century".

The Medical Research Council faces for tomorrow the same problems faced by the National Health Service today. Referring to the shortfall of £40 million in medical research funds, Professor Colin Blakemore, head of physiology at Oxford university, has said:

"In my gloomiest moments I think we have lost the future".

Professor Leslie Iversen, head of the United Kingdom neuroscience laboratories, has said:

"We are committing national suicide".

The Government admit that the private sector is not doing the job. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has said that our private sector research and development is a smaller proportion of gross domestic product, and is growing more slowly, than that of our major competitors. In other countries, as the CBI has pointed out in its agenda for 1988, far more money is spent on research and development. But even when it is recognised that market forces will not do the job by themselves, the Government are not increasing the research and development budget in the way that is necessary to guarantee economic efficiency and industrial success for the future.

When will the Government set aside their antipathy to everything public and their obsession with everything private? When will they realise that the public sector exists not because of decisions by previous Labour Governments, but because there are national responsibilities, which the private sector cannot or will not undertake and market forces alone cannot perform in the national interest? Only because of the success of 100 years of collective provision in education, training, health and transport have people forgotten the chaos, the uneven patchwork of provision, the undercapitalised industries, the obsolete equipment and the gaps and shortages in a whole range of public services, which led people to demand public intervention as a necessary way of improving our economy in the first place.

What is perhaps most worrying about the Government's stance in these few weeks in the run-up to the Budget is that we are being asked to sacrifice the certain, unmistakable, concrete benefits of overdue and necessary public investment in our National Health Service, and in other public services vital to the economy, for the unproven and unprovable, the untested and untestable, benefits of top-rate tax cuts for the very few.

The Government are not yet satisfied, having already reduced the top rates of taxation, given away £13,000 million in tax cuts to the very rich and created a whole series of tax concessions that are available only for them. The Government are not satisfied that those in the top range of the income scale can set £40,000 against tax for the business expansion scheme, and that limitless tax reliefs are available in forestry—usually for planting the wrong trees in the wrong place for the wrong reason.

They are not satisfied even when, in the heart of the most deprived inner-city areas, enterprise zones have become tax shelters for the very rich to make a great deal of money without even setting foot in those areas. They are not satisfied that, when the basic rate for a nurse, a car worker or a teacher is 27p in the pound and utterly unavoidable, the effective tax rate for many wealthy people can be as low as 10p in the pound.

How, in those circumstances, can the Government defend putting money aside for further tax cuts for the very rich? Would it not be the triumph of dogma over common sense for the Government even to contemplate abolishing capital gains or inheritance tax, at the cost of more than £1,000 million to the nation—money that, if properly invested, could ease the problems in our hospitals and health centres, and go a long way to restoring the vitality of many public services? Would it not be the triumph of greed over the national interest if the Government were to proceed with their plans to reduce the top rate of taxation from 60p to 40p or 50p in the pound, when the money that would be lost to the nation——

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton) rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East made it clear earlier that he was not giving way. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) has only just come into the Chamber, yet again.

Mr. Brown: Would it not be the triumph of greed over common sense if the Government were to use the £1,600 million that would be lost in top rate tax cuts—money that could make good the shortfall in the NHS finances identified by the all-party Social Services Committee only in the last few weeks? What justification can the Government have for giving more to people who are already wealthy, when the NHS and other public services are waiting for vital funds?

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Brown: I am just finishing my speech.

When I see the ever-lengthening queues of the elderly and the sick waiting for hospital treatment which they cannot now rely on obtaining; when I see pensioners so poor on £39·50 a week that they have to choose between heating and eating; when I see families in such distress that many children, in the 1980s, are going to school ill clad and hungry; when I see households so destitute that they will now have to beg and borrow from a state charity fund which will not even offer to help them in the first instance; and, on the other hand, when I see unused and under-used resources—money that is being sent overseas when it should be invested here, money squandered in speculative activities in the City when it could be used more productively in industry and money going to a rich few on the basis that as their incentive they must get richer while the poor need the spur of their poverty to escape; when I see needs that can be met only by public intervention to redress the economic imbalance and social injustices and at the same time Government resources being misdirected, I see the challenge facing a Government in a democratic society. It is a challenge to meet those unmet needs by using those under-used resources that, because of their antipathy to public investment and services, this Government refuse to meet. It is a challenge that, in the interests of social cohesion, should be taken up. It is a challenge that clearly will be met only by a Labour Government.

5.20 pm

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): Iain Macleod, under whom I served my apprenticeship on the Opposition Front Bench, when faced with a concession from the Government, had a favourite expression—I never shoot Santa Claus. It is a dictum that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) might take to heart. The speech of my hon. Friend the Chief Secretary contained a considerable number, not only of concessions, but of important improvements in the way in which economic forces might be handled.

With great warmth and enthusiasm, I express my appreciation for the way in which my right hon. Friend has responded, and responded so quickly, to the views expressed by the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee.

Some of these issues are of great political importance to our constituents. If one gets one's report accepted in such a way, one should tear up one's notes and make a different speech, but I shall retain a certain amount of what I was going to say.

I welcome my hon. Friend's response on documentation and the procedures of the House for debating these matters. We have seen substantial improvements in our procedures since the beginning of the decade, and particularly in the balance between the Executive and Parliament, not least by the establishment of the departmental Select Committee system, combined with the important arrangements that we now have for debating items of public expenditure under the Estimates day procedure.

In the report that the Select Committee has just produced, we are seeking to build on those two major reforms in an important respect. We suggest that the documentation should be improved. The Select Committee advocated, and my right hon. Friend has accepted, a change in our arrangements whereby more detail is provided in the Autumn Statement, and then the main bulk of the enormous public expenditure, volume II, is divided into departmental reports. If that can be achieved, the extent of parliamentary scrutiny and accountability of the Government will be greatly improved, and that will be an important change.

If we go along that route, it will have important implications for the way in which we debate these matters. This may even be the last of the public expenditure White Paper debates in the present form. It has never been a particularly popular debate. When it was a two-day debate, it was disastrous. The Whips used to spend their time finding Members to speak. If we can have closer scrutiny on a departmental basis, while at the same time continuing the improvements in Estimates days, this will be a great change and an improvement in the way in which we debate our procedures.

The documentary side has essentially been accepted by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary. The procedural side has important implications for everyone in the House, not least the Opposition, and we have put forward our proposals as a Green Paper rather than as a White Paper. None the less, I hope that they will be carefully considered and that changes can be made.

My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has responded to certain important aspects of the Committee's report. Much of it is concerned with the problems that arise in the assessment of priorities within the financial year. We draw particular attention to these problems in paragraph 36. We say:

> "One objective of the White Paper and related documents must be to enable departments and those implementing their policies to plan ahead, but this is manifestly being frustrated in some cases by the way in which pay settlements are treated each year."

We took the NHS as a good example, pointing out that district health authorities do not have a firm basis from which to plan for the future. As I understand it, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is essentially proposing to accept what we suggest in paragraph 37—that is, to alter the timing of the pay review bodies and to bring forward the timing when the Government announce their decision on whether they accept the recommendations of the review bodies, and on funding, so that those who have to plan for the year ahead will know what the situation is before the year begins.

That is a very significant change and one of great importance for the health authorities and all other responsible bodies. The rapidity of the Government's response is to be welcomed. It may be that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary was going to say all this anyway, without the Select Committee's report, but, on the other hand, it is possible that that might not have been the case. He is also suggesting for this year that the results, particularly of the nurses' review body, about which we are all greatly concerned, will be announced before the end of April, and my right hon. Friend showed clearly that he thought it would be premature of health authorities to go ahead and announce savings elsewhere in the Health Service until that was done. I certainly agree with him in that respect.

I can refer to a constituency case. Worthing health authority is carrying out widespread public consultations on a long list of savings that may need to be made if the nurses' review body and other pay settlements are not funded in full, and that is causing considerable concern. My right hon. Friend is right to say that decisions should not be taken on that basis until we know what the position is on funding, and he has made it clear that he hopes that that will happen by the end of April.

It is sometimes suggested that we need not fund the pay settlement in the Health Service in full, because that will somehow encourage efficiency in the Health Service. Because of demography and other factors, the pressure that the Health Service faces is great enough to encourage it to seek every possible improvement in efficiency. On the other side of the coin, if even greater pressure is imposed upon it so that it has to make savings elsewhere, typically, it closes wards. Nothing is more inefficient than closing wards where all the overhead costs continue and the savings are small. I understand the point that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary made, and I am putting forward a powerful argument that, when the settlement is finally decided in April, the full amount of the funding should come from the reserve and not from savings elsewhere in the Health Service.

[Mr. Terence L. Higgins]

The Select Committee also referred to a related and broader point about priorities within the Health Service. There is a danger that, when a particular Department finds that it has to make a substantial increase in resources, and that is accepted by the Treasury and the Government, if that increase cannot be met from the reserve, it is right that the matter should be looked at across the board to see whether savings should come from some other Department than from the Department which, it has been agreed, should have more resources. If not, we cannot be sure that we have the right allocation of resources.

The letter that the Treasury sent to the Committee in answer to the point that we raised about these issues made it clear that in previous years—on the Health Service, for example—the Cabinet had not looked across the board for where the savings should come from. It is understandable that, if someone comes to the Cabinet once the expenditure round is finished and tells its members to look for savings elsewhere, the Cabinet will make a rapid decision not to do that and to find the savings in the Department that needs the extra money. But that is not the best way of ensuring that our resources are properly allocated.

Much of the problem in the Health Service has been that resources have been badly allocated between different districts within regions. During the long period when the Labour Government were supported by the Liberal party, and when there were cuts in the hospital building programme, it was difficult to move resources from the districts that were said to be overfunded on the RAWP formula to those that were underfunded. One of the beneficial effects of the big increase in Health Service resources that has been made is that it is now much easier to make such a redistribution from one district to another, because it does not then involve a proportionate cut in the parts of the region that were previously overfunded on the RAWP formula. That is one of the Government's successes in the Health Service.

The Select Committee's report also addressed the issue of how to appraise the allocation of resources in the past. The relative price effect, rather than the cash figures deflated by the GDP deflator, is a better way to measure what has happened. It may not be the right measure on pay from the nurses' point of view, but it is the right way of asking whether we have allocated more real resources to this or that use. That provides the basis for the future. There has been some misunderstanding about this on the part of the Treasury, which is worried about the cash limit system being undermined. Neither I nor the Committee believe that that will happen, and there is an argument for using the relative price effect in the future.

We shall have to read carefully what the Chief Secretary said this afternoon about the EEC. It was a complex statement, but he again responded immediately to the Committee's suggestion that the position on the EEC should be clarified.

Overall, I believe that my right hon. Friend made an excellent response to a series of constructive suggestions; I congratulate him on the way in which he made his speech and on its content.

5.32 pm

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): It is a great pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), because he is an excellent Chairman of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, and it is due to his wise chairmanship that we have produced an excellent and constructive report that will help the House to come to a view on public spending, and on what has happened and what should happen.

The background to this debate and to the run-up to the Budget is that, despite a year in which output growth has been at its highest since the early 1970s, and in which revenues are likely to be much greater than forecast last year, the Government refuse to sanction the necessary increases in Health Service spending. Such increases would, as most objective observers agree, help to solve the current crisis in the National Health Service.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): Before the hon. Gentleman proceeds to all the strictures which I do not doubt he is about to deliver to the Government, will he, in passing, be generous enough to pay tribute to them for the two achievements to which he referred—the growth rate that we have enjoyed, which is unprecedented for a generation, and the buoyancy of revenue? Will he for once give a little credit where it is due?

Mr. Radice: I note that the hon. Gentleman did not mention North sea oil. As for the growth rate, the Chancellor told the Select Committee that it was not sustainable beyond one year, as the hon. Gentleman will remember.

Buoyant revenues are excellent, but how should they be used? That constitutes part of the argument between the Opposition and the Government. Some Conservative Members would like the revenues to be used to increase National Health Service spending. Most observers find it difficult to understand how, given the increase in revenue and the good year that the economy has had, the Government have got themselves into such a pickle over Health Service spending. The Select Committee report helps to shed some light on what has happened.

First, it is clear that the Treasury bounced the Cabinet into its decision on public spending, with a highly conservative estimate of what revenue was likely to be. It is obvious that the Treasury had a good idea last autumn that revenue was running well ahead of forecast, yet no account of the buoyant revenues was taken when the public spending total was determined. If revenue determined expenditure, as successive Chief Secretaries have told the Select Committee it does, and as the Government claim, total spending could be up to £10 billion more than the Government have decided. Even without the revenue increase, spending could be at least £1 billion or £2 billion higher and still remain within the Government's target of reducing public spending as a proportion of GDP.

The Committee's second point was that Government procedures for determining public spending did not allow the Government to develop a coherent view of competing priorities. As we said:

"A series of bilateral negotiations with individual Ministers does not add up to collective decision making."

I also suspect—I refer to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) in his excellent speech—that the process of bilateral negotiations was fatally undermined last year by the failure of the Secretary of State for Social Services to press for sufficient funds for the Health Service. As we saw from the example of Sir Keith Joseph, as he then was, it makes it easier for the Chief Secretary and lets the Cabinet off the hook if a Secretary of State fails to bat for his own budget.

So, partly because the Treasury bounced the Cabinet on revenue, and partly because the responsible Minister failed in his duty, the Government have got themselves into an appalling mess over the National Health Service. Yet, as everyone knows, money is running out of the Chancellor's ears. He will have at least £10 billion more revenue than he told the House—and his own colleagues—he had last year. The Government have the extra money—and more—to begin to help solve the National Health Service crisis, but they refuse to do so.

Finally, I want to consider whether decreasing public spending as a proportion of GDP is any longer—if it ever was—a suitable policy objective. This is in part a political argument. The Opposition believe that a civilised, prosperous nation such as Britain needs a substantial level of public spending and public investment in basic infrastructure such as roads, transport, lighting and sewerage, in basic services such as health, education and housing and to provide a basic income for people in sickness, unemployment and old age.

Conservative Members tend to be far more sceptical about public spending. They argue that many of the public services can be provided by private enterprise and that extra revenue should be given back in tax cuts so that people can spend the extra as they want. I believe that that is the Treasury argument. They argue, too, from a historical point—that in the 1970s public spending was out of control and that public spending increases at that time led to inflation.

I do not want to get into that old debate, except to say that the main reason for the public spending increases as a proportion of GDP in the 1970s was the impact of the recession on revenue. If hon. Members doubt that, they should remember how Government spending rose as a proportion of GDP at the height of the recession, between 1980 and 1982. It is interesting that, when the Government quote figures about the proportion of public spending compared to GDP, they do not take figures from the time of a Labour Government—they have to take figures from 1982, when public spending rose to 46 per cent. of GDP. It was a case not of profligacy on the part of the Government, but of the impact of the recession on revenue spending.

There is little evidence to suggest that increases in public spending in 1974-75 led to the inflationary surge of that period. I have studied this carefully. The main engine of inflation was the burst in commodity prices, the oil shock and the accompanying pay explosion.

In any case, the situation today is very different from that in the mid-1970s.—[Interruption.] I do not think that we were responsible for the Barber boom. Public spending has declined sharply as a proportion of GDP. It is now about 42 per cent., compared with nearly 47 per cent. in 1982-83. Output growth this year is the best since the 1970s, as the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) said. Although it is expected to decline in the coming year, it should still be in the region of 3 per cent.—the figure the Chancellor told the Select Committee the British economy ought to be able to sustain for several years. In these new circumstances, the question becomes: why on earth should public spending not grow in line with growth in GDP? The House should consider that proposition seriously.

Now that public spending is down to 42 per cent. of GDP, why are the Government planning a further decrease, as is suggested in the White Paper? The only rational argument for continuing the decline of public spending as a proportion of GDP is that it will allow taxpayers to have more money to spend as they like. That is the only argument that we hear from the Conservative party, but there is no economic justification for it. Yet we know from public opinion polls and the pattern of expenditure in other similar countries that, as people grow more affluent, they prefer to spend more on health and education.

There is therefore a strong case for allowing public spending to rise in line with growth. That is not inflationary or fiscally irresponsible. Increases in public spending would not be financed by increased borrowing or by increased taxation, but would come from increased output.

The great advantage of such a shift in policy would be that it would enable the education budget, for example, to be increased substantially. We know how important education is for the country's future. Such a shift would also allow Health Service spending to rise more in line with increases in costs and changing needs in the NHS. It would also allow badly needed investment in infrastructure projects to go ahead.

The tragedy about the Government's stance is not only that it has no economic justification, but that it is rapidly creating a country in which private affluence and public squalor exist side by side. Any hon. Member who doubts that has only to travel around the country and then go to France, West Germany or Scandinavia to see the contrast.

However, I live in hope. I have noted that, since 1983, to a far greater extent than they admit to their followers, the Government and the Chancellor have shifted their economic policies in a more pragmatic direction. It is essential for the future of the country that, on this vital issue of public spending, which is basic to our civilisation, the Government change direction.

5.45 pm

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): The speech of the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) followed closely that of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). They are both in a predicament which they must get out of themselves. We cannot do that for them. They want more public expenditure, but they are unable to say quite how it will be found.

Mr. Radice: I said growth.

Sir Peter Hordern: The hon. Gentleman said that public expenditure could increase at the same pace as the national economy grew, but experience shows that only if public expenditure is a smaller proportion of gross domestic product can the economy grow. As the economy grows, more is available for public expenditure as long as the proportion taken by public expenditure is always reducing. Both hon. Members are in difficulty, as they have to criticise the level of public expenditure and output.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East about the Health Service. Anybody who has followed these matters for some time recognises that expenditure on the Health Service has increased in both money and volume terms. I have heard the hon. Member speak in previous debates. I remember a winding-up speech in which he said that nurses were leaving the service. That is true; but many more are entering it. It is natural that nurses should leave to get married, for example.

It is the partial description of what happens with public expenditure which does the Opposition great harm. The volume of public expenditure is increasing all the time and its nature is always improving. I believe that the Opposition will appeal only to an ever-declining proportion of the population if that is the line that they pursue.

I should like to draw attention to the report of the European Court of Auditors, which is relevant to the public expenditure White Paper by virtue only of the amount we pay into the European Community. I do not know whether my right hon. and hon. Friends have read the report, but it is an indictment of the process of financing the EC. In my time in business, I have seen some very doubtful reports, but I have seldom seen such a display of deferred expenditure — the "cheque in the post" attitude — which the Court of Auditors has been obliged to reveal.

It is difficult for somebody who is not on the Treasury Select Committee to know exactly what the process is. As I understand it, the European Court of Auditors writes its report, the European Parliament debates it, and then it goes to the Council of Ministers. It makes proposals to the European Commission, which is not entitled to take any action. The result is that all we see is a report from the European Select Committee on the European Court of Auditors' report. That is not a satisfactory way of going about our affairs.

Mr. Higgins: It is debated.

Sir Peter Hordern: As my right hon. Friend says, it is debated.

I should like to see a Treasury minute, similar to those in respect of public accounts, relating what the Government propose to do and what they propose to recommend in the Council of Ministers. It is an important point. Whatever happens about the decision that was arrived at yesterday by the European Court, the European Community will bulk ever larger in our debates. Such a poor form of restraint on the finances of the European Community is intolerable.

Mr. Ian Taylor: I entirely endorse what my hon. Friend has said about the problems of Community budgets and negative reserves. Did he welcome the Prime Minister's statement last week, when she categorically said that, under the revised form of the budget agreed at the recent Brussels summit, such practices will no longer be allowed?

Sir Peter Hordern: I hope that my hon. Friend is correct and that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will be able to see that all goes well. I have known it to happen that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister does not always get her own way within the European Community. The matter to which my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) referred must be examined. I would rather see it addressed in the usual way by Treasury minute, so that we may see what the Government propose to do about it.

Everyone agrees that health is the most important aspect of public expenditure. It is certainly the most rapidly growing part of any programme within the public expenditure White Paper. Everybody believes that that is a good thing. Looking back over the history of public expenditure White Papers, it is evident how programmes change. A few years ago, when the Labour party was in power, trade and industry formed a substantial part of public expenditure, but that programme is declining, largely because of changes in phflosophy and in the regional grant system. Another change is the decline in the amount of pubic sector building. Anyone who looks at that figure will recognise the great advance that has taken place in private sector repairs, maintenance and building, and the level of construction generally.

If one is to obtain a fair picture of the economy at the moment, one must take into account not only the decline in public sector building, but the great advance that has taken place in construction, repairs and maintenance in the private sector. Nevertheless, in trade and industry, and especially in building and construction, the public sector has declined. And it will continue to decline because of the increase in the number of owner-occupiers. That appears to be a natural trend, which is reflected in the huge increase in the number of people who own shares.

It is inescapable also that more and more people will wish to provide for their own health, however good the National Health Service is. Ultimately, they will not accept that what they spend on health should be controlled by what the Government think is appropriate. Health is becoming more of an individual responsibility. People of all political persuasions are increasingly questioning the capacity of any Government to confine their desire to pay for their health and provide for it within a nationalised monopoly system. It is increasingly the role of employers to provide for the health of their employees. Employers will wish to take out separate health schemes for their employees.

Already about 5·25 million people are covered by private medical schemes. Another aspect, which will be an increasing problem, is the number of elderly and retired people. There was a time when a substantial proportion of such people were cared for in local authority homes. That number has substantially declined. Hon. Members should look at the increase in the number of those who are looked after in voluntary private homes. In 1976, there were 46,000 such people. In 1986, there were 112,000.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): They are provided through local authorities.

Sir Peter Hordern: The hon. Gentleman is perfectly correct. Many are provided and paid for by local authorities, but that is not my point. Because of the Government's generosity, that will continue to happen. Such services are provided by the private sector, whether or not they are paid for by local authorities.

Of course, the population is living much longer. As far as I know, nobody proposes that there should be a vast extension of the number of publicly owned nursing homes. There is greater private provision of homes and health services for the elderly. The present trend is certain to increase.

We must take account also of rapid advances in medicine. The other day I asked what were the 10 most common operations. The tenth most common operation is a hip joint replacement. In 1984, the latest date for which figures are available, there were 53,000 hip joint replacements, costing £3,300 each—that is £150 million. Ten years ago, such a cost would not have arisen. There were no such things as hip replacement operations. As medicine progresses, there will be more and more necessary, complicated and expensive operations.

That leads me to doubt whether the National Health Service can any longer be confined within the public expenditure programme as such. After all, when the Government weigh up one public expenditure programme against another, it is comparatively easy to limit, say, agricultural spending, trade and industry spending, or other parts of the public programme. But in the National Health Service, some of which is demand-led—I refer to family practitioner services — there is no control. As advances in medicine continue, there is no sensible control. Perhaps we shall go on for a few more years, but certainly what we spend on national health as a public expenditure programme will no longer be tolerated by people if it is to be compared with what is spent in other public expenditure programmes.

It is not as though the Government actually run the National Health Service. They run the Department of Health and Social Security. That is a different matter. The National Health Service is at arm's length. It has always been my complaint that the DHSS does not know what goes on in the NHS. The information available to it is poor.

I noticed that, for that part of the NHS for which the DHSS is responsible, there is to be an increase in manpower this year from 94,700 to 102,900. How did that get past my right hon. Friend the Minister? The Government are directly responsible for that figure. It has nothing to do with the Health Service recruiting administrators, or anything like that. It cannot be a misprint in the papers. On the whole, the number of people directly employed by the DHSS in the National Health Service has been declining for some time. What is the reason? It is a substantial advance. It is most unlike my right hon. Friend to let that slip through. I expect a satisfactory answer.

I wonder whether a state monopoly is the best way of providing for health services. No other country tries to do it, and none would dream of doing so. A monopoly of health service provision is no longer to be tolerated.

The weakness in the argument about higher charges —which some people would like to see—is that they would fall most severely on the poor who need to use the services. Another alternative that has been mentioned involves tax concessions to those who want to opt out of the National Health Service. That would only result in a greater charge on the Treasury and therefore less money would be available for the health services, however they are provided. I am not in favour of those alternatives. Any new scheme must allow the poorest access to the best in health care. There should be a national scheme to provide that care, while allowing greater choice.

A very interesting article appeared in Economic Trends in October 1987. It showed the proportion of public expenditure to GDP over many years. It showed that in 1890 public expenditure was 9 per cent. of GDP; in 1913 it was 12·1 per cent.; in 1923 it was 25·7 per cent.; and in 1975 it was 48·8 per cent.—the highest point that it has reached.

It is evident that the blocks of public expenditure have risen. Just before the first world war, public expenditure was low. Between the wars it rose and it has risen again, although it is now declining thanks to the efforts of my right hon. and hon. Friends. If there is a rapidly growing demand for a public service like the Health Service, it will inevitably mean a further large increase in public expenditure as time passes if it is to be kept within the programme. The demands cannot be resisted. At the moment, health demand is rationed. That is unsatisfactory and does not happen in other countries.

I believe that an alternative system should be tried. I believe that health services should be provided through a national health insurance scheme. The advantage of such a scheme would be that if it were provided the poorest would have access, as they have at present, to the best treatment. However, because there is a limit—a flat rate amount which is paid at the top level by high earners—the high earners should not have the same right of access to the same health facilities. High earners should be allowed only half the cost of health facilities that they receive. If that happened, the better-off would be inclined to insure themselves for their health needs through private health insurance schemes. That is what happens at the moment in Canada. Inevitably that would lead to the introduction of private health insurance schemes as direct competitors with the National Health Service.

There should be a system, like that operating in Medicare, of testing and costing each operation in the National Health Service. If that was applied, hospitals carrying out operations would be remunerated on the basis of operations carried out and not on the basis of a budget which causes ward closures as hospitals are penalised for carrying out too many operations. I hope that that fundamental change will be considered. Indeed, I understand that that idea is being considered in the present fundamental review of the Health Service.

The advantage of that scheme is that the provision for health would fall on the patient and the doctor. The doctor would be able to say where the patient should be treated. There would be no restrictions on treatment within the national health insurance scheme or in a private hospital. The costs would be regulated in the way in which I have described. If such a scheme was in operation, there would be no need for district or regional health authorities. That whole great apparatus of control would disappear and the new system would contain elements of the systems operating in France, West Germany and the United States. There are clear and obvious advantages in such a scheme.

Inevitably people would pay more for their health services. I see no reason why they should not do that. I object to people being constrained in what they wish to pay for their health by being part of the public expenditure programme. In future that will be a growing and intolerable restraint. I therefore hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends who are carrying out the review will consider this alternative carefully.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and all those responsible on drawing up the public expenditure White Paper, on the clarity with which these matters are being pursued and on the enormous volume of information given in the report. Better still, I want the constraint of public expenditure within GDP to continue and also a growing volume and value of services within a growing GDP.

6.5 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I listened with great interest to the hon. Member for

[Mr. Archy Kirkwood]

Horsham (Sir P. Hordern). I have no objections in principle to the private sector participating and playing a part in health care concurrently with a National Health Service based on a properly resourced tax-funded system. I have no objection to the proposed Government review looking at all these matters carefully and scrutinising the proportion of expenditure that we devote to public expenditure in general and to the National Health Service in particular.

I cannot agree, however, with the hon. Gentlemen's conclusion that we should move away from a tax-based National Health Service at this stage because I believe that that would lead inevitably to a two-tier system. Once a system is designed specifically for the poor, it will inevitably become, almost by definition, a poor system.

If we were debating these matters against a background of straitened financial circumstances, there might be more force to the hon Gentleman's argument, but we have heard in the debate that the Government are relatively well off in terms of public finance at the moment. I accept that that is not an excuse for profligacy, but we have an opportunity to make modest and prudent increases and improvements to the level and way in which we disburse public expenditure. That should be the focus of this evening's debate.

I want to consider in detail some of the points made by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. He began by saying that, of course, the economic situation has improved. However, it would have improved automatically under any Government who were able to derive the benefits from North sea oil over the period of tenure of the past two Administrations. The revenue from North sea oil alters the situation. Comparisons between previous Governments and their stewardship and custodianship of the NHS have to be undertaken bearing in mind they start from two different bases. We are not comparing like with like when we take account of the current impact of North sea oil.

Nor should we ignore the fact that benefits in the form of revenue and capital accrue from the Government's current privatisation programme. I agree that parts of that programme are legitimate disposals, but I fear that the majority of the programme of sales of assets is a political mistake. However, we cannot ignore the fact that the Government have received the benefit of those proceeds.

The complaint has been made before—and I make it again now — that even if we do agree with the privatisation programme, trying to use the benefits, as the Government have, by treating them as negative capital expenditure, does nothing to improve the explanation of exactly what is happening in terms of the detail in the public expenditure White Paper and the Government's published expenditure programme. Treating those privatisation proceeds as negative public expenditure is tantamount to fraud and a great mistake.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury said that benefits were derived from having lower debt costs and more efficient nationalised industries. He should tell that to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy, who has just announced a 15 per cent. increase in electricity prices over the next two years. Clearly that increase is a prelude to moving the electricity industry out of the public sector and into private ownership at the expense of many old-age pensioners who rely on electricity as their single and exclusive form of heating. That particular part of the Chief Secretary's speech will be cold comfort to many of my constituents and other pensioners up and down the country in cold winters to come.

I wish to underscore and support what was said by the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) when he spoke of the proportion of GDP that should be devoted to public expenditure. I believe that the Government are duty bound to say at what stage the reduction will stop. I believe that there is indeed a case for prudently constraining public expenditure and that there is no case whatsoever for being profligate.

The hon. Member for Horsham gave us a history lesson about public expenditure levels in 1890 and identified that the proportion of GDP spent on public expenditure had inexorably increased — 48·8 per cent. of GDP was the highest percentage rate achieved. According to the Chief Secretary, that proportion will be reduced to 41 per cent. in the fiscal year 1990-91. Will that be the end? Is it the Government's intention to try to constrain the percentage of GDP spent on public expenditure still further?

I would certainly deplore any such reduction, and I believe that we should work on the formula suggested by the hon. Member for Durham, North to maintain that proportion as the economy expands and grows. Indeed, we should be able to increase expenditure now because of the current healthy state of the economy. The Treasury has received windfall income from the continuation of increased company profits, from higher oil prices and as a result of the further growth of the economy. All that is welcome.

Against that background, I can see no case for the Government continuing to adopt the stand that inexorably, year on year, the proportion of GDP spent on public expenditure should be reduced. Such a policy would inevitably have unacceptable costs. I accept that there will be adjustments. The hon. Member for Horsham mentioned that the DTI programme had receded, as has the housing programme. We could have a political argument on whether such adjustments are right or wrong, but the Government have a duty to let the country know their long-term plans for public expenditure.

The Chief Secretary mentioned the hospital and community health services. I do not believe that we do our case any good by using exaggerated and hysterical language. I do not believe that the entire NHS is in crisis, but I firmly believe that there are important sectors, especially the hospital services, that require urgent attention.

The right hon. Gentleman said that in the fiscal year 1987-88 the Government had provided for an increase of 10 per cent. in the hospital and community health sector. If we accept that the current rate of inflation is about 4·5 per cent. — that is the Government's assumption — we must also bear in mind that the nurses' pay award, which was made just before the election as a result of the pay review body's recommendations, was 9 per cent. However, for some specialty nursing grades, the pay award was nearer 12 per cent.

If we also assume that there is a need to allocate 2 per cent. of funds for service development factors, the total does not add up to the money that the Chief Secretary has boasted has been devoted to the hospital and community health sector. I am sure that Treasury Ministers will correct me if I am wrong. If the Chief Secretary checks his figures, he will see that it is clear that the hospital and community health sector will suffer further expenditure constraints in its budget for the current fiscal year.

The budget deficit does not take account of the cumulative effect of the cuts to which reference has been made by the Select Committee. I am sure that the House looks forward to studying the report of the Select Committee on Social Services. This Committee has taken evidence from the National Association of Health Authorities and from the King's Fund. They all agree that the cumulative effect of the current underfunding of the hospital and community health service is a deficit of about £1·9 billion. This represents a substantial loss for any one sector within the Health Service to sustain, and there is cause for concern.

The Chief Secretary spoke about the new procedures for announcing the findings of the pay review body in January to allow the health authority budgets to be more properly and accurately drawn up before the start of the new financial year. I welcome that, and I welcome also the comments that he made about the points raised by the Select Committee. The Committee has raised important matters. I wish them a fair wind and look forward to early results.

The right hon. Gentleman said that he was aware of the industrial dispute in the Health Service occurring in Scotland this very day. It is true that there is a great deal of anxiety in the Scottish Health Service. This anxiety has less to do with the issue of funding of the Health Service, and more to do—as he well knows—with the directions issued by the Scottish Home and Health Department to the 15 area health boards of Scotland requiring them to adopt competitive tendering. I believe that that is a great mistake.

I am in favour of allowing boards to engage in competitive tendering if they believe that it is right. I am also aware of the political difficulties encountered where such boards have steadfastly set their faces against such a course. However, the Government's requirement for enforced competitive tendering is inimical to the long-term interest of the Scottish Health Service. I believe that the result will be that the dedication, commitment and previously high morale of the staff will be seriously eroded. The Government have effectively said that those members of staff are not doing their job properly and that private contractors can do it better.

One of the most valuable commodities of the NHS is the commitment of the staff. The Government's adoption of the tactic of competitive tendering, which obliges health boards to adopt such a system and ignores the savings that have been made—the most recent estimates suggest that some £50 million has been saved in the past three or four years—is a step which is retrograde, negative and ill-advised.

The right hon. Gentleman said that he believed that nurses are better paid now than they ever have been. However, if one considers the increases that have been devoted to nurses' pay awards it is clear that, if one takes the figures for 1979-80, the Clegg award—intended to make up for many years of underfunding and paid in one instalment—distorts all the statistics for nurses' pay. Indeed, that award makes the figures appear more generous than they are. Comparing nurses' pay with the equivalent pay for professions outside, in the private sector, a different picture emerges. They are suffering badly in comparison with the private sector.

In conclusion, I wish to put forward a number of positive suggestions which I believe must be considered urgently within the next few months. One of my chief concerns about the White Paper under discussion is that there is no obvious provision for any increases in pay review awards or the clinical restructuring of the nursing profession. Having read the evidence given to the Select Committee by the Chief Secretary I have no reason to believe that there is any more money available for this financial year.

That would be a great mistake. I appreciate that the Budget may not be the appropriate vehicle for making expenditure announcements, because the Budget is about deriving revenue, but the Government must find the opportunity to provide extra resources to fund the pay awards. The Government are now under a lot of pressure.

I do not say that the Government should willy-nilly accept and pay the amounts in the conclusions of the pay review body, but I do say that if the Government decide to reduce the pay review award they can still—as they have in the past—underfund the amount of money to be paid. They have said that £X should be paid, and have paid only X minus a significant amount, leaving the health authorities and the health boards to find the balance out of their own resources. That is not acceptable this year. If the Government adopt that tactic, it will be extremely difficult for them to justify it.

The right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) mentioned the relative price effect. As a statistical procedure, that would be a much better way of evaluating what has happened historically in terms of volume. I have read the evidence that the Chief Secretary gave to the Select Committee. Using that as a prognostication, the relative price effect could drive a coach and horses through his cash-limited plans to keep down expenditure. I understand that, but there is no excuse for refusing to adopt the relative price effects statistics historically to examine how the profession and the services are changing.

I make a plea that some money be found for the system of clinical grading and restructuring that is so long overdue within nursing. One of the main problems in the Health Service is that key nursing posts are not properly remunerated and do not take properly into account the skills of those nurses. It would not cost an awful lot of money. It might cost upwards of £200 million. Perhaps that sounds a lot of money, but that money would be very well spent, and it has to be spent soon. Even if the decision were taken today to introduce incentives to keep nurses in the profession, to encourage them to work and to maintain the morale within the profession, it would take a long time to implement such a scheme and to get nurses promoted to those positions, so that they could work in the intensive care children's wards that have been in such trouble recently.

More than anything else, if the Government were able to make a firm commitment to move in that direction, that would boost the morale of the whole nursing profession. Important things can and must be done. There are important aspects of the White Paper that relate to regional development and housing that cause me some concern, but the National Health Service rightly has been the focus of the debate.

The amendment in the names of my right hon. and hon. Friends rejects the reduction of public expenditure each year inexorably as a proportion of GDP. We believe that the revenues that are available would allow prudent additional expenditure in the Health Service, education, housing and regional policy. Such job-creating investment would be much wiser than substantial further cuts in personal taxation, which will serve only to exacerbate the problems of overheating in parts of the domestic economy.

6.22 pm

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): I am surprised that the Liberal party spokesman on Treasury matters, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), does not seem to be aware how the figures have been arrived at. He mentioned that they contained nothing for pay awards. He should appreciate that, under all the headings, amounts for pay awards are based on an estimate of inflation. There is also a contingency reserve of £3·5 billion. In previous years, wage settlements in excess of the amount in the public expenditure White Paper have been paid out of the contingency reserve. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman did not appreciate that.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and his colleagues on the excellent way in which they have managed the economy. It was a little unfair of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire to say that the improvement in our economy is due principally to North sea oil. We have had seven years of economic growth. I believe that the Government can take credit for the reform of industrial relations, which has reduced the number of days lost in strikes to 2 million compared with 29 million under the previous Labour Government. The Government can take credit for reducing taxation and encouraging enterprise. That is nothing to do with North sea oil.

Productivity in our manufacturing industry is rising faster than that of any of our industrial competitors. As a result, there has been a dramatic recovery in corporate profits. The tax from those profits is now pouring into the Treasury at an unprecedented rate which gives the Chancellor an opportunity in the Budget that no Chancellor has had for 50 years. He has the opportunity in the same Budget to fund the increases in public spending set out in the White Paper, which amounts, in cash terms, to another £9·7 billion—a real increase of 1·25 per cent. That will enable him to produce a balanced Budget, or even to have a negative PSBR, and pay back some of the national debt, which will reduce the burden of interest charges to the public in future. He will have the opportunity also to reduce taxes.

The very success of the Chancellor's policy is one reason why we are having such a politically orchestrated campaign demanding a massive increase in spending on the Health Service, with many people suggesting that there should be no reduction in taxation. The big spenders and special interest groups have got the smell of money in their nostrils. As a result, their demands for more spending grow more strident every week. I congratulate the Chief Secretary on standing firm. Like him, I am opposed to those demands. First, we have already allocated an extra £1 billion to the Health Service. That has not yet been spent. It would be foolish to increase that when we are about to embark upon a fundamental investigation of the Health Service. There is also a lot of waste in the Health Service budget of £20 billion.

Earlier today I mentioned in an intervention that a new hospital has been built in Bridlington, and is about to open. It has replaced two older hospitals. It is remarkable that all the furniture in that hospital is brand new, despite the fact that only two years ago the hospitals were re-bedded. Would any private sector operator or someone opening a new office block throw away all the desks? If someone were opening a new factory, would he throw away all the machinery? I am pleased to say that only this week the regional health authority told me that, because of the pressure on the Health Service, it has changed that policy.

My second reason for opposing those demands is that the Conservative party has fought three successive elections as the party that intended to reduce the tax burden on the British people. Despite the reductions in previous Budgets, the standard rate of taxation on the low-paid is now 27p in the pound, to which must be added a 9p national insurance levy. That makes a marginal rate of 36p for poorer people coming into tax. That is far too high and must be reduced. We have promised to reduce the standard rate by 2p in the pound. We must not miss that opportunity this year.

We should also use some of the available resources for a radical reform of the personal taxation structure. In particular, we should achieve equity between married women who have jobs and those who stay at home to look after their families. That would mean a move towards transferable allowances, which would be very expensive. In 1988, the tax system should stop treating women as if they were their husbands' chattels. Married women's investment income should no longer be aggregated. It is nonsense that if a married women with a reasonable investment income divorced her husband and lived in sin with him they would pay less tax. We should stop encouraging young people to live in sin. It is a scandal that young married couples get tax relief on a £30,000 mortgage, yet if they live in sin they can claim tax relief on a £60,000 mortgage.

A Conservative Government should never allow marriage and morality to be penalised by the tax system. I am not prepared to sacrifice in the forthcoming Budget those important objectives so that another £2 billion or £3 billion can be poured into the bottomless pit of the Health Service with no guarantee that patient care will improve. Indeed, it is extremely likely that most of it will be gobbled up by wage increases.

Despite the remarks of Opposition Members, 42 per cent. is too high a proportion of GDP to go on public spending. Several points particularly worry me. The social security budget is for £48·5 billion and we still do not have adequate control of some of that massive budget. In some cases, we do not even know the cost of benefits to certain people. Recently I tabled a written question, asking the Department what the cost to the Exchequer was of social security payments made to citizens of the Irish Republic. The answer was, "We do not know." I thought that that might be reasonable and that perhaps the Department did not differentiate between one country and another, so I asked what was the total cost to the Exchequer of social security payments paid to non-United Kingdom citizens. Again the answer was, "We do not know."

The next day I read in a newspaper that hundreds of Nigerians were registering as students at a bogus educational establishment and were using social security payments for their fees. That is appalling and action should be taken to ascertain the cost—I am amazed that we do not know the cost — and to stop subsidising feckless foreigners.

There is an unfair imbalance in public expenditure between the four countries of the United Kingdom, and the Select Committee referred to this matter in paragraph 11 of its report. We have now received a paper from the Treasury which provides some illuminating figures. Naturally, some expenditure cannot be allocated, but that which can shows that in England we spend £1,967 per person from public funds, in Scotland £2,518, in Wales £2,235 and in Northern Ireland no less than £2,939.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): What about Bridlington?

Mr. Townend: I shall deal with Bridlington in a minute.

Northern Ireland is clearly a special case, but the arguments that Scotland and Wales should have a higher level of expenditure than England because they are less prosperous must be challenged. Without doubt, Scotland is now more prosperous than many parts of England, particularly the north of England, such as Yorkshire and Humberside, where my constituency is situated.

We on the Select Committee asked the Treasury to provide a breakdown of public expenditure per capita for the English regions. It is not available, but the Treasury supplied some illuminating figures for certain services. They are a little out of date, because the last year for which they are available is 1984-85. What was most interesting were the figures for health expenditure. In Scotland, the figure amounted to £350 per person, whereas in Yorkshire it was only £260. That imbalance must be rectified on the ground of equity, and in the process the Government may make some savings in public expenditure.

Mr. Wigley: Does the hon. Gentleman realise that the high level of per capita expenditure on social security in Wales is a result of unemployment? In my constituency, we have 24 per cent. unemployment. The costs associated with that will come right when Government policies start working in Wales. Does he accept that the items that are not broken down by the Treasury include defence and procurement expenditure, 57 per cent. of which is spent in south-east England?

Mr. Townend: The hon. Gentleman is making my point. My figures related to health, not social security. The position in the north of England is no better than that in Wales, so it is not right or equitable that Scotland and Wales should get such a high level of per capita spending at the expense of the north of England.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): Will my hon. Friend acknowledge that there is a reason other than equity for looking at the disparity in expenditure between England and Scotland? The point was made by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), who said that the Health Service in Scotland was facing growing waiting lists, despite the significantly higher level of expenditure per capita on health that Scotland enjoys compared with England.

Mr. Townend: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The other reason why this happens is that Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland have a Minister in the Cabinet who gets a hand in the till on their behalf, whereas we in the north have not.

My one small criticism is the cost of the EEC to the United Kingdom. I am grateful that the Government have provided us with costs, but over the years this settlement will clearly be expensive to the United Kingdom. I would be less than honest if I did not say I was disappointed that the Prime Minister gave in and agreed to the new proposals. That will enable the Commission to increase spending by some 25 per cent. I wonder what my right hon. Friends on the Front Bench would say if an hon. Member suggested that we should increase our public spending by 21 per cent. I can imagine their horror.

Finally, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will convey to the Chief Secretary our view that his task is difficult and that we appreciate that he is under great pressure. Despite my feeling that expenditure should be reined in a little more, he is probably being as tough as he can be in the circumstances, and he certainly has our wholehearted support. I only hope that one day, when he becomes the Secretary of State in a big spending Department, as I am sure he will, he will not change the view that he has put forward in the House today.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): The Chief Secretary gave one of the shortest speeches on record in defence of his Government's expenditure plans. He danced from stepping stone of statistic to statistic while the torrents of industrial and economic chaos raged below. He could not leave the Dispatch Box for his seat on the Bench fast enough. He scuttled from one set of topics to another as quickly as possible. No wonder, when spending in Scotland on industry, housing and health is projected to fall. No wonder, when the budget of the Scottish Office will fall by £69 million next year and by £317 million by 1991. Would that Scottish unemployment were falling at the same rate.

It is a disgrace that neither the Chief Secretary nor his colleagues showed any contrition over the appalling state of the NHS in Scotland. The hon. Members for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) and for Slough (Mr. Watts) whined, as is the wont of many Conservatives, about the higher costs of the NHS in Scotland. I invite both hon. Gentlemen and their hon. Friends to visit my constituency and learn some of the facts, such as that in Scotland the average health authority covers twice the area of a health authority in England and Wales. As a consequence, costs, including overheads, are higher.

The reality behind that level of spending in Scotland is plain for all to see. In hospital wards in my constituency, old people have been left lying in bed in the morning because nurse shortages have reached critical levels. However, the Government are not planning to do anything to reduce long-term hospital waiting lists, which are now standing at a record 81,000 in Scotland. The Government have done nothing to increase the number of National Health Service beds, which have been cut by 5 per cent. in Scotland during the past decade.

The Government are precipitating the crisis in the National Health Service, not only in Lothian but throughout the country. Tomorrow, Lothian health board is to discuss 500 job cuts to balance its budget. Those job losses will not be restricted to non-medical staff, bad though that would be. Mr. Winston Taylor, the general manager of Lothian health board, has spelt out that no group among surgeons, nurses, consultants, doctors and ancillary staff will be excluded from those cuts. That is happening in a health board that the Minister responsible for health in Scotland has said is the third best funded in the whole of the United Kingdom. In Scotland, the Government are investing 1 per cent. less in health than is needed to keep pace with costs.

[Mr. Nigel Griffiths]

Of course, the Government have a magic solution to health problems in Scotland—privatisation. That policy has less support in Scotland even than in the Tory Reform Group. Seven out of 10 Scots reject privatisation, which has been condemned by the chairmen of the health boards who have been appointed by the Tory Secretary of State, such as Mr. Hector MacKenzie of Argyll and Clyde health board. However, the Government still persist in that policy, knowing that it will bring chaos, but caring not a whit, and no wonder, because no Cabinet Ministers use the National Health Service when they are ill.

What has the Chancellor promised for higher and further education? He has promised more—more cuts. Is it not bad enough that the university budget in Scotland, and in the rest of the United Kingdom, has been cut by 13 per cent. in the past four years alone? University budgets in Scotland have been cut by more than one fifth. The Government's public expenditure plans offer nothing to Glasgow university, which is already suffering a cut of 8 per cent. The Government's plans do nothing to enhance the reputation of Edinburgh university, which has lost 11·5 per cent. of its budget. The Government offer only despair to Aberdeen university, which has lost one quarter of its budget in four years. This week, the Edinburgh university court is meeting to discuss further cuts of nearly £3 million. That is the reality behind the Government's public expenditure plans.

We know that the Chancellor is not alone in taking pride in those facts. Japan is rejoicing about them. That country has more than double the number of university places that are made available to young people here. The Chancellor is receiving support from the United States of America, France, West Germany and even Taiwan. All those countries are pulling way ahead of us in providing university places and investing in their young people.

Even if the Government are not committed to placing university funding on a proper footing, surely they should at least respond to the requests for assistance in persuading private industry to invest in universities? I know that that topic is dear to the hearts of the Chancellor and his Cabinet colleagues. I welcome the relief in taxation on one-off grants to universities from companies and some review of the VAT that is still levied on gifts of equipment to university departments and laboratories. If the Government can do no more, they would at least gain a little respect by conceding those small benefits.

Housing barely rated a mention in the Chief Secretary's speech. The Government's plans have brought despair to housing authorities and to the millions of people who live in overcrowded, substandard and inadequate accommodation. About 330,000 council houses in Scotland need modernising, and the figure runs into millions for the United Kingdom as a whole. Some have dangerous electrical wiring; in others, windows are rotting in their frames. More than 300,000 Scots and millions of people in the United Kingdom live in homes that need urgent and major structural repairs. In many, water seeps down the walls; dampness destroys the fabric of the buildings, rots funiture, clothes and bedding and eats away at children's lungs.

However, the statement makes less than £465 million available to housing in Scotland—that is a 2 per cent. cut—and it represents only half the money that every housing expert in Scotland agrees is needed. Every local authority, housing association and residents' group has begged the Government to use some of their windfall money to invest in our housing, with all the jobs that would flow as a consequence.

Today, when everyone in Britain is begging the Government to invest in our industries, services and people, Conservative Members have spoken like the tired old politicians that they are, ignoring the facts that stare them in the face—[Interruption.]—laughing with scorn at the problems facing millions of people, not only those on the dole in this country, but those who live in the substandard houses that I have mentioned.

People who are begging for jobs visit their job centres, but the Government know that the jobs simply are not there. Again, I extend an invitation to the hon. Member for Bridlington, who is sneering and laughing, to visit the job-centre in my constituency——

Mr. John Townend rose——

Mr. Griffiths: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment. I invite him to come to the jobcentre in my constituency to see the shortage of jobs and then to watch the dole queues.

Mr. Townend: I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I was laughing at the comment that he made about myself and my colleagues being old and tired politicians; I was not laughing at the arguments that the hon. Gentleman was making. However, I remind him, as a young man, that one is not always as old as one looks. One is as old as one feels.

Mr. Griffiths: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has not chosen to hide his ignorance under a bushel.

The fact is that the Government have brought despair and misery, and have done so for years, with the excuse that the money was not available and that the cuts were necessary. Now, when we find that the money is available, we see the real face of the Government—the uncaring face. Now that the money is available, not only will they not invest in our housing and take people off the homeless lists, but they will not invest in our Health Service to keep people off the waiting lists. In fact, as we all know, their investment is in those who have high incomes and high capital and savings. The Government's concern is to ensure that people who want to invest in forestry gain more respect in terms of tax concessions than individuals who want to invest in their own jobs and go to work.

On 15 March, the Government have a chance to put the nation's resources to good use. We hope that they will, but, sadly, we fear that they will not.

6.47 pm

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): I begin by congratulating my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on his most able and lucid speech. I agreed with virtually all that he said. I hope that nothing that I say in my brief remarks will detract from that. In presenting his statement, my right hon. Friend must surely have had one of the easiest tasks of any Chief Secretary for some years, because a buoyant economy has enabled progress to be made in almost every area. That certainly includes the Health Service. However, as has been voiced in many quarters, and not only today, the reality is that there is an acute problem in many areas, not because of mismanagement or overspending, but because of serious underfunding in many areas.

As an example, I take one of the health authorities covering my constituency, Bassetlaw district health authority. During the past two years it has consistently improved its services at the same time as reducing its costs by more than £250,000. That has been done by testing many of its services against competitive tenders in the private sector, reducing duplication of services and reducing its administrative and clerical staff. All new posts are seriously scrutinised. That is the background.

Unlike many Opposition Members, I am not seeking an open-ended commitment to the funding of wage awards in the public sector in the Health Service, but the fact is that last year the funding of only 90 per cent. of the pay awards that were nationally agreed put my authority, and no doubt many others, in extreme difficulty. Expecting the health authorities to make up that shortfall by paying the extra 10 per cent. of salaries for doctors, nurses and other ancillary workers has meant a shortfall in my health authority of some £700,000 this year.

I agree with the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee that if wage awards are accepted by the Government they should be funded directly by the taxpayer. Our health authorities, and mine in particular, would not be in the sorry state that they are today if such wage awards were funded directly. To expect them to find sums of this order, after their year's allocation has been made, is to put them in an unfair and unrealistic position if, at the same time, they are expected to balance their books.

In my constituency, as a direct result of that, the casualty department in Retford hospital was closed about two weeks ago and an elderly persons' ward is to be closed. Here is not the place to go into detail about the hardship that that will cause my constituents, but it is the place to tell my right hon. Friend of the great damage which the serious underfunding of pay awards is doing to the public's perception of the Government's total health care provision.

It gives me no pleasure to say so, but it gives me even less pleasure to attempt to justify to my constituents the closure of a casualty ward when we hear from the Government that our plans for the expansion of the NHS will improve patient care. I accept that statement, but it is difficult, in the light of realities, particularly of underfunding, to explain the one in the light of the other.

There will be calls from the Opposition to make 15 March National Health Service day. I hope that both sides of the House will resist that temptation. What the public do not realise, and the Opposition should realise, is that Budget day is for raising or lowering and collecting taxes and revenue. We hope that there will be increased expenditure on the NHS next year, but the fact is that how we spend our revenue is not a matter for the Budget.

Nevertheless, it would unacceptable to the public generally if my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer should choose to reduce income tax without at the same time giving some broad indication, this year above all, of how that reduction in taxation might be accompanied by some extra funding in other areas. The pubic are not always wrong. They have a legitimate expectation of Budget day, and this year, above all, we should be thinking about fulfilling some of their expectations for the NHS.

Where does my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary's statement today leave my casualty ward and my old people's ward in Retford hospital? The nub of any Member of Parliament's problems is how his constituency is affected. Do the expenditure plans mean that I shall be standing here in a year's time saying that they have been re-opened? I very much hope so. If I cannot say that, and if other communities at local level cannot do so either, our fine words, proposals and expenditure plans are bound to ring hollow to the constituents whom we are here to serve. As a loyal supporter of the Government and their policies —there is probably none more loyal—I hope that I shall never have to say that.

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in the debate, particularly as I am a member of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee and so have been involved in the preparation and adoption of the Committee's report on the Government's public expenditure plans. As many hon. Members have said, the report contains many useful points which I hope the Government will take on board. The Chief Secretary referred to some of them, but others need to be referred to, and I hope that I shall be able to do so in the course of my speech.

First, I want to say a few words on the Government's general strategy. In their introduction to the public expenditure White Paper, the Government proudly claim to have consistently reduced public spending as a proportion of GDP. I was glad that the Select Committee none the less incorporated an amendment which pointed out that our public spending as a proportion of GDP is already lower than that of most European countries. According to the statistics that I have seen, it is lower than that of any other EEC country with the exception of Spain. During the past few years, Spanish public expenditure has been increasing and so will probably overtake ours in the next couple of years.

It is also true that in particular sectors, such as health, the average share of all health spending of GDP for OECD countries is about 9 per cent., as against only 6 per cent. in the United Kingdom. If our Government were to reach 9 per cent. of spending on health within the NHS, that would mean an additional £12 billion for the Health Service. Perhaps the Government will take that point into consideration.

Mr. Watts: Will the hon. Lady acknowledge that the figures that she has quoted, I think accurately, were for all spending on health services and that in the other OECD countries there is a much higher proportion of privately funded health expenditure than there is in Britain and that the proportion borne by taxpayers in other OECD countries is broadly the same as it is here?

Ms. Quin: There is indeed a mixed pattern. What the hon. Gentleman says is partly true, but there is no reason why, given the amount of money that the Government have available, expenditure on the Health Service should not be substantially increased. That point has been made by many hon. Members today and that view is shared by some Conservative Members, as was clear from the deliberations of the Select Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) asked, rightly in my view, how long the Government would maintain their commitment to reducing public expenditure as a proportion of GDP. Do they intend to keep that as their goal in perpetuity? Do they have an optimum level which they hope to achieve, or is it a matter of dogma which they will somehow adhere to with no long-term ideal in mind? Like many other speakers, I do not understand why the Government should keep to that tired old approach when the circumstances in respect of the amount of money available to be spent have changed. That point must be emphasised, particularly in the run-up to the Budget.

There appears to be an assumption that cuts, or reducing public expenditure, are good per se. I do not share that assumption, particularly given the present obvious needs in our country. The Government are inconsistent in many of their basic tenets regarding public spending because Ministers have frequently said that revenue determines expenditure. If that is so, when revenue is on the increase and all that extra money is available, why cannot the Government determine expenditure in the public sector?

The Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee's report states that, even if the Government's guidelines were adhered to, it would be possible to increase the planning total by £1 billion or £2 billion without undermining the Government's criterion. Therefore, why will not the Government go down that road? They still appear likely to adhere to their belief in tax cuts as the way forward, yet their figures show that we are not heavily taxed by comparison with other countries and, therefore, there is not a great burden of taxation which needs to be reduced.

Labour Members have spoken eloquently about the needs of the National Health Service and the need fully to fund the nurses' and ancillary workers' pay increases. I agree with everything that they have said in that respect, but there are other examples of underfunding when one considers the Government's public expenditure and their public expenditure plans. Capital spending is the poor relation in their spending plans.

That was pointed out to the Select Committee in written evidence supplied to us. Paragraph 60 of the Select Committee report refers to the decline in capital spending and the projected decline — 5 per cent. for central Government capital spending, and 14 per cent. for local authority capital spending. Nevertheless, I am glad that the Select Committee adopted an amendment which I proposed, that capital spending should be related to needs and, in particular, the need to renew the nation's infrastructure and to provide for its long-term effectiveness.

Many estimates have been made about the amount of money needed to renew our infrastructure. I have seen the figure of £92 billion suggested. That covers the total backlog of repairs in housing and schools, the NHS, roads and water supplies. The reference to water supplies is particularly important because we are faced with the need to renew our out-of-date infrastructure in the water industry and to comply with EEC directives on improving our water quality standards. The Government have failed to come up with a figure for the sum needed to carry out that necessary work. Compliance with European directives would be most helpful in that respect.

The hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), who is no longer present, raised the issue of obtaining from the Treasury a regional breakdown for Scotland, Wales and the English regions. A regional breakdown is necessary, although not for the reasons put forward by the hon. Gentleman. He appeared to imply that unjustified subsidies were being given by the English to Scotland and Wales. I want to see a regional breakdown because, in an absurdly over-centralised country such as England, we can see what is spent in the different standard planning regions in those countries. That information should be available to us, and the Treasury is well able to provide it, if it has the political will to do so.

In a recent debate about the Government's proposals for regional development grants, my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) made many telling points about the amount of public money spent in the south-east of England compared with other regions of England. According to figures in The Economist last April, the highest spending in public administration, defence, education and health in England occurs in the south-east —£884 per head of population. I should like to know whether those figures accord with the Treasury's views. It is important for the inhabitants, particularly of the least prosperous regions of the United Kingdom, that those figures should be made available.

At present, the Labour party has a "Labour listens" campaign. I should like to suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his team that they embark on a "Treasury listens" campaign because, if they did so, they would find that the message that they receive from the general public about taxation and public spending is very different from the message that they are putting forward. It is clear from many opinion polls that the public want to see a properly funded Health Service and that they see that as a greater priority than cutting taxes, particularly those of people who are already well-off.

I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will listen to people and will come up with a Budget that does not favour the already favoured few but provides benefits for the necessary public services upon which we all depend for the future.

7.6 pm

Mr. Patrick Ground (Feltham and Heston): The hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) asked many pertinent questions about the work of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, but it is difficult to believe that it should come as a surprise to her that the Conservative party and the Government believe that the country is heavily taxed by comparison with our main industrial competitors. That is evident merely by comparing the level of tax rates in this country with those of the United States, Japan, France and West Germany.

I challenge the hon. Lady's comment about spending money merely because it is available. I hope that she will agree with me that everyone in the House wishes the right amount to be spent on the Health Service, regardless of whether sums of money happen to be available in any particular budget. It is certainly in the interests of all politicians that the appropriate amount should be spent on the National Health Service.

I agree with the hon. Lady that we should be listening to what people think about the matter. The main issue of the debate is whether a major additional sum should be spent on the Health Service. Opposition Members suggest that we should spend an additional £2 billion over and above the additional complement to the Health Service contained in the expenditure plans.

I wonder whether hon. Members are listening to their constituents accurately and sensitively on this issue. When I discuss with constituents the size of the increase in expenditure on the Health Service since 1979, they are surprised. When I tell them that each family is spending £31 a week out of taxation on the Health Service, they are surprised. It is right to say that the expenditure plans before us for next year involve additional expenditure of £1·50 per family on the Health Service. According to my calculations, expenditure of an additional £2 billion would mean an additional £3 per week for each family. I question whether our constituents want such a large increase to be taken from their pay packets without any choice.

A great campaign has been launched in hospitals in my constituency, as in many others, and many of the letters that I receive from constituents say that they are concerned about waste in the Health Service. They are also rightly concerned about the amount of theft and widespread pilfering. They are concerned about the huge number of administrative staff in the Health Service — over-administration. One letter to me said that we should increase expenditure on the Health Service and that person was prepared to contribute more to it. He suggested that everybody should pay an additional 10p per week for it. I question whether our constituents want to have to pay automatically the additional amounts that have been implied in speeches during the debate.

The Opposition tender such advice to the Government, but one must look at what they did when they were in office. They did not go wild spending money on the Health Service. They set up a Royal Commission, which spent a good deal of time deliberating. It delivered its verdict after the 1979 general election. This is one statement from the report:

"It is misleading to pretend that the NHS can meet all expectations. Hard choices have to be made. It is a prime duty of those concerned in the provision of health care to make it clear to the rest of us what we can reasonably expect."

Listening to Opposition Members, I believe that it is not clear how much more we can expect from the additional £2 billion expenditure that they propose. Listening to the health authorities in my area and to the health administrators, I find it difficult to see what they think they are delivering now with the money that is available, and it is impossible to get a clear idea of what one would obtain with more expenditure.

There are the most extraordinary variations in what is being provided in the Health Service throughout the country. Many things that are provided on the NHS are highly questionable. In Charing Cross hospital, sex change operations are performed. People come from many parts of the country to have them. The variations in community dentistry and family planning between different health authorities are striking, and are not accounted for by differences of quality or requirements in the areas concerned.

I support the efforts that have been made by the Government to get a clearer idea of the services that should be provided and to improve the allocation of resources. I welcome the statement, in the first volume of the document before us, that pilot schemes for the better management of clinical resources are under way.

I remind hon. Members that the Griffiths report in 1983 said:

"Concern with levels of service, quality of product, meeting budgets . . . motivating and rewarding staff, research and development and the long-term viability of the undertaking"

were crucial matters. The report said that the NHS

"still lacks any real continuous evaluation of its performance against criteria such as those set out above."

Apart from profit, those are all criteria which the Griffiths report said any successful private business would follow during its work, and which it would regard as crucial.

I remind the House that the Griffiths report stated categorically that it was necessary to "involve the clinicians more closely in the management process consistent with clinical freedom for clinical practice. Clinicians must participate fully in decisions on the use of resources."

From my observation of the Health Service, I believe that that is simply not happening in most parts of the Service. The report stressed the need for closer involvement of doctors, which was "so critical to effective management at local level."

I have endeavoured to follow the progress of the pilot schemes that were mentioned in the Griffiths report, through the various circulars that have been issued by the Department of Health and Social Security. It looks as if they are running into great difficulties. In several cases, they have plainly failed and run into great problems because the new material, the new management information, was produced not visibly for the benefit of the medical staff, but for the benefit of the administrators. Apparently, considerable resentment has arisen between the medical side and the administration, which, in some cases, has led to the modification or even abandonment of the process. There is tremendous scope for improvement in the Health Service with the involvement of the professionals in the crucial decisions of management which have to be taken in the course of the service.

In the West Middlesex hospital—one of the hospitals serving my constituency—the consultants have found it necessary to pay for an advertisement in the local newspaper to express their views about the way in which the Health Service is being run. That is indicative of the fact that they are not able to exercise proper influence in the management of the health authority. They do not feel that they have an influence. Inquiries reveal—they are confirmed by the administration — that they are not playing the role in management decisions which was envisaged in the Griffiths report and which it is clear from all the subsequent reports is crucial to the proper running of the service. Indeed, one consultant told me that he felt that there was a division in the Health Service between authority and knowledge and that many of those taking the decisions did not have the necessary knowledge to decide on priorities.

Therefore, I was interested to read an account by Ian McColl in The Times of 16 February of what happened in Guy's hospital. I believe that Guy's hospital has been carrying out the experiment suggested in the Griffiths report and that effectively the doctors have taken over the management of the hospital. Mr. McColl said that between 1974 and 1978, the finance department had expanded from 30 to 90 employees, precisely at a time when computers were being introduced, which should have led to economies. He said:

"When the hospital became part of Lewisham and North Southwark district health authority the district's finance department contained 200 people. Its performance was considerably improved when its numbers were reduced to 105 as a result of a sustained campaign by surgeons."

He described the restrictive practices of the nurses in preventing him from operating on someone who needed an operation for which no staff was necessary. He described how the surgeon got round the problem:

"He brought the patient with her physiotherapist daughter to the hospital, put them into surgeon's clothes and walked into an empty operating theatre. There he carried out the operation under a local anaesthetic without the patient suffering a single twinge of discomfort. She then climbed down from the table and was driven home to an awaiting gin and tonic, delighted to have bypassed four sets of hospital workers. Next day the nurses filed a complaint against the surgeon for behaving inhumanely to the patient."

It takes a professional with experience and knowledge to find his way though professional restrictive practices. It takes a professional, or perhaps a group of professionals, with experience and judgment to make sensible decisions about what is important and unimportant in the services provided by a department.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I am no specialist, but what on earth would have happened if something had gone wrong?

Mr. Ground: The surgeon was prepared to take the responsibility; indeed, a surgeon takes the responsibility anyway. It was not for the nurses to lay down regulations. Here someone took responsibility for the operation and rightly saw his way through a lot of nonsense.

There is a great deal of nonsense in the National Health Service. It requires professionals to make choices about what is important and unimportant. If it is left solely to the administrators, or to the administrators operating in an atmosphere of hostility and alienation from the professional staff, correct decisions will not be made. Therefore, I urge the Government, notwithstanding the difficulties, to persevere with their inquiry and research and to ensure that more sensible decisions are made and that the aspirations of the Griffiths report are continually borne in mind so that we will have better value for money and more suitable use of the resources of the Health Service.

If that process is followed, the Health Service will be in a better position to say how much more is required and what services can be provided. At present it is virtually impossible to say from the information available what services can be provided or what other services could be provided with an additional £x million. It is important that the Government should persevere with the inquiry. It is wholly in tune with the approach of constituents who are looking for better value from the National Health Service and who do not necessarily want to pay vast sums for it out of their limited resources.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I agree with one or two points made by the hon. and learned Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground). We should decide on the absolute level of service that we want from the Health Service, as opposed to fixing a figure and fitting everything else in. I am not sure that I agree that the message I am getting from my constituents is the same as the message that the hon. and learned Gentleman is getting from his. As someone who lived in Heston for four years, I have some knowledge of his constituency as well as mine. I have no doubt that, faced with the choice in my county of Gwynedd, where five hospitals are scheduled for closure because of the financial crisis of the health authority, my constituents would rather retain income tax at its present level than have a reduction in income tax and face cuts in Health Service provision. We face real cuts in the service, not just rationalisation, in my county, as the health authority has acknowledged.

I accept what the hon. and learned Gentleman said about the cost of administration in the Health Service. In my area much of the increase in administrative costs has arisen in recent years. The Government have been in office for nine years. If the administration of the Health Service is in such difficulty, the Government should look into their own court to put things right.

The procedure that we follow on public expenditure and budgeting causes problems. This has been touched on earlier in the debate. In an article by Sarah Hogg in, I think, The Independent recently, under the heading

"When two bites at the Budget are rather worse than one",

she made a perceptive comment:

"The first and long-standing problem is Britain's Budget is extraordinarily misnamed."

Later, she said:

"Under this curious system, spending departments compete for cash before the Treasury decides what to do with the rest."

That is part of the problem that we face. The White Paper was published in the autumn, and now there is the possibility for more money being available, but the Government are determined to keep to the spending programme that they laid down.

From the comments of the Chief Secretary in opening the debate, it appeared that he was unwilling to give a commitment that money will be available to fund in full the increase in nurses' pay, because he does not know how much that will be. However, on 15 March the Chancellor is prepared to make a decision about reducing income tax. In other words, the Government's priority is not to ensure that the NHS provides an adequate service, with an adequate cash availability as determined at the end of April or when the figures are available, but rather what the Government want to do politically on Budget day about the public sector borrowing requirement and income tax rates. I should have thought that that priority was wrong.

I concede immediately that the Government are taking a sensible step in changing the procedure for the future so that these things will be better phased. That is welcome and long overdue. Having said that, I should have thought that within the ambit of the figures we are talking about it would be possible for the Government to say now that they are prepared to fund in full any wage award.

After all, the wage award that we are discussing is not thousands of millions of pounds. The press mentions £300 million, £400 million or £500 million. I should have thought that it was within the scope of the contingency reserve and flexibility on the PSBR for the Government to give such a commitment, and then to be that much more cautious, if necessary, about tax reductions. Tax levels could be adjusted next year, or even in next autumn's statement. Surely that would be more sensible than making the level of service dependent on residual cash availability.

The hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) pointed out that people in Wales and Scotland, and possibly in regions of England, were getting too much public expenditure. The White Paper will be of more comfort to him than to us in Wales. What we heard a few moments ago from the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths), also applies to Wales. The figure for the planning total in Wales shows a decrease for 1990-91 from the 1987-88 outturn, whereas the overall planning total in the same table shows an increase from £141,000 million to £151,000 million—an increase of some 7 per cent.

In other words, we are facing a decrease in the Welsh Office departmental budget, which deals largely with health and personal social services — the budget for which in the United Kingdom as a whole, according to the DHSS figures, is increasing from £18,000 million to £19,000 million—with education in Wales—in England, the education budget has been increased—and also with housing, the budget for which in England has been increased from £2,350 million to £2,620 million. There is also an increase in England for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

We have grave misgivings about the effect of the White Paper in Wales. As I said in an earlier intervention, the Dwyfor area in my constituency has an unemployment rate of 24 per cent. That is not a tolerable level, and Government intervention is needed to overcome it. However, over recent years, the funds available for regional policy have been run down. Wales has seen a reduction from £154 million in 1981-82—at 1986 prices —to £30·5 million in the 1987-88 financial year, and the figure for next year is £24·8 million. This means that it will be approximately one sixth of the 1981-82 level, at the very time when we need more money to help to provide jobs.

Conservative Members have referred to the cost of the recently negotiated EEC package. In the grant settlement for lesser developed regions in the EEC, although the overall figure has been doubled, there has been a tacit understanding that the money will go on limited areas only —perhaps to Spain and Portugal and, within the United Kingdom, to Northern Ireland. We fear that there will not be enough money available to compensate, in areas of high unemployment, for the worsening position that will arise for example, from changes in the agricultural regime.

I feel, as does my party, that the White Paper provides inadequate money to deal with the need to regenerate the economy in Wales. I know that my colleagues in the Scottish National party are also concerned that, while United Kingdom expenditure is expected to increase, Scottish Office expenditure is expected to decrease by £300 million by 1990-91.

Let me add — this is particularly geared to the comments of the hon. Member for Bridlington—that in Wales personal income per head is also well below the United Kingdom average. The United Kingdom average was taken as 100 in 1975, when the figure for Wales was then 90·5. By 1985, the gap had increased, and we were 12·5 per cent. below the figure for the United Kingdom. [Interruption.] I accept that the same would be true for the west midlands, as I see the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) commenting on my remarks. Part of the change in that area is also due to structural unemployment.

Specific Government action by way of public expenditure is needed to try to overcome the problem. Income tax reductions will not be adequate, because they do least in the areas with the lowest incomes.

The main theme of today's debate is the priority that we should or should not give to the National Health Service. In his Budget statement last year, the Chancellor said:

> "We have now reached what I judge to be its appropriate destination—a PSBR of 1 per cent. of GDP. My aim will be to keep it there over the years ahead. This will maintain a degree of fiscal prudence".—[Official Report, 17 March 1987; Vol. 112, c. 818.]

If we retained a PSBR of 1 per cent. of GDP, that would give the Government the flexibility that they need to fund in full the nurses' pay settlement. It would help to meet the other requirements of the medical fraternity—on whose behalf representations have been made by the British Medical Association and others—for an additional £1·5 billion for the NHS.

The background to the hospital closures in my county was made clear by the consultants appointed by the Welsh Office, who said that the financial problems of the Gwynedd health authority had arisen from a shortfall of £2 million in the funding of wage awards over the past two or three years. There was a further estimate of a £750,000 shortfall in the coming year. We read in the Financial Times of 14 January that the Secretary of State for Social Services has acknowledged that the NHS needed more cash. The Chief Secretary virtually acknowledged that earlier in the debate when he suggested, with a nod and a wink to health authorities, that they should not go ahead with closures and reductions in services because of the possibility that by the end of April it might be possible to fund the wage award in full.

Surely Budget tax reductions can be made a little more prudent so that enough money is at hand for a total commitment, to be given now, as to full funding and for the Health Service to know that it will be adequately financed for the coming year. Surely some of the sillier closure decisions—not just in my patch, but throughout the United Kingdom—can be replaced by a coherent approach to the future of health care.

Mr. Ground: Is the hon. Gentleman really saying that he thinks there is a serious risk of five hospitals that serve his area being shut without any replacement?

Mr. Wigley: I shall not go into too much detail, as other hon. Members wish to speak, but I have in my hand one of several consultative documents which deal with the future of Caernarfon cottage hospital, whose closure is proposed. The hospital is greatly valued by the community, as cottage hospitals generally are. People want to retain such facilities, which are close to them. It is important for the Treasury to note that some 40 or 50 people who would be going to the hospital for short-term care—people who live alone with disabilities or in old age—will probably have to go into institutional care if that cottage hospital closes. They will probably have to go into private nursing homes, which will cost the Treasury between £200 and £250 a week per person in supplementary pensions. In other words, it will cost about £10,000 a year per person and for 50 people, a total of £500,000 per annum. That is twice the saving that will result from the hospital's closure. However, the saving will affect the Welsh Office budget, whereas the expenditure on supplementary pensions will come out of the DHSS central budget.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Lilley): If these people need only short-term care in hospital facilities, why will they need long-term care in private facilities?

Mr. Wigley: For a simple reason. These people either live alone and have nobody to look after them, or they have relatives to look after them. Without respite care—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have heard of that — which is relevant both to the elderly and to the disabled, they could not continue to live at home. These estimates have been given by the general practitioners in the area at the consultation meeting, arranged by the health authority, which we had two weeks ago. The doctors said that these people would have to go into some form of institutional care and, given that the other hospitals are full, the only possibility would be private sector homes, and almost all those people are dependent on supplementary pensions. The Government would have to pay from another pocket to provide a saving of half that expenditure for the Welsh Office.

I did not intend to go down that avenue, but I was invited to do so by the hon. and learned Member for Feltham and Heston, and I can set out the details for the other hospitals if he wishes me to do so. However, I think that I have said enough to underline the nonsense that occurs when decisions are taken in isolation. Decisions should be taken in the overall context of the various departmental expenditure responsibilities of central Government and as part of a long-term coherent pattern of decisions in both capital and revenue expenditure, and not as a short-term expedient to meet the cash crisis that is hitting the Health Service. That is the background to this debate, and that is the message that the Treasury should take from the debate.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): There is no doubt that the Government have shown, through the Treasury team in particular, tremendous political judgment and courage, and a great deal of skill. As with all politicians, there has also been a good helping of luck, without which skill and good judgment rarely come to anything. Because of that, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor finds himself, as against his plans laid out a year ago, when he talked about a PSBR of £4 billion, in one of the most enviable positions of any Chancellor. Not only can he, quite rightly, pay back borrowed money to the tune of a few billion pounds; he can also cut taxation and change the basis of taxation, which has been so airy-fairy and unjust. He can spend a few billion on that and then he can also decide on what to spend another billion or two that he has to spare.

The decisions that we all make, whether we in our private lives or Governments, are not just fiscal and economic, but moral. That is what politics is all about. One comes into politics to make decisions about what one wants — whether it is defence, housing or health. Whatever the problems, they raise moral and political issues.

My position on what should happen to some of this money has always been clear. It is most irritating when people talk about destroying the Health Service or deliberately starving it. When Nye Bevan was the first Minister of Health on that long road in the adventure of freeing people from the worry of ill health, the first budget for the Health Service was £150 million. Under a Government who, according to some people, wish to destroy the Health Service, its budget is £22,000 million. When we came into office, it was £7,000 million.

That does not mean that anybody is destroying the Health Service. However, it is still not enough. One could always use the argument, "How long is a piece of string?" There is no doubt that if the budget suddenly went up to £30,000 million in one year there would still be somebody saying, "But my daughter is waiting for an operation," or, "My husband needs an operation," or, "My varicose veins need operating on." Whatever sum we spend will never be sufficient for everything, yet some people in high places keep on giving figures as though they will act as a Chinese good luck charm and people with complaints will go away.

In the report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, we recommend that the Health Service should be rigorously investigated. I backed that recommendation because two things have to be done. They are not decisions that we in this House alone can make. They are decisions in which people beyond our boundaries—the taxpayers — will have to be involved, because the sums are so large. That is why anybody who suggests that the investigation into the Health Service should be internal does not understand some of the decisions that will have to be made. They involve more than politicians and doctors. If wars are too immportant to be left to generals, there is no doubt that the running of the Health Service is too important to be left to doctors, nurses and administrators.

Medicine has advanced greatly. Let me give two examples of the sort of problems with which so many of us in Parliament, whether in government or not, have to grapple. Let us think of a young girl—if she were my daughter, no amount of money would be too great to keep her alive because she is a human being—who will have £100,000 a year spent on her. Is it spent to keep her alive or to keep her in existence? For somebody who has had a heart transplant, £3,500 a day is spent on anti-rejection drugs. A few years ago, one might have talked about going to the moon as being more likely than people having heart and lung transplants.

That is why the investigation that we shall need so that we take people with us on the need for these costs will have to transcend parliamentarians throwing figures like confetti at a wedding. We need to make decisions, because the growth of the private sector is not enough. I subscribe to it and, thank God, of late it has been a waste of money, and long may that be so. Private health alone will not be able to cope with the nation's health. Anybody who thinks that it can is living in a different world. At least 70 per cent. of health care will have to be provided by us as taxpayers.

When Governments or politicians say that £22,000 million is enough, I think of what happens at the Queen Elizabeth hospital, where cancer beds are being closed. A sister there, known affectionately as Ike, each morning acts as a god. She rings one person and says. "Yes, you can come," and rings another and says, "No, you can't come in." The chances of survival for somebody who comes in are 80 per cent. but for somebody who cannot they fall to 55 per cent. Those are the decisions that sisters and doctors make each day, in spite of the £22 billion—as against the £150 million of the happy days of Nye Bevan's launching of the Health Service — that we are now spending.

These are not the decisions of a mean Government. How can they be mean, when the money allocated has increased by as much as it has? But parliamentarians are human beings. In God's name, we are sent here as human beings to talk on behalf of other human beings because we care for the system, we like our people and we enjoy our areas. It is our duty to tell the Chancellor and the Treasury team, who have done so well, that they face a happy morning because the money that is available means that we can now do two things.

We can properly and rigorously investigate where the Health Service is going in the next 20 or 30 years. It may not be as well administered as it should be, but I saw figures in a letter to The Times showing that our management costs are 4·5 per cent. They are 12 per cent. in France and 21 per cent. in the United States. Of course, there may be too many administrators and porters—let us examine those things. We are running ambulances that cost more than hiring a Rolls-Royce. Let us examine that, too. It is right that we should, because this concerns other people's money. That is tomorrow's problem — it certainly needs examining—but today people have their needs.

By all means, let us reduce taxation. The Government very properly did that and it fuelled the economic recovery that is going on now. Let us go on reducing taxation; we can do that on the Government's own figures. Let us, as all prudent Governments want to do, reduce borrowing. On the Government's figures we can do that, too, but still, if we have the moral will and the commitment to our people, we can also give extra money for the nation's health. In the end, however much wealth one has, without health one is dead. In the final analysis, it is not increased expenditure that matters—not even if it is a 30 per cent. increase. When one is dead, one is 100 per cent. dead.

We have the money; let us make sure more people live. All things are possible this year. If we have the will, we have the ways and the means.

7.52 pm

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): The public expenditure White Paper must be seen in the context of 1979, with that year being used as a benchmark. The Government manifesto of that year stated that the state takes too much of the nation's income, and that its share should be readily reduced. The question on all our lips today is: to what level? The report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee does not accept that public expenditure should be reduced further; nor does it accept the underlying assumption that a reduction of public expenditure is in itself desirable.

In the past, the Government have said that revenue determines expenditure, which I consider erroneous. However, if it is true, we should take them at their word. If we believe the estimates that are going around, that between £5 billion and £12 billion is ready and waiting for the Chancellor's Budget, the Government are not even obeying their own dictum. Their perversity of approach is manifest; it is nothing more than a blind act of faith.

The public expenditure White Paper shows an antipathy to the public services. According to the manifesto of June 1987, the White Paper plans to spend £1·3 billion less this year than the Government promised at the election. Only the other week on the radio waves the Home Secretary lectured us on morality. I suggest that there is a selective myopia in the Government's non-recognition of their moral duty to supply what is required for the greater good of the people of the country.

Public opinion is overwhelmingly in favour of such investment. Only last week an opinion poll in The Daily Telegraph said that 70 per cent. of people would pay more tax if they were comfortable in the knowledge that all was well with the National Health Service.

The reams of statistics that the Prime Minister grinds out at the Dispatch Box are not convincing. The debilitating effect of the lack of provision in the health and social services is daily manifesting itself. The Prime Minister's rhetoric should be contrasted with the veracity of the statement by the Secretary of State for Social Services, who spoke to the Young Conservatives conference at Scarborough only two weeks ago. He said: "It seemed to me clear that, as many have said, we needed extra resources."

If the Secretary of State for Social Services, who is supposed to be at the helm of his great Department, can see that for himself, what do the people who use the services daily think? There is a link between the Secretary of State's comment and the gut response of the public, as shown in the opinion poll that I mentioned.

Mr. Watts: Will the hon. Gentleman continue the quotation, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had to for his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) during Prime Minister's questions last week, as far as the bit when the Secretary of State explains whence he was going to obtain the additional resources — charges for dental and optical care? Will he also explain that the Secretary of State's comments were in context of primary health care, not hospital services?

Mr. McFall: He said:

"I secured my discussions with the Chancellor for the next three years through the public expenditure run, increases on top of all of the last eight years of something like £570 million . . . But I did not think that was enough."

The Government say that they are increasing the health budget by £1 billion next year, but the public expenditure plans are meaningless unless proper allowance is made for inflation—and it is not.

The commentary on public expenditure for Scotland was issued on 17 February. It states that the health budget must stay 1 per cent. ahead of inflation merely to keep pace. But the Secretary of State for Scotland announced that the budget would be only 0·7 per cent. greater than inflation, which leaves a shortfall of 0·3 per cent. Translated into cash terms, Scotland's health budget will be £85 million short next year.

Let us also examine the waiting lists in Scotland, taking 1979 as our benchmark. Waiting lists then were 71,247. In March 1987 the waiting list was 81,324, an increase of 26 per cent. in eight years. The availability of beds has fallen by more than 3,000 — by 5 per cent. Comparing the waiting lists increase with the decrease in availability of beds, we can only conclude that, whatever the Government say they are spending on health in Scotland, it is not enough. In my health authority area, waiting lists have increased and there are fewer beds.

Scotland today experienced a protest by nurses and ancillary workers. More than 15,000 protested in Edinburgh. There were more than 20,000 in Glasgow and 5,000 in Dundee and almost 10,000 in Aberdeen, making a total of more than 50,000. The protest is not galvanised or led by a minority. It involves people who regard the Health Service as our most precious public asset and who perceive that the Government have nothing but wanton disregard for it. The turnout is a tribute to what the people of Scotland feel about their Health Service.

There is a debate about privatisation in Scotland. The Minister has put out a circular demanding health boards to put their services out to tender. But let us be clear: privatisation is not about quality. It is about the lowest common denominator of provision. In my constituency, the Vale of Leven district general hospital has been asked to put its catering services out to tender. Two years ago, management and unions made an agreement for the following three years. One year of the agreement has yet to run, but, in spite of local agreements, the Minister has seen fit to intervene and order the health board to put services out to tender. That is not an act of concern for the Health Service but sheer dogmatism.

There is no enthusiasm for privatisation in Scotland. It is regarded as a distraction from the main issue, which, as in England and Wales, is resources. If it stands still, the health budget is too small to cope with the demand, whether it arises out of demographic change, increased services or increased medical sophistiçation. I suggest that the Secretary of State is being dogmatic—nay, obtuse—when he claims that public expenditure in Scotland is rising.

The Secretary of State is clearly being obtuse, because somebody has knocked his proclamation on the head; that somebody is none other than the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose figures show that Scottish Office funding will fall by £70 million by next year and by £317 million by 1990-91. The commentary on public expenditure for Scotland makes a bleak story. No area is spared. Spending on Scottish industry is down in cash terms by £2 million, from £120 million to £118 million. Once inflation is taken into account, that deficit becomes £7·5 million, so the opportunity for investment in infrastructure in Scotland is seriously diminished.

Housing has suffered. Since 1979, investment has decreased by 64 per cent. In Scotland, investment will drop next year by £84 million. The commentary reveals that, whereas in 1979 8,607 houses were completed in Scotland, only 3,500 were completed in 1987—a cut of more than 100 per cent. Whereas there were 7,871 house starts in 1979, there were only 3,900 in 1987—a cut of almost the same magnitude. Notwithstanding the fact that the Scottish housing programme is in crisis, the Government have decided to cut, and cut again.

Nor is education spared—£38 million has been lost. We have already heard about cuts in universities from the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths). My region is considering school closures because it has pared spending to the bone and has no other option. The Government's inner-city programme has been described, aptly, as a crusade without cash. But every aspect of their policy is a crusade without cash, because each capital investment programme except that for prison building is being cut.

In addition, it is a crusade without heart or concern, in which people are absent from the main stage erected by the Government. We should forget statistics for a moment and consider people and what the White Paper does for them. Sadly, it does nothing for the overall benefit of individuals. Quite simply, the policies we see enunciated are not the politics of caring—they are nothing but the politics of pain and, because of that, the White Paper should be rejected.

8.5 pm

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Listening to the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), it is difficult to recognise the true situation in Scotland, especially with regard to health. We did not learn from his speech that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland announced a couple of weeks ago that there would be an increase of 8·6 per cent. in spending on health in Scotland, of an extra £225 million.

The hon. Member for Dumbarton did not compare what is happening now with 1979. He did not tell us that the number of day cases in Scotland has risen by 95 per cent., that the number of operations performed has increased by 41 per cent., that the number of in-patients treated has gone up by 15 per cent., that the number of patients treated in bed has gone up by 20 per cent. and that the number of out-patient attendances has gone up by 8 per cent. In Scotland, the Health Service has advanced significantly. Spending is up by 27 per cent. in real terms. I hate to think what it would be like if we had the crippled economy that we inherited from Labour in 1979. I dare say that those figures would have been quite the opposite.

I have the honour to stand here as a member of the Conservative minority on the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) has achieved that level of seniority which puts him above and beyond party politics, and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) defies conventional classification. I know that he will take that in the spirit in which it is intended. That means that there are four gallant Conservative supporters of the Government, who I am sure the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) would say are slavish Thatcherites, who are left to hold the fort.

One thing which I welcome greatly about the White Paper is its continued commitment to reducing the proportion of gross national product taken by public expenditure. There are good reasons for continuing with this pledge for the foreseeable future. I am happy to say that, when we considered whether to insert an amendment to the effect that we did not accept the underlying assumption in the White Paper, that reducing public expenditure is in itself somehow desirable, it was rejected. We can therefore infer that it is a shared assumption that it is a good thing to carry on reducing the proportion of GNP taken by public expenditure.

The successful economies are the low-tax economies, low public spending economies. It is not possible to reduce taxation unless public spending is kept under control. I believe, as the election result last year showed, that such a course is popular in the country.

Much has been made of the fact that this year a considerable amount of money is available to the Chancellor to increase spending, cut taxes, or reduce borrowing. What a splendid thing it is that the argument over the public expenditure White Paper this year, as indeed for several years, is not about how to make real spending cuts, as was the miserable position in which we found ourselves in the latter part of the 1970s, but how to spend the windfall that Opposition Members are at a loss to explain, except in terms of good luck.

We would not have that windfall to distribute today were it not for the prudent policies that the Government have followed in the past nine years—sometimes during difficult periods — which have kept public spending within bounds, allowed us to reduce the tax burden, and give the incentives that have produced growth in the economy.

I agree with what my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary said in evidence to the Select Committee. It would be wrong, just because this year may be exceptional —we do not know what will happen in future—simply to have a one-off dollop of cash thrown around within the public services. My right hon. Friend expressed it rather more eloquently than I have. His words deserve wider currency than perhaps the arcane report that the Committee has produced. He reminded us that "the converse of rushing to spend what seems to be increased revenue would be rushing immediately in-year to make very substantial in-year retrenchments if revenue falls short of your expectations. That has happened in the past . . . it is not an attractive way to conduct affairs. It is better to have a smoother flow . . . I would argue that that is a prudent way to proceed in terms of public expenditure if one is interested in ensuring that you have a regular and consistent flow of public expenditure rather than a jerky pattern, which does no good either for individuals or for programme expenditure plans."

Every business must have a plan for several years and try to plan for its expansion in an orderly way. One should not simply go up and down with the tide. One should try to make one's expenditure increases stick year by year, rather than have to make real cuts in one year and unforeseen increases in another.

In addition to cutting taxation, our great opportunity this year is to use much of the surplus to continue to reduce the burden of debt interest upon public revenues. In the past nine years, we have been successful in reducing the burden of debt. In 1982-83, we spent 5 per cent. of gross domestic product on financing the national debt. In 1988-89 that has been reduced by 1 per cent. to 4 per cent. That means that we are saving about £3,500 million a year, which, of course, can be spent on improvements in the National Health Service, and so on.

According to the White Paper, by 1990-91 we plan to reduce that proportion of gross domestic product still further, to 3·5 per cent., which will be the equivalent of £5 billion a year, spent not just on interest, but, for example, on real patient care in the Health Service. That is one reason why we have been able to make a £1·1 billion increase in spending on the Health Service this year.

During the past few months, there has been what we can only call an hysterical campaign about the Health Service. That can easily be explained. Labour Members are clutching at straws. They are able to complain about a crisis in the Health Service only because they are unable to complain about a crisis anywhere else in the economy. Before the last election, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) desperately attempted to drum up some potential crisis lurking in the background, in the vain hope that he would be able to gull the public into believing that the Labour party would be elected. All that he seems to have done—perhaps rather more effectively than Lord Whitelaw has done—is to go around the country stirring up apathy, because the election result was not satisfactory to him.

Today, the Health Service is in crisis in political terms only because there are no bigger or better alternative crises. There is always some crisis. There must be something to give vigour to political debates. When we consider the increase in spending and the amount of patient care that has been provided during the past nine years, we cannot say that the National Health Service is in crisis.

That is not to say that it is perfect. It is a long way from being perfect, and in its present form it is nowhere near perfectable. The National Health Service is failing in many respects. It is disappointing that there are no ideas on the Opposition Benches about how the Health Service can be improved, except by the most crude mechanism of increasing the amount of money that we spend on a defective system.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my hon. Friend agree that the letters that he has received are mostly from those who are on the payroll of the National Health Service? I have received few letters from patients. Most of the letters that I have received have stated that the Service is excellent.

Mr. Hamilton: I have had the same experience. I receive letters about the Health Service. Many letters have been prompted by the publicity that the arguments have received on television and in newspapers — often presented in the most tendentious and inaccurate terms.

It is no good thinking that we can solve the problems of the Health Service simply by increasing the amount of money that we spend on it. The Health Service is more like a leaky steam engine, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, the fireman, year by year shovelling bundles of pound notes into the engine to get up steam. So much power is lost through the holes in the engine that the proportion of extra speed that it is able to generate, relative to the quantity of fuel, is small. The more money that we put in on that basis, the less effective the Service becomes.

I reject the notion that the people of this country are prepared to pay considerably more money to continue to fund the Health Service in its present form. If we ask somebody whether he believes that more money should be spent on the Health Service, the answer will be yes, because he wants more health care. It is a question without cost, and a question without cost is not a real choice. It is a most unscientific way of inquiring into public attitudes to choice.

I know of only one survey that has gone into the matter in a proper scientific way. In a book called "Welfare Without the State", published not long ago, the Institute of Economic Affairs Ltd. published the results of a survey, which it has carried out every 5 years since 1963, on attitudes among the general public about whether they wish to see more money spent on public services or on tax cuts. The results are interesting. When asked in early 1987 whether they would prefer to pay higher taxes to spend more money on the Health Service, 55 per cent. of people said yes. That figure would be higher today as a result of the publicity that the Health Service has received in recent months.

When they were asked how much more they would be prepared to pay in higher taxes, the figure dramatically altered. The vast majority of people are prepared to see more money spent on the Health Service only if other people pay the taxes. It will be a small minority probably 10 to 15 per cent. Opposition Members are free to look at the figures if they take the trouble to go to the Library and examine the document. A small minority of people in this country are prepared to forgo real increases in disposable income to put more money into a service that, in the nature of things, cannot overcome its deficiencies simply by the amount of money that is provided.

Mr. McFall: How does the hon. Gentleman explain the Gallup poll in an issue of The Daily Telegraph last week? When people were asked whether they were willing to pay more, 67 per cent. said yes. The poll was quantified and related specifically to the NHS – £1 a week, £2 a week, £3 a week, and even more. Overall, 67 per cent. said that they would pay more. That was a specific question.

Mr. Hamilton: I regret to say that, unlike the hon. Gentleman, I do not subscribe to The Daily Telegraph. However, I would be prepared to examine the figures from that poll.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Actually, most of the people interviewed said that they would give only £1 a week. That is less than the increase that the Government will give.

Mr. Hamilton: My hon. Friend is right to state that the £1·1 billion projected increase in the White Paper is virtually equivalent to one penny on income tax. I suspect that many people are unaware of that. There are many ways in which we can improve the Health Service and increase the quality of patient care without having to increase the amount of money that we put into it through tax-funded revenues.

To give an example of the degree of public misconception of the position, the health authority in my area has received a 60 per cent. increase in spending since 1982-83. However, this year wards are being closed and waiting lists are lengthening in exactly the same way as hon. Members have described tonight. A 60 per cent. increase in spending in cash terms over six years can by no stretch of the imagination be called a cut.

What causes these so-called cuts and reductions in provision, happens when an authority is unable to manage its budget year by year. That may occur for a variety of reasons. I believe that the main reason is that the authority does not have the information to hand to enable it to monitor spending against budget adequately and effectively throughout the year. I believe that that happens in authorities throughout the country and that it explains much of the hysteria over recent months about so-called cuts in the Health Service.

One of the glaring absurdities of the existing system is that there is a two-year gap between doing work and being credited with payment for that work. For example, Macclesfield is treating 14 per cent. more of its residents now than it was treating two years ago, while Manchester is still receiving the credit in revenue terms for that. Macclesfield will get the benefit in two years' time.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): The hon. Gentleman has presented his argument in an extremely clever way, no doubt as a result of his training and background. Will he explain, without reference to his manipulation of figures, why wards are closing, operating theatres are not being used and there is a shortage of nurses? The hon. Gentleman is familiar with my constituency and, if he would like to visit it, he can witness those things happening. However the hon. Gentleman may adjust or manipulate the budget or the figures, the point is that the service is not being provided. It would be wrong to suggest otherwise.

Mr. Hamilton: I agree that it appears that wards are being closed and that there are cuts in the service. However, any business which must operate to a budget must try to adjust its expenditure smoothly and not spend the entire revenue by the ninth month of the year. Because authorities cannot discover accurately the costs that they are incurring in the early part of the year, there are panic measures at the end of the year when the authorities discover that they are running out of money and will not be able to pay the bills. If there was a more even spread of expenditure and better management, there would be fewer problems.

I am not saying that the Health Service is perfect or that the existing waiting lists are acceptable—they are not—but there are many ways in which the position can be improved.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Does my hon. Friend acknowledge that, in each successive year since 1979, there has been a real, substantial increase in the number of nurses employed in the Health Service? That does not appear to be a decrease in provision.

Mr. Hamilton: My hon. Friend is quite correct to comment on the enormous increase. Indeed, tens of thousands more nurses are employed in the Health Service now than 10 years ago. I notice that Opposition Members are always keen to stress how many nurses are leaving the Health Service, but they are not so keen to state how many administrators and ancillary workers are not leaving it. If Opposition Members were more interested in that figure, the problems with the Health Service might be considerably reduced.

There are many ways in which the effectiveness of the Health Service can be improved. I hope that we will get away from this national wage bargaining system in the Health Service, which has bedevilled the budget year by year, and opt for a more market-oriented system where regional and specialty differences are taken into account. We have a long way to go before we get rid of the existing restrictive practices within the Health Service which prevent new working techniques from being introduced. There are still absurd unbreachable overlaps between technicians, nurses and porters. We can use the manpower, which accounts for 70 per cent. of the cost of the Health Service, more effectively than at present.

Many marginal services could be provided more effectively. I cannot understand why we must provide highly expensive taxi services using ambulances which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak said, cost more to run than a Rolls-Royce. Many false choices are made under the present system. For example, because remedial care is visible, any cuts in its provision provide a potent force for putting pressure on the Government. On the other hand, preventive care, which in the long term will considerably reduce pressure on the Health Service, is not visible and increases are not made in that because that is not politically advantageous. The emphasis is very often wrong within the system because of its structure.

I believe that the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) had a point in some respects when he said that we should concentrate more on community hospitals and facilities. The move towards large district general hospitals at the expense of cottage hospitals and wider provision through doctors' surgeries has been greatly overdone. There is poor cost awareness within the system. Supplies are often used once and then thrown away. Tests and treatments are carried out which are of marginal value. Capital items are treated as free gifts and not properly accounted for. Expensive pieces of equipment lie idle until they become obsolete. They are then given away to the Third world as part of the aid budget. There are many ways in which the existing system is abused and we must do something about that.

I was very pleased to see the headline in The Times yesterday:

"GPs and their patients may be privatised."

According to the article, a series of radical health plans may be considered by Ministers today. I hope that we will follow the route of the health maintenance organisations which have been very successful in the United States.

The Opposition have not been able to provide a convincing case for spending more money on the Health Service. They were completely floored by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) who challenged them to quantify the extent of underfunding. What do they mean by underfunding? My hon. Friend asked whether they would be prepared to give a commitment that they would reopen all wards, abolish all waiting lists and agree in advance to fund all nurses' pay awards if, to our misfortune, they ever won a general election and had responsibility for these matters. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) was completely unable or unwilling to answer that question. He knew that the unpalatable answer was that he could not responsibly give such a commitment.

Opposition Members are not only playing with words in these debates, but, for a cynical and political purpose, are taking advantage of people who are sick and suffering. They cannot match this Government's record of increasing provision for the Health Service, and they know it. Therefore, they have given up all hope of providing any convincing alternative to our proposals, and, happily, the people of this country have given up all hope of the Labour party getting back into office.

8.29 pm

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): Having listened to the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton), one wonders in which world he is living. The problems that we see every day on our doorstep result from the underfunding of the Health Service and they are a daily reminder of the desperate need for more resources to be made available to the NHS.

The hon. Member for Tatton wanted such underfunding to be quantified and there are a number of ways to do that. For example, let us consider my constituency's area health authority, Mid Glamorgan. It has worked out a budget for the coming financial year that tried to take account of inflation and the possible costs of pay awards to nurses and other Health Service workers. It came up with a figure that was some £3 million less than the amount then allocated by the Welsh Office. The Welsh Office thought it had done that health authority proud because the increase in funds was 5·1 per cent. more than last year's spending.

We are well aware that the increases in pay for the nurses and other hospital workers will be much more than the sum allocated by the Welsh Office, yet the Government have given us no guarantee that they will completely fund that pay award. The major problems faced by the Health Service in the past few years have been due to the underfunding of nationally negotiated pay awards.

Let us consider another example of underfunding in the Mid Glamorgan health authority that occurred two years ago, yet the effects are still being felt. In July 1986 the Mid Glamorgan health authority had a guideline for capital expenditure. However, in January 1987 the Welsh Office cut its allocation by more than £9 million. At a stroke, the authority had to revise its capital expenditure programme under which it was planned to provide the facilities that the area was sadly lacking.

Bridgend has a splendid new district general hospital that is providing effective and efficient services. It is just about the cheapest hospital in which to be treated in Wales. However, instead of the second phase of its development being started in 1991—at the moment it is a split-site hospital that costs hundreds of thousands of pounds extra to run a year—it may be 1994, 1995, or never before it is stated. It depends on the amount of money that the Government are prepared to give to fund the cost of the pay awards in the Health Service.

The Government say that money is available, and they appear to be committed to tax cuts. However, that money could be used to help fund the Health Service. We are not suggesting—as the hon. Member for Tatton tried to make out—that we should ask people to pay more money. It is a simple request to hold back on major tax cuts and to use the money to fund the Health Service.

At the start of the financial year—not in the ninth month of the financial year and not as a result of bad management—the Mid Glamorgan health authority already knows that, on the basis of the money allocated by the Welsh Office, it will have to find £5 million to make up for the cuts—on top of cuts already carried out. Despite the fine record of Health Service staff in treating more patients, the unpalatable fact for Conservative Members is that there are longer waiting lists and there is a crisis in the Health Service. The Government can throw as many statistics as they like at us about the wonderful extra funding. However, the plain fact is that there are more unwell people who need treatment and there are more people dying who need care.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) spoke about the economic recovery that has been engineered by the Government. However, it has resulted in a level of unemployment which is still more than double the 1979 level. Even if the present rate of reduction in unemployment continues, it will be 1992 or 1993 before we get back to the 1979 level of unemployment. What a wonderful economic recovery.

Let us consider what the Government have done with regional spending. Let us consider some of the facts and figures behind the British economy. Today in Wales, compared with 1979, there are about 100,000 men and 40,000 women who are no longer in full-time employment. Regional spending in Wales has been reduced from £265 million in 1979 to £149 million in 1987. The public expenditure White Paper proposes further cuts in future years.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: The hon. Gentleman and I served on the same Committee in the European Parliament which dealt with regional spending. Does he maintain that the money spent was cost-effective in jobs? In my part of the world, and certainly in parts of Cheshire, I found that vast sums were being spent on capital spending, but, far from increasing the number of jobs, the number was reduced. That spending was not helping to increase regional employment; there were merely cash handouts regardless of the merit of the project.

Mr. Griffiths: That is one way to consider investment that keep jobs in an area.

In my European constituency of South Wales, in Baglan bay there is a chemical works that over the years has received considerable funding from the Government. Because of changes in the chemical industry, there has been a reduction in employment. Nevertheless, there are still many hundreds of workers employed in that plant and they would not have those jobs without Government grants.

In the county of Mid Glamorgan nearly 29,000 men and women are unemployed and there are 1,907 advertised job vacancies. In my constituency of Bridgend and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) there are more than 7,000 men and women unemployed and there are 397 job vacancies advertised in the jobcentres. In 1979, the amount of regional aid spent in the Bridgend travel-to-work area was more than £62 million; this year it is £8 million. We need more public expenditure in such areas to create more jobs to take people off the dole. The dole is one type of public expenditure that we should try to cut.

The hon. Member for Tatton tried to claim that there was a crisis only in the NHS, but let us consider the spending on education. Apart from the two financial years before the general election, public expenditure in education has been on a downward trend. Judging from the White Paper, it is apparent that education spending for the next few years, in real terms, is also on a downward trend as a percentage of national output. Apart from one year, there has been a downward trend throughout the 1980s.

Yet Government spending plans include a reduction in the proportion of the money spent on education. They plan to reduce local authority spending, but at the same time they are to increase spending on administration in the Department of Education and Science by 8·6 per cent. in real terms next year. One wonders why. They will increase in real terms expenditure on the assisted places scheme by more than 10 per cent., yet the increase in spending on the under-fives will be less than half that increase. The increase for primary education will be less than one third and there will be no increase at all in spending on secondary education. Provision for transport will go down by 3·3 per cent. and provision for milk and meals—carrying on the honourable tradition of the Prime Minister—will be reduced in real terms by more than 8 per cent.

The Government's spending targets suggest that, even if they make a minimum commitment to maintaining the value of teachers' salaries, extra spending to take account of other needs of the education service will be less than 2 per cent.—well below the projected rate of inflation.

The Government are to spend more money on repairing school buildings. They have been told in the schools survey of last November that they need to spend between £2·5 million and £3 million to put our schools back into a good state of repair. However, that extra money to be spent on school buildings will be at the expense of the maintenance budgets for colleges and other higher education institutions. Therefore, the crisis in the schools in the 1980s may partially be dealt with by the 1990s, but then there will be a crisis in the colleges and institutes of higher education because of the cutbacks that are being made now.

In real terms, capital expenditure will go down by nearly 4 per cent. The Government are proud of being able to talk about tax cuts. If they really want to help people who need help, they should provide for investment in our schools, hospitals and factories so that people can live decent lives. It is amazing that the public expenditure White Paper does not contain any reference to the Education Reform Bill currently in Committee. That Bill makes some quite significant changes to the shape of spending on education, yet there is no evidence of them being taken into account in the public expenditure White Paper.

Unfortunately, the public expenditure White Paper throws a shadow over the prospects in the Budget for investing in Britain's future, because, for the sake of short-term gains in tax cuts, we are to lose the long-term gains which could have led to an improvement in people's health, education and lifestyle by providing more jobs. That is what people want when they come to our surgeries. Let the Government deliver it, if they say that they have the money.

8.43 pm

Mr. John Watts (Slough): In 1979, the Government's target for public expenditure was to reduce it in real terms. By 1983, the target was level funding to keep public expenditure constant in real terms. Currently, we have the most lax of targets that the Government have adopted—that is, to reduce public expenditure as a proportion of GDP. If that were the Government's only target, and if that were the only constraint to be observed, it would be far too lax to be the basis of a prudent fiscal policy.

It is clear from this year's public expenditure White Paper that there is no predisposition to spend up to the ceiling permitted by the policy guideline. Certainly the current target is more achievable than those which have preceded it and those which have been achieved since 1984-85, when public expenditure was absorbing 46·25 per cent. of GDP. This year it is down to 42·5 per cent. and it is destined to fall further, to 41·25 per cent. by 1990-91.

The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) claimed that there was no economic justification for the policy objective of reducing expenditure as a proportion of GDP. It may be a pure coincidence, but the decline in the share of public expenditure over the past few years has coincided with accelerating economic growth and falling unemployment. This accelerating growth has created the buoyant tax revenues that allow those of a spending disposition to indulge in the luxury of advising my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on how to spend the "windfall", as they describe it.

The Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee report points out that expenditure could be £1 billion or £2 billion higher next year without breaching the policy constraint of a declining proportion of GDP. That is merely a statement of fact, based upon arithmetic. "Could" does not mean "should". There is no virtue in public expenditure, and a Government do not become more virtuous just because they spend more money. Conceivably that might be the case if the Government had substantial financial resources of their own to disburse beneficently.

The process that leads to public expenditure involves taking away from individuals income or capital that belongs to them and spending it in ways that the Government choose. Therefore, the Government must accept a duty to take in taxation only what is essential. The Chancellor has a choice of spending more on public services or "spending" on tax cuts. Cutting taxes is not a method of spending. It involves leaving more money with the individual to whom it belongs and, in my submission, that is fundamentally different from choosing to spend it in some other way.

Too much of the recent discussion about public expenditure has been concerned with the volume of expenditure, the financial input, rather than with the output of services that are generated by that financial input. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), when pressed extremely hard by a number of my hon. Friends, finally was forced to quantify the further funding needs of the NHS at an extra £2 billion. The hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) adduced the argument that the public are willing to pay more in taxation to fund increases in expenditure on the Health Service. He quoted a Gallup poll in The Daily Telegraph last week. Perhaps he was a little economical with the truth.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) confirmed, 67 per cent. of those interviewed said that they were prepared to pay more in taxes if it was to be spent on the National Health Service. That applied to expenditure of £1 per week. When the question arose whether people would be prepared to spend £3 a week extra — my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground) explained that this would be the broad cost to a family of an increase in expenditure of £1·5 billion, which is less than the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East suggested—the number of willing respondents fell to only 16 per cent. Only one person in six covered by the Gallup survey was prepared to contribute in extra taxation an amount somewhat less than that which the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East suggested was necessary to fund the NHS.

In adducing the need for this increase in funding, the hon. Gentleman gave no thought to the efficiency with which the existing £22 billion of resources is spent. There is plentiful evidence of the scope for increasing efficiency. The national average cost of treating a patient in a major acute hospital in 1985-86 was £724. The costs within that average range from £467, which is 35 per cent. below the average, to £1,231, which is 70 per cent. above the average. The average length of stay in hospital after general surgery ranges from three days in the health authority which deals with its patients quickest, to 11 days in the one which is the most tardy.

To give a further example, last weekend St. Bartholomew's hospital hired the operating theatres at a London independent hospital and shipped its surgeons there to perform operations to reduce the waiting list, making use of the additional funding that the Government have provided for reducing waiting lists. The district general manager admitted in a radio interview that it was cheaper for the health authority to hire the theatres of a private hospital than to use the operating theatres in the NHS hospital.

One must ask why that should be. I can only conjecture that part of the answer must be the hordes of additional porters, receptionists, administrators and so on who are required to be present before anyone can do anything in a NHS hospital. That is the type of constraint which clearly does not apply in the private sector. Each example shows the possibility of achieving a much greater output of health care for the existing expenditure of £22 billion.

This year's White Paper contains about 1,800 measures of output and performance, but, as Treasury officials admitted in evidence to the Committee, less than half these are performance indicators which relate inputs to outputs. Public expenditure is planned to rise by £4·5 billion next year, but the expected output for that increased input is nowhere quantified in the White Paper. It is essential to our ability to judge whether value for money is being achieved that such targets should be set.

Furthermore, the indicators chosen should be used on a consistent basis from year to year. It should be an immutable principle that, if a target is adopted in the White Paper for one year, the following year there should be a comparison of the performance against that target. If that is not done, those of us with a suspicious turn of mind might be led to believe that it is those targets that are achieved that are reported on in subsequent years, and that those which are not are ignored. That is not the way to report on the efficacy of public expenditure.

I know that several hon. Members wish to speak, so I shall draw my remarks to a close. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer contemplates his Budget, he is right to reaffirm the view that the buoyancy of the economy and the tax revenues are not reasons to have a more relaxed view of public expenditure. His priorities should be, first, to eliminate the need for any PSBR, not for any doctrinaire reason, but for a practical one. As my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary explained earlier, reductions in the levels of borrowing since 1978-79 are now saving us £8 billion a year—the equivalent of 40 per cent. of the total budget for the NHS.

Secondly, it should be a priority to reduce the burden of income tax at all levels. A 25p in the pound basic rate should not be the end of our aspirations: 2p off the basic rate is the minimum that our constituents now expect. On past experience, reductions in the higher rates of tax have not involved a reduction in revenue, as Labour Members have suggested, but have increased the tax take from those who pay higher rates, not just in cash terms, but in real terms. That knowledge should give the Chancellor of the Exchequer the courage to remove at least another 10p from the higher rates. Perhaps we could have a 25p, 35p, 45p profile.

Thirdly, there is a unique opportunity, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) suggested, to reform the taxation of married women to end discrimination against those who stay at home to care for children. The Budget on 15 March should not be an occasion for announcements of increased spending. It is an opportunity to slash taxation and borrowing.

8.55 pm

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): The Government tell us that there must be tax cuts because we must provide greater incentives. Hon. Members will all agree that tax cuts will stimulate demand in the economy, but we will differ on whether tax cuts lead to greater incentives. During the last Parliament, the Treasury commissioned a study at Stirling university, under Professor Brown. I know that Treasury officials feel uncomfortable at the results, which show clearly that whether or not one reduces taxation, that will not provide an incentive for the average person. If anything, if taxation is increased, people feel that they need to work harder to make up their take-home pay. No nation and no person will volunteer for high taxation.

The Prime Minister continually reminds us at Question Time of her admiration for the Japanese economy, and perhaps we should admire it. Nations such as Japan are not so stupid as to believe that public expenditure should be cut to fund tax cuts. Japan's medium-term forecast for the budget that is being considered in the Diet estimates that real growth between 1986 and 1990 should be 2·7 per cent. per annum. At the same time, the Japanese Government estimate an increase in Government expenditure, of 3·7 per cent.

Clearly the Japanese believe that certain action must be taken on public expenditure if the economy is to be successful. They believe that at this time public expenditure can be increased by more than the rate of growth. The Japanese people are far too practical to give up investment in tomorrow, in education and training, in research and development, and in industrial aid, just to pay off their rich friends today. When Conservative Members, such as the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton), make comparisons with successful economies worldwide, I wish that they would get their facts right.

There are, of course, two views about the role of public expenditure in our country. One view, which is relatively uncontroversial—or at least it used to be—is that, when we have the resources, we should spend money on those things that people believe lead to a better society, such as the Health Service and housing. The Chancellor and the Treasury officials know that this year revenues can match expenditure. We all know the inadequacies of the National Health Service; even the hon. Member for Tatton conceded that point. The Secretary of State for Social Services has admitted that he needs to spend more money if he is to meet the objectives that he feels are important, but Treasury officials are still not allocating the necessary resources.

It is often said that Governments should put their money where their mouth is. On the question of Health Service expenditure, this Government will not do that. In saying that, I know that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will recognise that the officials of the Department of Health and Social Security are not usually shy in this respect, but on this matter they are very shy.

Such is the Government's lack of compassion, and such is their support for privilege, that they will neither put their money nor their mouth on the line for those who are suffering because of the crisis in our National Health Service. Thousands of people up and down the country are waiting in pain because they cannot get a hospital bed. There are terrible cases in different parts of the country of families losing their loved ones we have heard recently from the midlands about families losing their young loved ones—as a direct consequence of Government action and their inadequate provision for the National Health Service.

I know that time is short, but I want to make some brief comments on the second important role of public expenditure. There is a relationship between public expenditure today and the prosperity of our economy tomorrow. That view of public expenditure relates to the way in which it can directly affect prosperity. We need a public expenditure commitment if we are to make provision for the future in education, but the White Paper makes it clear that there are no scheduled increases for the period 1987 to 1991. The importance of a public expenditure commitment to science is recognised, but there is to be a 6 per cent. cut in the science programme between 1987-88 and 1990-91.

That view of the public expenditure commitment recognises the importance of it in relation to training, transport and our regional economy. I think that most of us would recognise that the economy is somewhat overheated in certain parts of the south, but there is dreadful under-capacity and under-utilisation in most parts of the country. Therefore, surely it makes sense to recognise—I hope that we do—that we cannot address the problem of levelling out economic activity throughout the country unless we have a public expenditure programme. Yet regional aid has been cut by 39 per cent. since 1979 and the White Paper schedules a further 6 per cent. cut from the industrial budget.

For all those reasons, I believe that the Government should think again. If tax cuts are the option that is chosen because of the weakness of our economy, that will undoubtedly lead to an increase in imports of manufactures, which will have a subsequent and damaging effect on our balance of payments. What we should be doing, with whatever resources are available—we can argue whether that amount is £2 billion, £5 billion or £10 billion—is investing in those areas that are important to the economy, to the people, and to tomorrow.

I ask the Financial Secretary to think again and not to wreck tomorrow and the future. I ask him to think about what our competitors abroad are doing; about the needs that we all recognise as necessary in education and in training; and to consider the disparities in our regional economies. Most of all, I ask him to think about the crying need for extra resources in our Health Service. The Financial Secretary should think again, and I look forward to his response.

9.3 pm

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): I should like, in the brief time that I have, to deal with a major curse which bedevils the consideration and management of public expenditure in Britain. That major curse is national pay bargaining. That is such nonsense that, if we did not live in Britain and were not familiar with it, I doubt whether anybody would believe that such a system was in place. An educated man or woman from Mars with some knowledge of economic affairs and principles and no prejudices of mind would be completely horrified by our system.

That system amounts to a collective decision on our part to prevent ourselves from benefiting from the existence of a rational pricing system. In collective pay bargaining, we have set up an insuperable obstacle to the establishment of equilibrium in Britain's labour market. We could not have devised a more efficient means of bringing about in Britain the co-existence of pockets of unemployment and larger pockets of potential overheating and the regional disparities about which Opposition Members understandably frequently become excited.

Let me take a specific example of the pernicious impact of the system in that great county of Lincolnshire, a portion of which I have the great honour to represent. This year, we have been forced to give pay increases of 10 per cent.—twice the level of inflation—to unskilled county council workers. There was no productivity agreement, not even a bogus productivity agreement; and that occurred in a county where there is still significant unemployment in precisely that category of unskilled work.

The effect of that is first, an enormous waste of public and ratepayers' money, and that is to be greatly regretted. Unfortunately, that is not the end of the damage. There is the enormous economic cost. Sadly, there is also the great cost to employment because the county council cannot afford to employ as many people as it otherwise would have done. It either pays the increases and reduces employment to the extent that it can, or increases rates, which of course reduces household incomes, domestic consumption and the margins of business enterprises, thereby having a further deleterious effect on the level of employment.

A great deal of the debate has focused on the NHS. Local government and the NHS are the largest employers in Britain, and it is in those two areas that we see the greatest damage done by the absurdity of national pay bargaining. I put it to the House this evening that much of the agitated debate that we have had on the matter of fully funding or not fully funding, of health authorities being able to plan forward or not being able to plan forward, would never have arisen in the first place were it not for the collective nonsense that we have enforced upon ourselves.

We know why we have to face this nonsense. We know how difficult it is to get rid of it. It is a piece of primitive medieval nonsense, but, as in other medieval dramas, a dragon prevents us from doing the right thing and ridding humanity of it. The dragon is the powerful trade union movement—Opposition Members cannot deny this—with nationally based hierarchies, power structures and overheads which are determined to perpetuate the present system, whether or not that is in the interests of their members, and of course it is not.

My right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench in this Government and the two previous Governments have shown that they are not lacking in those chivalrous virtues of courage and resolution which are necessary from time to time to slay the dragons which threaten Britain's vital interests. My great hope is that they will not fail to identify and to tackle this particular dragon in the course of this Parliament. Our public expenditure accounts will be greatly relieved thereby and we shall be able to go further forward in building Britain's prosperity, having removed a self-inflicted burden which I regret that we have suffered for far too long. Away with this nonsense, and let us not delay in tackling it.

9.9 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I am grateful to the members and officials of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee for their second report on the Government's public expenditure plans. I should like to echo the thanks expressed from the Dispatch Box by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown).

The report makes some important and less contentious points about the presentation of the information before the House and about the implications for the format of our future debates. I welcome the work of the Select Committee in that regard. I appreciate the measured contribution of the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), the Chairman of the Select Committee. I hope that I do not get him into too much trouble by saying that. I was impressed by what he said about the relative price effect as a useful measure of real changes in public expenditure, although I am sure that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will say that that is self-serving, in view of the way in which the debate has gone.

On the main item of the debate—the question of public expenditure and its effect on the National Health Service—the Select Committee said:

> "We do not accept the underlying assumption in the White Paper that reducing public expenditure is in itself somehow desirable. Indeed there is a strong argument that, given the present state of many of the essential public services, spending should be increased. We have particularly in mind the NHS and the acute need for new public sector housing construction and improvement work, as well as grants for urgent repairs for older owner-occupied dwellings. Certainly, given the choice between reducing income tax or public spending on essential services, we are firmly of the view that it is the latter course that should be pursued."

Labour Members wholly endorse that view.

Mr. Higgins: I am puzzled by what the hon. Member has just said. That is not in the report.

Mr. Brown: I have the report here. I am referring to a majority resolution at the back of the report.

Mr. Higgins: Will the hon. Gentleman give the exact reference? He will find that it is an amendment which was not carried.

Mr. Brown: I am reading from page xviii of the report, which states that the Committee divided and that the Ayes were five and the Noes were four. That suggests that the amendment was carried.

Mr. Watts: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Higgins rose——

Mr. Brown: I have made my point. I shall take the intervention from the Chairman of the Select Committee.

Mr. Higgins: I am sorry but, if the amendment had been carried, the hon. Gentleman would have found it in the body of the report. I do not have a copy of the report here, but he will find that it is not in the body of the report. He needs to consider the sequence of events in the proceedings.

Mr. Brown: The best that I can do is to read what is written here. The report states that it commands the support of the majority of the people. Let me end the argument by saying that it most certainly expresses the view of Opposition Members. I hope that that at least will not be contentious.

Mr. Higgins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I shall not give way. It would only cut into my time.

[Mr. Brown]

The majority of the arguments today have concentrated on that point. So far, 20 hon. Members have spoken, excluding myself and the Financial Secretary. Twelve hon. Members have expressed some reservations about the Government's approach to public expenditure in the Health Service and have called for an increase in spending. Only eight hon. Members have wholly endorsed the Government's point of view.

Mr. Higgins: I must put it clearly on the record that the passage which the hon. Gentleman quoted is not in the report.

Mr. Brown: It is a resolution which, according to the report, was carried. [Interruption.] All that one can do is take up the matter afterwards. I read what is written in the report. If the Chairman of the Committee says that it is not so, I willingly take his word for it. Of all the things that we have to quarrel over, I do not want to get bogged down in a quarrel over that. Let us quarrel about something meaningful.

The Chief Secretary said that there should be no expectations of a public expenditure package in the Budget. He expressed surprise that Health Service workers were taking industrial action. He described the strike in Scotland as unnecessary, pointless and damaging to patients, which I am sure is his view.

Before being elected to the House, as many hon. Members know, I was an officer of the General and Municipal Workers Union. In that capacity, I attended meetings of our members who were nurses working in the National Health Service — meetings at which they discussed and rejected industrial action. I speak from personal experience, and I can assure the House that such meetings are fraught.

There is real concern, as much as has been expressed in the House today, about the nature of the job that nurses do, about the future of the Health Service and, above everything else, about care for the patients. To suggest that members of the nursing profession would take industrial action frivolously or do so out of casual motivation is wholly wrong. The issue is debated tensely in the profession and feelings run high on both sides of the argument. Always the dominant factor in the debate is nursing care.

The nurses who have taken industrial action do not feel that it is unnecessary and pointless. They feel that they have been taken for granted by a Government who do not value them. It is impossible not to note with cynicism the fact that the only year when the nurses received a decent pay award was, by coincidence, the general election year. That state of affairs has bred cynicism in the nursing profession.

There seems to be a view among Conservative Members that reducing expenditure in relative terms will make the NHS more efficient. That is not so. All that it will do is make it smaller. The Chief Secretary referred to tendering for services, and to the £100 million of savings that the Government have achieved by putting cleaning contracts and so on out to private tender. He did not say that those savings have been achieved almost entirely through wage reductions, not through any other efficiency exercise.

The argument that we used to hear from Conservative Members was that no more money was available for the Health Service, but the Government were doing their best with the money that was available. The argument has moved on now. There is potential for more money to be spent on the NHS, so the argument now from some Conservative Back Benchers is that no more money is needed. One hon. Gentleman asked what we would spend the money on, and another recommended efficiency savings that would involve getting rid of some of the ancillary staff.

Many Opposition Members have quoted specific examples from their constituency experience. My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) gave constituency examples. I should like to give one from the northern region. The retinal eye service at Sunderland Royal infirmary is the only one of its kind in the north-east of England. Vitreoretinal treatment is virtually an emergency procedure. There should be no waiting list. About 240 people are waiting for a first appointment in the north-east. The regional health authority recognises the need for an extra surgeon and back-up staff, but it cannot pay for them. Indeed, it does not even have enough funds for its present expenditure commitments. Therefore, one of the three out-patient clinics is to close so that the surgeon can concentrate on the 37 cases awaiting surgery.

The tragedy is that the surgeon has already reached the stage where he has attempted to operate but has been unable to save a patient's sight because he had to wait too long. In other words, because of under-resourcing of the National Health Service in our wealthy, advanced industrial society, we have allowed one citizen to lose his sight and are probably condemning more to the same fate. I cannot believe that the people would tolerate that for the sake of a reduction in the basic rate of income tax. The case surely offends against every decent human instinct. It is all the more shocking because it is not an isolated example.

Do the Government accept the need for more National Health Service funding? As my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East pointed out, the Secretary of State for Social Services, addressing the Young Conservatives, said something different from the Chief Secretary. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) also referred to the speech to the Young Conservatives, helpfully reading us an extract. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton gave the Chief Secretary a chance to clarify the position and to say whether he or the Secretary of State for Social Services was accurately describing the Government's financial mechanisms. If the Chief Secretary would like to do so now, I will willingly give him the opportunity.

My hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) and the Financial Times of 21 January 1988 put it differently. The Financial Times said:

> "One of the ironies of the present row is that it is thought that had . . . the Health Secretary pressed last Autumn for more money . . . he would have got it."

Whether or not that is so, it is not a flattering reflection on the efficiency of the Secretary of State for Social Services. Of course, it is an indication of the power wielded by the Treasury—not that we needed that.

Much of the debate has concentrated on the Health Service but my hon. Friends the Members for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) and for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths) rightly referred to housing in Scotland and in England. Probably one of the most iniquitous examples of the Government's public expenditure policy has been the continuation of the 20 per cent. rule for local authority capital receipts.

Local authority housing investment programmes have a current allocation of 74 per cent. of their 1979 allocation, yet the figures of the Department of the Environment show, as my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East pointed out, that £19 billion is needed to repair and remedy the public sector housing stock. Not only will the Government not provide for the repair of council housing stock, but they will not let councils spend their own money on it. If all that were not sufficient injustice to inflict on council house tenants, the Government have swamped the housing benefit changes with an inflation plus 5 per cent. rent rise designed to push up the real level of rents for tenants.

I should like to get myself a reputation for respectability among Conservative Members by quoting from February's Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin, which sounded two cautionary notes, one on personal consumption and the other on levels of company investment. The bulletin highlights a growth in personal consumption of 5·7 per cent. in the third quarter of 1987 and compares that to a 3·4 per cent. growth in real personal disposable income for the same period. It says:

"There must, however, be some question about the sustainability of growth of domestic demand in this country at a rate above that currently being achieved by most other major countries."

The Bank of England points to this trend being paralleled by a sharp fall in the personal savings ratio. The level for the third quarter is estimated to be lower than that of any period since 1959. It is a trend that encourages expenditure on imported consumer goods, with its consequent effect on the balance of payments. All the available evidence suggests that public expenditure is less import-intensive than tax cuts. Surely the underlying problem is that British demand is not being met by British goods and services. At a time when the Government are contemplating tax cuts, it is ironic that a former Chief Secretary to the Treasury, the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), is warning the Government — he is quoted in today's papers — to adopt a cautious approach. Indeed, he is pressing for a further rise in interest rates.

Let me make a second point, from the same respectable source. The bulletin states that companies are highly profitable, but goes on to make the point that capital spending has risen only a little so far:

"Given the level of profitability and the apparently high degree of capacity utilisation, it may appear surprising that business investment has not been growing more strongly."

The level of company investment surely gives a guide to the future success of industry, yet it has been a feature of the last five years that that link between profitability and investment has been broken. Surely the Government have a duty to supplement and encourage the investment programme of industry, both private and public, and, in particular, research and development.

I accept that that would require an increase in public expenditure. To further my bid for respectability, however, I should like to quote from the first report of the Select Committee on Science and Technology, prepared in the other place. The key conclusions are as follows:

"Two conclusions about the support of civil science and technology emerge unmistakably from the evidence. First, the advance of science and technology must be a central objective of government policy. The Government has, in the words of Sir David Phillips, a general responsibility to support science and technology because this is fundamental to the social and economic well-being of the country . . . The Committee strongly agree. Secondly the overwhelming weight of opinion from almost every sector of the research community and from the private sector is that R & D in many fields is underfunded, and in some cases seriously underfunded. It may be objected that much of this opinion is based on self-interest or sectional concern. But the Committee are persuaded that the case has been made out."

The Committee is persuaded, but the Government are not.

There is another major item of public expenditure which has not attracted much comment tonight but to which it is surely right to refer because of its prominence in the overall spending figures. Substantial changes are proposed in the spending plans for social security, which mean that the main losers will be pensioners, devising rules for social funds that will make claimants compete for a severely rationed amount of help.

The new rules not only introduce a loan element, which will comprise up to 70 per cent. of the total social fund budget, but suggest that officers should refuse a loan to claimants who will be too poor to pay it back. That is hardly an efficient targeting of aid. Only a Government wedded to a savage concept of Victorian values would refuse citizens welfare benefit if the social fund officer believed that the claimant should more properly approach a charity.

The Government have safeguarded themselves and their officials from charges of injustice in individual cases, not by ensuring that there will be justice, but by abolishing the right of appeal to a social security appeal tribunal. That cannot be fair. The Government claim to target help more efficiently, but let us consider the efficiency of this: only six local DHSS offices will receive social fund allocations above the level spent in 1986-87. They are Dunstable, Lewisham, the Isle of Wight, Thanet, Exeter and Bognor Regis. Does anyone really believe that that is targeting aid where it is needed?

The north of England, which must inevitably be mentioned, has a cash allocation of only 16·4 per cent. of the sum spent in the region's supplementary benefit single payments in 1986-87. There is not much help, efficiently targeted or not, in that figure.

We have made our views known and we have moved an amendment. It deplores under-investment, as a result of public expenditure plans, in services and technologies vital to the future of Britain. We urge the Government to take additional action to reduce unemployment. We condemn the Government's antipathy to public expenditure on vital community services. In particular, we call upon the Government to take note of the evidence, from two Select Committees and from health care professionals, that the NHS is inadequately funded and that they should make extra provision in the Budget to end the funding crisis faced by our Health Service and especially by our hospitals. I commend the amendment to the House.

9.30 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): As the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said, we have had the benefit not only of the White Paper but of the report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. A number of points in that report have been echoed in various speeches, particularly that by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins). He referred, for example, to possible alterations in the two-volume presentation of the report.

[Mr. Norman Lamont]

The Committee has suggested that as much as possible of the material from volume 1 should be incorporated into the Autumn Statement. That approach has a great deal to recommend it, although some problems need to be overcome. The Committee has also suggested that volume 2 should be split into separate departmental booklets, as the Estimates now are. That might be of some disadvantage to libraries, but we shall be considering this and replying in full to the Committee and to my right hon. Friend.

My right hon. Friend also made the point that, if the White Paper were divided as he suggested, and the overall policy content of volume 1 were absorbed into the Autumn Statement, it would call into question the need for a separate debate on public expenditure plans in February. Again, we shall reply on that point.

My right hon. Friend also spoke about the relative price effect. I appreciate that he was not suggesting that we should abandon the discipline of cash limits. Rather, he was saying, ex post, that if we were looking at programmes and trying to analyse the volume effect within the Departmental programme — a point supported by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East — then perhaps the relative price effect had a part to play. We shall certainly consider that point, but, as my right hon. Friend knows, the use of the relative price effect in the past has acted against the discipline of cash limits, although I know that that is not what my right hon. Friend is suggesting.

My hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) made a number of comments about the different input and output indicators. Again, I do not necessarily disagree with many of his points. However, he will appreciate that we are at an early stage of the development of the indicators, and I am sure that he will agree that the White Paper, by having the indicators, is an improvement on previous White Papers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) raised a couple of points. One related to the European Court of Auditors' report. We shall shortly be having a debate on that, and he will have the opportunity to put his point directly to my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General. The debate will be immediately preceding the discussion of the Court of Auditors' report at the Economic and Financial Council in Brussels.

My hon. Friend also asked about staff in the DHSS and whether there had been an increase in numbers. There has been an increase, but a small one. It is not quite as he said, because, of the figures that he was quoting, one was the year average figure and another was the figure at a particular point in time. I shall write to him and explain the point in more detail.

The control of public expenditure has been at the heart of the success of the Government's economic policies. The facts of that success are evident for all to see. Only yesterday, the figures for the output measurement of GDP showed an increase of almost 5 per cent., the largest increase in output since 1973.

Mr. Rogers: Come on, Fast Eddie. Enter the Japanese Olympics.

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman is not so far wrong for once. Our economy grew faster than that of Japan in 1986, and it is expected that it will have done so in 1987. In 1985, 1986 and 1987, our economy grew faster than Germany's too. The fact that our economy is now outpacing traditionally stronger economies underlines how complete and dramatic the transformation of our economy has been.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in coping with this important and, I am afraid, somewhat inconvenient fact for the Opposition, it is a bad argument to say that we have had a wonderful windfall from North sea oil? We have heard it several times in the course of the debate, but it works against the Opposition's case. North sea oil, which in 1985 accounted for 5 per cent. of GDP, now accounts for 2·5 per cent. If we had not had North sea oil, our current growth rate would be even higher than it is because North sea oil has brought down the average GDP rate.

Mr. Lamont: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. Sometimes the strength of the oil economy has had an impact on the exchange rate, which has not had such a good effect on the manufacturing sector and the non-North sea oil economy, which was my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Win Griffiths: The Minister referred to the wonderful economic recovery that we are now undergoing. When does he expect unemployment in Britain at least to be back at the levels of 1979? When does he expect unemployment to be below that of Japan and West Germany?

Mr. Lamont: Unemployment has been falling rapidly; indeed, there has been the largest fall since figures began to be compiled. I am at least much more confident and optimistic than the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), who, at the end of 1986, in an article in The Guardian, said:

"The Government simply cannot reduce unemployment by present economic policies."

Since then, there has been a record fall in unemployment.

Our economy is undoubtedly strong, but there is one worrying factor, one bearish sign. Even the official Opposition are beginning to admit that the economy is growing strongly. For years we have held debates in which they have reinterpreted every economic indicator and tried to show that the economy was not growing when it was. Now they are admitting that it is growing and, given their usual sense of timing, if it becomes too well known that they think that, it will undoubtedly cause a sharp collapse in the financial markets.

The fruits of our success are also apparent in the White Paper, because the Government have managed significantly to increase different departmental programmes at the same time as having managed to reduce — and continuing to reduce — public expenditure as a proportion of GDP. Contrary to what the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East said, that, as far as I could see, was and is welcomed by my hon. Friends. It is not unconnected with the success, growth and strength of our economy.

In reviewing the individual departmental programmes, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East said that four or five programmes were not growing as much as the average. The hon. Gentleman seems to have a curious idea that every programme can grow faster than the average. He did not name a programme. He might have mentioned education, health, law and order or social security, which, despite the fall in unemployment, will all enjoy significant real increases. Other important budgets, although they may not be for major Departments, will also enjoy significant increases. Government support for the arts, aid, and, contrary to what the hon. Gentleman said, science and technology, will show a real-terms increase.

Such significant growth has been possible partly because of growth in the economy and, as my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury said, partly because we have reduced borrowing. The Opposition have spent seven years urging us to increase borrowing to reflate the economy. It is a blandishment that we have resisted, and we have been amply justified by events.

The White Paper illustrates another reason why we are right. The reduction in borrowing has caused a reduction in debt interest, which has meant that expenditure in Departments and on services on which the Opposition are keen has been able to increase more quickly than public expenditure as a whole.

Opposition Members talk about the Treasury being awash with money. We recently received an interesting letter from a member of the public who said that, the next time a member of the Opposition Front Bench talked about the Treasury being awash with money, we should firmly remind them that that was not an excuse that could be levelled against them. Submerged in debt would be a more accurate description of Labour's management of the economy.

When urging my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to spend immediately whatever money he might have available, Opposition Members say only that they do not understand how the success has been achieved. That is not perhaps surprising. We cannot expect them to understand the Government's policies, but we might expect them to understand the Labour Government's policies. They were the opposite of ours and had precisely the opposite effect. Whereas we have cut taxes and increased revenue, they put taxes up to a confiscating level, increased spending massively, drove people into the black economy, drove companies abroad, and brought the economy to a shuddering halt, as a result of which there had to be savage public expenditure cuts, especially in the NHS and its capital spending. There were real falls in the living standards of people who worked in the NHS as a result of the reckless policies which Labour pursued.

Mr. Winnick: The hon. Gentleman is boasting about the Government's record. Did he listen to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) who made the same point as I did in an earlier intervention — that between 35 and 40 wards at the Queen Elizabeth hospital, where cancer patients are treated, were closed only last year and that there is tremendous pressure from people who want to go to hospital or people who are trying to get their loved ones into hospital, but who cannot be admitted? Should we tell them that the Government are doing all right?

Mr. Lamont: I was about to consider the NHS. Before I deal with the hon. Gentleman's intervention, I should like to say something about another matter raised by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East. He attacked the Government's record on making resources available for training. If any one programme has received large allocations of money since 1979, it is training. No Government have put so many resources and so much policy thinking into training as this Government have. Since 1979, training has doubled in real terms.

Of course, the hon. Gentleman approaches the problem of training just as he approaches every area of policy—it is only a matter of money. He did not for a moment acknowledge that what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science is doing with his Education Reform Bill will have a profound impact on the quality of our work force and make more skilled manpower available to industry. The core curriculum, which will make technology one of its subjects, will be of considerable advantage to British industry.

A large part of the debate has been about the National Health Service. It is certainly not surprising, as it is the only subject that the Labour party feels safe talking about. My hon. Friends and I welcome the prominence that Opposition Members have given to the National Health Service. They have brought to the forefront ideas that could not be discussed before—ideas that are now on the political agenda and can be discussed in the Government's fundamental review of the Health Service.

I have no doubt that Opposition Members intended to expose the Government. Their campaign has exposed many of the issues and inadequacies that go right to the heart and nature of the National Health Service. For that reason, we should be profoundly grateful to Opposition Members for widening the debate on the Health Service.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: What message does the right hon. Gentleman have for the people of the northern region—admittedly, a small proportion — who will lose their sight because the unit to which I referred has not been properly funded?

Mr. Lamont: I would say to the hon. Gentleman, as I would say every time a particular case is put to me, that today everyone, whatever his condition and problem, has a better chance of receiving adequate treatment than in 1979.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East complained that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary used too many statistics in his speech. Whenever we debate health issues, Opposition Members always attempt to place us at a disadvantage. They say that we must not bore them by reciting our statistics about patients who are treated and new hospitals that are built. It is all very well to tell us that we must not cite statistics, but they reserve to themselves the right to publish in booklets, with red crosses on the front, misleading statistics about the Health Service. When they tell us that they will go on peddling their statistics but that we are not to peddle our statistics about the Health Service, although they are all honourable men and women, they put me in mind of the former American President who commented that if his opponents would stop telling lies about him he would stop telling the truth about them. That is a good basis on which to have a truce about the swapping of statistics on the National Health Service.

There may be arguments about what is achievable in the National Health Service with a given level of spending. One point is indisputable and undeniable. The Government, for all their determination to control public spending, have given a higher priority to the National Health Service than the Labour party did when in Government. We have increased spending on health as a proportion not only of public spending but also of GDP.

[Mr. Lamont]

While we have been in office, GDP has been growing strongly. It has been growing strongly, absolutely and proportionately, under this Government. The Labour Government reduced spending on health as a proportion of a GDP that was stagnant and falling.

Many hon. Members have mentioned the uncertainty caused in the Health Service by the uncertainty of wage awards and what they are likely to be. That problem is not unique to the National Health Service. It faces every Government Department, commercial organisation, private sector company and nationalised industry. Other costs, in addition to wage costs, create uncertainty for the management of the Health Service.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House, and particularly my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, gave a warm welcome to the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury about the timing of decisions on the review body awards, which will be brought forward so that decisions can be taken at the end of January or mid-February. It was agreed that uncertainty will be removed from the district health authorities as a result of my right hon. Friend's announcement. They will be better able to understand the outcome and what they have to deal with. The Government have given a commitment to reach a decision by the end of April. There will be no great uncertainty this year and there will be no need for individual area health authorities to make cuts because they do not know what the funding position will be.

Nevertheless, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, Easst continued to press the point and say that the Government should give a commitment now that they will fund nurses' pay totally. No responsible Government could possibly give the commitment that he demands while the review body is still deliberating and in advance of its conclusions.

In the past four years, we have had an excellent record on nurses' pay. Furthermore, we have funded nurses' pay and, with the findings of the review bodies for other professions, we have funded 90 per cent. of the wage awards. The area health authorities have had to find only 10 per cent. of the wage increases, and that 10 per cent. amounts to only 0·5 per cent. of the total cost.

I do not believe that it was wrong to give the authorities that incentive to make them aware that they must balance the needs of wage costs against other costs. Nurses have no cause for complaint against this Government. Since this Government have been in office, nurses have seen their real take-home pay increase by 30 per cent. No doubt that is why there has been an increase in the number of nurses by 47,000 to more than 400,000.

None the less, we are told that there are still unmet needs. If we have done all these things — increased resources, put in all the money —and if there are increased numbers of doctors and nurses, why are there still sick patients and unmet needs? That is a good question and it deserves a good answer. Opposition Members have given their answer. Indeed, perhaps Opposition Members are anticipating imminent careers as television evangelists and that is why their answer lies in a quotation from the Book of Proverbs:

"Money answereth all things."

Unfortunately, that is their answer not just to this problem, but to all problems.

The Opposition's demands for the Health Service have been increasing all the time. On 26 November 1987, the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) said that the crisis would be solved if the National Health Service was given another £200 million. The hon. Lady made it clear that she was talking only of hundreds of millions, not billions, of pounds. Yet on 14 January the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said that the NHS needs an extra £1·3 billion. Three days later, the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) said that the NHS now requires an extra £2 billion, and that was confirmed by the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), the Leader of the Opposition.

I am amazed at the modest speed at which the Opposition have escalated their demands. If they believe that £21 billion is inadequate for the NHS, what makes them convinced that £22 billion or £23 billion will solve all the problems for ever?

Labour Members are interested in money, but they are far less interested in value for money and in the management of the NHS. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground) made an excellent speech, in which he referred to a number of management deficiencies in the NHS. He also referred to an extremely interesting article by a consultant and director of surgery at Guy's hospital, Professor Ian McColl. My hon. and learned Friend detailed some of the points that Professor McColl made. Perhaps it would be of interest to the House to hear part of what Professor McColl said in that article:

"No one needs to die for lack of an operation in the NHS. Behind the cases which hit the headlines generally lie management faults, inefficient bureaucracy and restrictive practices. These failings, rather than lack of money, are responsible for the low morale throughout the service. Pouring in extra cash, or legislating for yet another reorganisation, is not the answer. We need to concentrate on making the present system work."

I have no doubt that Professor McColl's words were not particularly well received by his NHS colleagues— they were certainly different from some of the things we hear. However, precisely because Professor McColl has been prepared to speak out and pose a number of questions, it is all the more worth while studying them as they deserve answers.

Let us consider the end-of-year closure of beds by district health authorities. That is something that, quite rightly, causes distress to hon. Members on both sides of the House. District health authority managements carry out such closures because they say it is the only way in which to regain control of their budgets. If we had proper financial control within the district health authorities, would it always be necessary to take such dramatic end-of-year measures? Certainly the opinion of Professor McColl is quite clear:

"Too often no one knows until the end of the financial year whether the budget will balance. When the news finally breaks that there is a deficit of, say, £1 million, panic reigns. In the mistaken belief that they can save the necessary funds, the administrators close a large number of beds, and so provoke the doctors into waving shrouds and attacking the Government for alleged underfunding."

The management and administration of the NHS are important, but we have heard not one word from the Opposition about that. They are not interested in ideas about collaboration between the public and the private sector; they are not interested in ideas about developing an internal market or ideas about competitive tendering.

However, perhaps I do them an injustice because we all know that they are very interested in the idea of competitive tendering. They are totally opposed to it, and that is why today, when they have sat in the Chamber pretending to fight for the NHS, they have, at the same time outside the Chamber, encouraged the Scottish TUC to institute a day of action to strike against patients. How can a strike against the Health Service ever be justified? It is a strike that hurts patients; and it is simply against the release of resources that would give a better, proper deal for patients.

Labour Members have pressed for a large-scale injection of funds into the NHS. They forget that we no longer live in a world in which mini-budgets occur every month or every second month. We have one Autumn Statement that deals with public expenditure and one Budget that deals with taxation. It is that steadiness and that strategy that have brought us our economic success.

The NHS is important, but it is not the only programme in the White Paper. Indeed, there are another 450 pages in the White Paper, although one would not believe that having listened to Labour Members. The continued support for the Government and the success of our strategy are vital, and the individual programmes and plans in the White Paper are basic to that success. I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to support those programmes.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Housing Support Grant (Scotland)

10.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I beg to move,

That the draft Housing Support Grant (Scotland) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 3 February, be approved.

It may be for the convenience of the House if we discuss also the next motion:

That the draft Housing Support Grant (Scotland) Variation Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 3 February, be approved.

Full details of the housing support grant settlement are set out in the report which accompanies the draft housing support grant order, and, in view of the time constraints on this debate, I shall not burden the House with excessive detail. I will, however, explain the thinking behind the proposals.

We have again had consultations with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities on the formula for the distribution of housing support grant this year. I should like to place on record our thanks to the convention for its contributions. In the housing support grant settlement for 1988-89 the Government have continued to concentrate resources on those authorities which, in our view, require them. The formula change approved by Parliament last year, involving the use of lower rate fund contributions, is again incorporated, to the benefit of local authorities. We have estimated eligible expenditure at £308·2 million on all local authority housing revenue accounts for 1988-89, and relevant income at £253·6 million. Housing support grant will therefore total £54·6 million. This will be distributed among the 25 authorities which we believe would otherwise incur deficits on their housing revenue accounts in 1988-89.

Local authorities' expenditure on housing is of course very sensitive to changes in interest rates, and we are again applying an average rate of interest to authorities' individual volumes of debt — 10·2 per cent. has been assumed in this settlement for 1988-89. If, however, in practice, interest rates prove to be significantly different from our current assumptions, we will bring forward an appropriate variation order in due course. [HON. MEMBERS: "When?"] There have been plenty of precedents. There have occasionally been precedents for two variation orders.

The 1987-88 variation order before the House reflects a similar undertaking given at this time last year. Because average pool interest rates have fallen from 10·4 to 10·1 per cent. during the year, authorities' loan charges are lower and housing support grant payable is reduced by £4·6 million to a revised amount of £41·9 million.

The cost of managing and maintaining the housing stock is the other major item of expenditure on housing revenue accounts. For 1988-89 we have uprated the management and maintenance provision in the 1987-88 settlement by 10 per cent. We believe that this is extremely generous on top of the 7 per cent. increase included last year. It is more than double present inflation rates and should allow real growth on repairs expenditure in 1988-89. The new figure is £333 per house for management and maintenance and £270 million in total.

On the income side, we are assuming for the purposes of the settlement that rents will increase by £1·60 per week over 1987-88 order levels, bringing rents to £17·45 in order terms. Taking those housing support grant assumptions together with the Government's decisions on rate fund contribution limits, with which I shall deal shortly, we estimated in December that average council house rents would rise by about £1·65 per house per week in 1988-89, giving a Scottish average of £16·30.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): Will the Minister explain the basis for his assumption about rate increases in the coming year?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: A complex formula is worked out with COSLA. I am under a statutory obligation to negotiate with COSLA, and a complex formula is worked out and taken into account for distribution.

Mrs. Fyfe: Will the Minister explain that complex formula for the benefit of hon. Members who know nothing about it?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is highly technical, but, if the hon. Lady wishes me to give a detailed analysis, I shall be happy to do so in my winding-up speech. The formula takes into account, for example, the number of high-rise flats in a district council area.

The Government must take difficult decisions about the total resources which the country can afford to devote to housing, against the competing pressures upon public expenditure as a whole. Although I am pleased to have been able to increase housing support grant, as I have already outlined, our policy objective continues to be to reduce the total of indiscriminate subsidies to enable us to devote greater resources to investment in the stock.

Between 1981 and 1985, many authorities, by keeping rents unnecessarily and artificially low, and by requiring ever-higher contributions from ratepayers to balance their housing revenue accounts, chose to forfeit £112 million of capital expenditure consents which could, and should, have been used to carry out modernisations, to deal with dampness, condensation and so on. Since we took the statutory power to limit rate fund contributions, first exercised in 1985-86, that unacceptable trend has been reversed. We have reduced the rate fund contribution aggregate from an outturn of £139 million in 1984-85 to a statutory limit of £22·2 million for 1988-89, in the order.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Will the Minister give way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I should like to get on, as many hon. Members wish to speak.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The Minister is talking about the order concerning rate fund contributions. Is he aware that some doubts have been raised about whether the order is ultra vires? Will he comment on that, and on the apparently incompetent drafting of the order?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Select Committee on Statutory Instruments has expressed a doubt about the vires. Obviously, if that doubt were substantiated another order would be introduced. I wish to make it clear that I am referring to the housing support grant orders and not to any other orders, although I am referring to the subject in general, as the subject is discussed with COSLA in its entirety.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) asked about the formula. I was a little concerned about that, so I went to the Vote Office and found that the formula is in the orders before us tonight. I should have thought that the hon. Lady would have a copy of them.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's perceptive comment.

We have increased capital allocations on the housing revenue account block by more each year than the rate fund contribution reductions required. For 1988-89 the rate fund contribution limit aggregate is £21 million lower than for 1987-88, and that has contributed substantially to the £24·5 million increase in the provisional HRA allocations announced for next year compared with 1987-88.

In setting an aggregate limit to rate fund contributions of £22·2 million we have consulted widely about the implications of the individual limits set. [Interruption.] This is important for district councils. The provisional limits that we announced in November took account of the number of council houses in each authority, but they also included additional amounts to ensure that where local authorities had raised rents over the past three years by more than the Scottish average, implied average rent increases would be restricted to a maximum of £2 per house per week. We subsequently invited representations. In considering the representations that we received, we looked very closely at the implied rent increase and rent level in 1988-89 in each authority. Of course, rent implications for the 56 housing authorities vary widely, but we increased the rate fund contributions limit for 12 of the 20 authorities which submitted representations.

Dr. Godman: Will the Minister give way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: May I continue? Perhaps I shall give way a little later. I was mentioning that 12 of the 20 authorities received an increased rate fund contribution limit—[HON. MEMBERS: "Name them."] I can easily give hon. Members the names later.

The concessions that we made were calculated as follows. First, we used more up-to-date assessments of income and expenditure. In the case of local authorities which had raised rents over the past three years by more than the Scottish average, further concessions were needed to restrict rent increases to £2 per week.

Secondly, we increased the rate fund contribution limits of the authorities with current rent levels above our implied average Scottish rent for 1988-89 of £16·30. The concession was calculated so that their maximum rent increases should be restricted to £1·65 per week. Finally, as in the previous year, we set an upper threshold figure for rent levels. Rate fund contribution limits were increased for three authorities to ensure that they need not raise average rent levels above £18·75 per week, that being the upper limit. That is approximately last year's upper limit, plus the average rent increase figure we now predict for 1988-89. In our calculations, as I have said, we assumed that authorities would spend 10 per cent. more on management and maintenance than last year. Taking all those figures into account, we calculated that average rent increases next year across Scotland as a whole would be about £1·65 per week. If authorities were to choose to increase expenditure on management and maintenance by less than 10 per cent., the average rent increase required would naturally be less.

Since we notified authorities of our final decisions on rate fund contributions and housing support grant, most councils have taken their own decisions about rent increases for next year. The information that I have received so far, which covers virtually all authorities, suggests that the average will in fact be around £1·62 per week. This is very similar to the figure that we had estimated and will take average council house rents in Scotland to some £16·25 per week in 1988-89. I do not think that that is unreasonable. The £16·25 average next year is well below the current year's average council rent of £17·40 in England and Wales.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): Will the Minister advise the House of the relationship that the rent increase bears to inflation, and whether it will have an inflationary effect?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It was essential to concentrate on increased standards of management and maintenance to improve the housing stock. That was why we assumed a 10 per cent. increase in management and maintenance expenditure. I accept that that may be above inflation, but we believed that the improvement of the housing stock in the public sector was so important that that was fully justified. As I mentioned, the £16·25 average next year is below the current year's average council rent of £17·40 in England and Wales. It is also below current rent levels in housing associations, the Scottish Special Housing Association, new town houses and the private sector in Scotland.

Although local authority rent increases have been higher than inflation over the last few years—because they started from a very low base—let me remind the House that registered rents in Scotland rose faster between 1979 and 1986 than local authority rents, by 180 per cent. against 164 per cent. Of course, if tenants have genuine difficulty in meeting their housing costs, relief is available to them through the housing benefit system. The assistance is targeted directly at those households which need it and is reflected in the level of housing benefit payments in Scotland of some £570 million in 1986-87. For 1987-88 the figure is £664 million. [Interruption.] We will have figures as soon as they are available.

In conclusion, let me emphasise that the figures included in the orders before the House tonight are designed to reinforce our policies for housing in Scotland.

Dr. Godman rose—

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am not giving way. I want to give plenty of opportunity to hon. Members to speak in this brief debate.

Reductions in rate fund contributions and housing support grant, taken together, are evidence of our continuing resolve to concentrate on using the resources available for housing on capital investment. The reduction in rate fund contributions will offer further relief to hard-pressed ratepayers, and has contributed towards announced increases in capital expenditure. These increases, together with the 10 per cent. increases for management and maintenance expenditure built into the calculations of both housing support grant and rate fund contributions, will ensure that tenants benefit through a higher standard of housing provision.

[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton]

We have consulted widely on the orders. I am satisfied that the figures they contain are fair and reasonable. I commend the orders to the House.

10.31 pm

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton), in his inimitable way, says that he has consulted widely on the orders. He was kind enough earlier in his speech to place on record the Government's thanks to the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. Perhaps I might place on record the fact that COSLA does not think much of the Government or the orders.

There is something dreadfully predictable about Government statements on housing. I do not know why the Minister, his predecessor or any Conservative Member bothers to try to dress up the sorry story of housing in Scotland so as to make it sound as though the Government were doing something positive. The House is not impressed, people in Scotland are not impressed, and I doubt whether the Minister believes what he is talking about. This evening we have had the usual attempt to present a rosy picture of a package which represents a further cut in funding for housing in Scotland, regardless of the growing crisis of homelessness, overcrowding and decaying housing stock.

I intend to concentrate on the main housing support grant order for 1988-89. The variation order, which we are also debating, simply lops £4·5 million off last year's housing support grant to take account of fluctuations in interest rates, which shows how much the moneylenders make out of public sector housing in Scotland in a good year. For what it is worth, we acknowledge that there is to be an increase in rate support grant in the coming year from last year's figure of £47 million to £55 million. Of course, a significant proportion of that increase is likely to be swallowed by higher interest rates, as the Minister acknowledged. So we have a small increase, but the Government cannot deny that their objective is to do away with housing support grant altogether.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): Hear, hear.

Mr. Home Robertson: I am glad that the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) has confirmed that, with all the authority of an ex-Minister in the Government.

The Government have already run down housing support grant from well over £200 million a year in 1979 to less than a quarter of that figure last year. Only one third of Scotland's public sector housing stock is supported by housing support grant, and fewer than half of our local housing authorities receive any housing support grant at all. Only 14 of Strathclyde's 19 district councils receive it, and none goes to any district council in Fife, Central region, Lothian region or Tayside region.

Housing support grant, however, is only one part of the equation. There is also the question of housing capital allocations, and the rate fund contribution to the housing revenue account. We are supposed to be debating rate fund contribution tonight, but we understand that there is a suspicion that the Housing Revenue Account Rate Fund Contribution Limits (Scotland) Order 1988 may be ultra vires. It seems that the Government are becoming particularly slap-happy with their statutory instruments nowadays, and that they may have been found out—not for the first time—by the Select Committee on Statutory Instruments.

Obviously, it is up to the Select Committee to decide what to do about the matter, and we want to preserve our position, so I shall not say much about the rate fund contribution issue. I shall, however, say that the threat arbitrarily to halve the rate fund contribution from £44 million to £22 million is harmful, and an unwarranted interference in the freedom of Scottish local authorities to determine their housing policy.

The cumulative effect of all the Government's proposals is to cut the total resources available to public sector housing in Scotland in the coming year by another £49 million, to £284 million. As usual, the Government are seeking to conceal the cut by including in the calculation a mass of other factors, such as an assumption that councils will increase their income from the sale of council houses to £60 million. That starts from a fundamentally dishonest premise; local authorities are being compelled to sell those houses for a fraction of their value. It also prompts the questions whether the projected purchases will materialise, and — most significantly — whether enough sales will be completed in time for the proceeds to be used during 1988-89.

Even if we accept the Government's analysis of the figures for housing spending—which of course we do not—we would still find an overall cut of 2 per cent. in real terms in Scotland's public sector housing budget. As Opposition Members know, the real position is considerably worse than that.

I understand that the funds available for home inprovement grants to the private sector are also being cut by 16 per cent., from £147 million to £123 million. I should love to know how the Minister squares that with the Government's much-vaunted commitment to encourage the private sector and owner-occupation in Scotland.

The orders, combined with the Government's proposals for rate fund contribution restrictions—which may or may not return to the House in due course, depending on whether the Government can get the drafting right—are all part of a strategy to increase the rents paid by Scottish tenants. As my hon. Friends who are serving on the Standing Committee considering the Housing (Scotland) Bill will recall, a parallel debate took place there yesterday, when the Minister defended clause 38 of the Bill, which removes all restrictions from the rate of increase in private sector rents in Scotland in the interests of encouraging landlords and regardless of the impact on tenants. The housing support grant orders are driving council house rents inexorably upwards too, and the Minister knows that. In 1980, the average council house rent in Scotland was £4·92 a week. By last year, it had trebled to £14·65 a week.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South) rose——

Mr. Home Robertson: I would be very willing to give way to a member representing a Scottish constituency, but I am not aware that the hon. Gentleman's constituency contains any district council tenants, so I am not clear about his interest in the matter.

It is, I believe, quite likely that council house rents somewhere in Scotland will shortly exceed £20 a week—and this from a Government who claim to be crusading against inflation. They have been intervening to force up rents at more than double the rate of increase in earnings, and almost three times the rate of inflation. So much for their anti-inflation policy. On top of this there will be the poll tax and the social security changes in April, all of which make up a recipe for great and growing hardship for a large number of households in Scotland.

Sadly, district councils in Scotland have precious little control over this escalation in rents. Housing costs to local authorities have increased by over 35 per cent. since 1980, but meanwhile Government interference with grants has directly increased rent levels in Scotland by 107 per cent. Tonight's orders will again increase rents by about £3 a week—more than double the rate of inflation this year.

Tenants in Scotland know very well that their councils are fighting to increase standards and keep rents reasonable, but this absurd Minister, with all the authority that can be conferred by a pitiful minority of 10 Scottish Members of Parliament, is imposing cuts and the restrictions that are forcing standards down and rents up. It is interesting to contrast this with the growing value of subsidies to owner-occupiers with mortgages, the majority of which is flowing to the south-east of England. Scottish council tenants are subsidising prosperous owner-occupiers in the home counties through their taxes, on the poll tax principle of robbing the poor to pay the rich.

Mr. Bill Walker: Earlier, the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) made an intervention in the speech of my hon. Friend the Minister concerning calculations and how the figures were arrived at. In his calculations, and on the basis of his proposition about subsidising, is the hon. Gentleman including all the housing benefit calculations and figures? If he is not, he is feeding rubbish in and getting rubbish out.

Mr. Home Robertson: The profile in The Scotsman has gone to the hon. Gentleman's head. I am talking about subsidy to public sector housing in Scotland, and comparing it with the indiscriminate subsidies to other sectors. The Minister condemned indiscriminate subsidies, but the Government are happy to hand them to owner-occupiers.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the total subsidy to English private housing is some 80 times Exchequer expenditure on Scottish public housing? Is that an equitable percentage?

Mr. Home Robertson: I tend to be a bit suspicious of figures quoted by the Scottish National party, but I shall look into those figures as they sound interesting.

We remain committed to a fair system of mortgage tax relief, but we must insist on a return to a more appropriate level of grant for public sector tenants in Scotland. We urgently need investment in public sector housing in Scotland. Our deepening crisis is a national scandal. Last year, no fewer than 30,000 Scots became homeless, and 200,000 people are stuck on housing waiting lists, which is a tragedy for all those families and young people. We have the shocking situation that one in four of the people of Scotland live in overcrowded accommodation.

The housing stock is decaying. Of 843,000 council houses, over 356,000 need to be modernised, over 88,000 need to be rewired, over 234,000 are affected by damp and over 153,000 need major structural repairs. The situation is getting worse every year, as the Government know because they are not prepared to provide the subsidies and create the necessary financial framework to overcome these problems. The Government are imposing more cuts and introducing the half-baked Housing (Scotland) Bill in the vain hope of reviving the defunct private rented sector in Scotland.

We recognise that the Government are hopelessly out of touch. They represent, I suppose, less than one seventh of Scotland's constituencies and are neither willing nor able to communicate with the majority of Scottish public opinion. But Scotland was trying to make a point to the Government on June 11 last year. Among other things, our people resoundingly rejected the strategy of cuts in, and restrictions on, housing investment. They certainly did not vote for madcap experiments such as Scottish Homes or born again Rachmanism, which the Government seem to support in their Housing (Scotland) Bill. The Scottish people voted to endorse their right to live in decent, secure homes on fair terms in their communities. This order does not begin to measure up to that objective, and if the House has any respect for the nation of Scotland it should reject it.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): I congratulate the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) on his brass neck, as a well-known millionaire absentee landlord, in refusing to give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on the ground that my hon. Friend had no Scottish council tenants in his constituency. It is easy for the hon. Member for East Lothian to attack mortgage relief. He is one of the lucky people who do not need mortgage relief to purchase a house. His speech contained one piece of interesting news, namely, that the Labour party in Scotland is still completely opposed to discounts for tenants, however long they have rented their public sector houses, who wish to turn their houses into homes of their own.

My hon. Friend the Minister fully explained the strategy behind the orders, and I fully support it, but why should a Back Bencher such as I support the continuation of housing support grant in Scotland at all? It is a selective handout from the taxpayer to particular areas of Scotland. It is a handout from which none of my constituents in Eastwood, Barrhead or Neilston benefit in any way. It is a movement of resources from Barrhead and Neilston to Glasgow. Why should I support that?

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East) rose—

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend the Minister rightly emphasised the increase that he is planning for management and maintenance. The hon. Member for East Lothian referred to rents. The average rent in Scotland will be about £16·25 a week, which compares with an average in England and Wales of about £17·40. Why is this justifiable, given that average incomes in the north of England and in Scotland are roughly the same? Is that not a clear and continuing disincentive for people in Scotland to buy their council houses?

My hon. Friend also rightly pointed out that the Government have reduced the rate fund contribution from an outturn figure of £139 million in 1984-85 to £22·2 million in the orders for 1988-89. That is £22·2 million too much. There is no justification in theory for a continuing subsidy from ratepayers to particular tenants. It is right that resources should be concentrated on capital, on management and maintenance and on investment.

[Mr. Stewart]

I hope that when my hon. Friend winds up the debate he will be able to confirm that this is the last time that the House will consider a rate fund contribution order or a successor to it. Next year, when the community charge will have been implemented, there will be no justification, on social or economic grounds, for this wholly indiscriminate subsidy from those who pay the charge in favour of certain tenants in some local authority areas. I support my hon. Friend's general strategy, with those reservations on the detail. I hope he will be able to confirm that that is the Government's intention for next year.

10.50 pm

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): It seems to be accepted on both sides of the House that the orders will do nothing for housing in Scotland. I do not think that I am alone in thinking that the Minister's heart was hardly in it when he opened the debate. Perhaps I might remind him of his former trade as an advocate. He gave all the impression of a man about to address the jury who has passed a note saying that his client did it after all.

The Minister's presentation was a triumph of expediency over reality, because the Government know —or ought to know—that there is a crisis on its way in housing. One in seven people live in overcrowded conditions. Thousands of houses have inadequate amenities and suffer from decay and disrepair. The Minister need only drive through the council house estates in his own constituency, which I have had occasion to do recently, to see clear evidence of that.

Since 1979, capital expenditure by local authorities on housing has been reduced by 27 per cent. We should consider housing support grant, rate fund contribution, he reduction in net capital allocation and income from sales when asking ourselves what the financial consequences of the orders will be. The result will be a 2 per cent. reduction in real terms in expenditure on housing in Scotland in the coming year.

The Government's behaviour is shoddy and uncaring. Others will be able to speak more eloquently of the problems in urban areas, but, in rural areas, the problems are frequently no less. North-East Fife district council is now Liberal-controlled, but it used to be Conservative-controlled. It has sold 2,179 houses, or 24 per cent. of its stock. It has sold a greater proportion of its houses than any other local authority in Scotland without objection and without cavil about the discount. It has followed the Government's policy in spirit and to the letter, but that earns it no support. It earns no help. It does not even earn a meeting with the Minister. Some 2,946 families are on the waiting list and 2,322 are in immediate need. There is nothing in the orders that will help the council to deal with the problem of those who are in immediate need.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman agree that he could have made that point if he had been here for question 8 during Scottish wuestions this afternoon? Why was he not here?

Mr. Campbell: I suppose that, after a while, one learns that there are those to whom one should give way and there are those to whom one should not. The hon. Gentleman seems to have put himself rather more firmly than he is accustomed to doing anything into the latter category.

The Government propose a rate fund contribution of nothing for north-east Fife. The sale of one quarter of the stock in north-east Fife has severely reduced its rent revenue. As a consequence, a relatively small number of tenants have to meet an increasing burden of interest charges on the council's housing account. Rents have had to be kept high to meet that burden and to provide for necessary repair and maintenance. Hon. Members should be in no doubt that the council and I accept that there is a need for repair and maintenance. It is all the more acute because of the aging nature of the housing stock in north-east Fife and in many other places in Scotland.

It is often said that immigration cases are the most tragic and difficult for Members of Parliament to deal with. In my short experience as a Member for Parliament, in many respects, housing cases may rival them. The Minister should come to my surgery when people come to me with complaints about their inability to obtain council houses. Perhaps he could read to them the prepared brief that he read to the House. He should listen to the response, which I suspect would be peremptory, vulgar, and, possibly, monosyllabic. Better still, the Minister should meet the district council of north-east Fife. He has just declined to do so.

It is most curious that a responsible local authority that has carried out the Government's policies to the letter is incapable of having a meeting with the Minister responsible for housing to discuss with him the very problems that have arisen because of that authority's willingness to carry out the Government's policy.

The orders do nothing for the problems of those in north-east Fife who require houses, and they do nothing for north-east Fife district council's management difficulties in relation to its existing housing stock. The truth is that the orders only compound the problems. For that reason, the Minister will find no comfort from my colleagues and me.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): We began the debate by referring to calculations, statistics and figures. I am sure that they are interesting. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) told the House that the Liberals' figure for overcrowding was one in seven, yet the Labour figure, which was given just a few minutes earlier, was one in four. That is not the narrow kind of discrepancy that one would expect. There are many divisions in the Opposition. Members of the alliance are unable to get their figures and their act together. The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) is living on borrowed time on the Opposition Front Bench. It is only a matter of time before one of the more able hon. Members behind him sits in his place. The hon. Member for East Lothian, with his acres and estates, being an absentee landlord, would probably find that his image is more in keeping with the Scots' image of aristocrats.

Labour Members continually refuse to face the fact that, when they came to office, the Government recognised that Labour, at local and national level throughout Scotland, had bought votes with a policy of cheap rents. That policy meant that inadequate funds were going into housing coffers to maintain housing stock.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths rose

Mr. Walker: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman in a minute, if he will wait to hear what I have to say.

Unless sufficient funds go into housing coffers, the Department will be unable to maintain its housing assets. There are two ways of getting funds into housing coffers. The first is through rents. The second is through public support in whatever form that takes. I deliberately said "in whatever form it takes" because housing benefit is one of the many forms of support.

Mr. McAllion: The hon. Member will recall that the Minister, when he opened the debate, said that the Government were very concerned to use the resources available for housing on capital expenditure and for that reason they were switching resources from housing support grant and rate fund contributions towards capital expenditure. The hon. Member seems to be arguing that, rather than switching those resources to capital expenditure, the Government are switching them to housing benefit and are pauperising people living in council houses. That seems to be the tenor of his argument.

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman is one of the individuals whom I expect to see sitting on the Opposition Front Bench in place of the hon. Member for East Lothian, if only because I believe that he attempts to do his homework a little more carefully. He does not indulge in the same vitriolic personal attacks which I believe are abusive and wasteful. In this case, I am sorry to say that the hon. Member for Dundeee, East (Mr. McAllion) seems to have got it wrong, like so many Opposition Members.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) rose——

Mr. Walker: The hon. Member is always very courteous and I will give way to him in a moment.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East must recognise that the Labour party has never got its act together properly on the difference between capital account and revenue account. He knows full well that that was one of the problems with the Labour clubs in Dundee. It was typical of the fact that the Labour party cannot differentiate between the various sources of funding and expenditure.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman clearly has a grasp of how best we can be promoted to the Opposition Front Bench. How does he account for the fact that he is where he is—and where he was in June 1979?

Mr. Walker: By choice—[Interruption.]

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Walker: Only two people in the House know the truth of that, and I am one of them. The other is in 10 Downing street. Not many people can say that. Not many people can claim that they believe firmly in what they are doing and in the value that they place on what they are doing for their constituents over and above personal ambition. I hold the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg) in high regard and believe that the Labour party never properly or fully appreciated his abilities as a Whip and particularly as Deputy Chief Whip. If the Labour party had the sensible arrangement that exists on the Conservative Benches, the hon. Gentleman would have been appointed a full Whip because he was so good at it.

The Government's policies are working towards a position where, when the community charge is introduced, we will no longer have to bring these orders before the House. I hope that this will be the last time that we will have to consider them. They do nothing for my constituents and, like my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), I recognise that this evening we will do nothing for our constituents. For far too long our constituents have been subsidising the profligate, vote-buying policies of the Opposition, through various forms of taxation.

11.3 pm

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): While listening to the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) I was astonished at my right hon. and hon. Friends laughing when he said that he is where he is—where he was in 1979—by choice. The question is: whose choice? The answer is, the Prime Minister's.

When I heard the Minister reading his brief, I understood clearly for the first time what Ruth Wishatt meant when she wrote in The Scotsman today:

"If he did not have a sore back, he would not see the present Scottish Ministers in his way."

When introducing the orders, the Minister clearly displayed himself as one of the Ministers whom the hon. Member for Tayside, North would not see in his road. I am only grateful that I do not have to make the choice between them.

This type of debate suits the Minister because it is not about the formula by which the housing support grant is calculated, because the Minister does not understand it.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The following facts have to be taken into account when considering the distribution of grant to authorities: estimated loan charges, supervision and management allowance per council house, additional allowances for some council houses in low-stock areas, basic repair and maintenance allowance per council house, supplementary allowance in recognition of certain additional needs, such as high-rise houses, allowances to represent other expenditure, a basic income factor per council house, estimated rate fund contributions and adjustments to represent other income factors. The actual details of working out the formula, which has been carefully done in conjunction with COSLA—I have had several meetings with that organisation—are complex.

Mr. Ewing: I know that the formula is complex for the Minister to understand because it has taken him 45 minutes to give the House that information. My hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) asked for it during the Minister's opening speech, but he simply could not give it.

The Minister referred to adjustments for other income factors, which cover an extremely wide area. They cover factors such as the level of unemployment in the housing authority areas. The Minister has simply not taken account of the level of unemployment in many Scottish areas. Average income is another factor that must be taken into account when calculating housing support grant.

In the past five years the housing support grant for Falkirk district council, as a result of this order, has dropped from about £4 million to not a penny piece. Unemployment and the inability to earn wages in that area has increased from 15 per cent. to 19 per cent. of the adult population. Therefore, as the housing support grant has been reduced, unemployment has increased. The Minister and his civil servants have taken absolutely no account of the economic factors that prevail in that area.

[Mr. Ewing]

I cannot speak with authority about any other district council areas. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) could confirm that the Inverclyde and Port Glasgow area is one of the most devastated of the United Kingdom. That area's allowance to make a rate fund contribution to the housing revenue account is a disgrace and takes no account of its economic circumstances.

Dr. Godman: It is my considered opinion that the Government are utterly indifferent to the plight of many thousands of people that I represent.

Mr. Ewing: My hon. Friend speaks with greater authority than either the Minister or myself about the problems in his own area. It is significant that only last weekend it was widely reported in the media in Scotland that there was a vigil outside New St. Andrews house by people from the Inverclyde area complaining bitterly about their plight and seeking to draw the Secretary of State's attention to their problems.

However, I shall return to the orders. The Minister totally failed, certainly in the case of Falkirk district council, and I suspect of many other district councils, to take account of economic circumstances. That is one of the main criteria to which the Minister should pay heed when calculating housing support grant.

I turn briefly to the ability to make a rate fund contribution to the housing revenue account. That is no business for the Government. They should not be interfering in whether a district council makes any contribution from the rate fund to the housing revenue account. If a district council chooses to make no contribution from the rate fund to the housing revenue account, that is a matter between the district council and its electorate when the district councils are elected in the first week of May this year. Equally, if a district council decides to make a substantial contribution from its rate fund to its housing revenue account, that also is a matter between the district council and its electors in the district council elections in May.

The Minister has absolutely no business to interfere in what is a local government matter, but that has been the hallmark of the Government. As people in Scotland continue to elect Labour councils, including in the capital city of Edinburgh, the Government take the huff and pull into the centre the freedom of local authorities to decide their own domestic housing policies.

The Minister, in a significant remark during his speech, told the House about the way in which registered rent had risen between 1979 and 1986 compared with the increase in local authority rates. The Minister should know—and I would caution him that he should be better briefed—that registered rents have risen by such a percentage because Rachmanism has run riot. Registered rents throughout Scotland apply to furnished housing. Racketeers are charging astonishing rents, and the rent officers are registering them at a very high level. When the hon. Members for Tayside, North and for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) complain about housing benefit, they should take a good close look at how much of that housing benefit is finding its way into the pockets of the racketeers who are bleeding young couples dry in furnished accommodation, for the simple reason given by my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian.

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. Gentleman and I have similar back problems. The hon. Gentleman will recognise that I have never complained about paying housing benefit because that benefit goes to the individuals who are in need. It does not subsidise the property.

Mr. Ewing: I really do not have the time to conduct a teach-in. For the benefit of the hon. Gentleman, housing benefit does not go to the individual; it goes straight to the local authority; and in the case of private rented accommadation it goes straight to the private landlord. That is where the bulk of housing benefit goes. As my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian said, many young couples who cannot get local authority housing are living in rented accommodation at very high rents, and I have just given the reason for that.

This is the fourth time today that I have heard the hon. Member for Eastwood speak. He was called three times at Question Time and again in this debate. I live in hope that he will eventually say something sensible, but so far my hopes have not been fulfilled.

Last year in the United Kingdom 64,000 council houses were taken back because those who had bought them could not keep up the mortgage payments. In Scotland —the Minister should have the figures—6,000 council houses were returned to building societies and local authorities because those who had bought them simply could not pay the mortgage. In Falkirk a couple went to their building society, threw the keys on the counter and told the society that the house belonged to it. They are now housed by Falkirk's district council in accommodation for the homeless. That is what is happening.

These orders, coupled with the Housing (Scotland) Bill, are removing rights from local authority and SSHA tenants and compelling them to buy, whether or not they want to do so. That is what Conservative Members are up to and that is why I shall willingly join my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Lobby to vote against these orders.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): Tonight we have had a good laugh at the speeches made by Conservative Members, and we cannot help but laugh when confronted with such buffoonery. We are discussing a serious subject which is no laughing matter, but we just cannot help ourselves, considering some of the contributions.

We are talking about the conditions in which people live and the housing that they must accept for want of anything better. In these orders the Government are cutting in half the rate fund contributions, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) said, are provided entirely by local ratepayers. Not a penny of it comes from central Government, and it is simply not their business how much or how little a local authority contributes. Nevertheless, two or three years ago the Government intervened to force these cuts willy-nilly, thereby making it even more difficult for councils to operate any sort of sensible housing account.

Where does the formula come from, for example, to justify cutting Glasgow's rate fund contribution by £6,500,000 for the current year? The Minister has not explained how the formula works. Are the figures plucked from the air and then cut? As has been pointed out, not a penny comes from the Government.

Presumably the Government have read COSLA's submission on this. It points out that the introduction in 1984 of statutory rate fund contribution levels is an intrusion into the affairs of local government and a further unacceptable erosion of local democracy. Since then the rate fund contribution limits have decreased from £112 million, or 18 per cent. of total costs, to £22 million, or 3 per cent. of total costs for next year. So if the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) thinks that there should be no rate fund contribution whatever, he is certainly well on the way to getting what he wants.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Not quickly enough.

Mrs. Fyfe: Net capital allocation has been cut by £35 million. Capital receipts have increased by £60 million, but even the Government admit that that figure is a guess. There is no means of knowing whether that will be provided. When one considers that attempts to buy council houses tend to dry up as people fall increasingly into unemployment, and those who have attempted it have to give it up as a bad job, it is clear that we cannot realistically expect any vast increase in capital receipts, yet the Government write in that figure. Again, where is the explanation? Where is the Government's explanation of the formula for arriving at this figure?

Even what the Government are doing for the private sector is nonsense. To reduce the grant by £24 million makes me wonder what feedback Conservatives are getting from their surgeries. People tell me that they do not feel that there is any point applying for a grant, as they know that the money has dried up. Conservatives need only look around them at the state of the private sector to see that there is obviously a great deal of need for the repair grants to continue. To cut them as they have done is highly irresponsible and will do great damage to private sector housing stock.

Let me concentrate on Glasgow's needs. Every hon. Member present must know that Glasgow had to seek an independent review of the state of its housing. Having appealed year after year to the Government to take a serious look at Glasgow's housing, the council had to invite independent and highly respected people to conduct that investigation. It must be about two years since that report came out, but what are the Government doing in response to Glasgow's housing needs?

How will the formula benefit Glasgow? The rate fund contribution was cut by £6·5 million, but not a penny of that is Government money anyway. The housing support grant has been raised from the current year to next year, but it is still only half the 1980-81 level. It comes nowhere near meeting the needs of Glasgow. Even previous Tory Governments accepted that Glasgow needed a far better level of housing support grant than this Government will give it.

If I make no other point tonight that gets through the heads of Conservative Members, I must make it clear that capital allocation is not a resource given to the council. The hon. Member for Eastwood said—I hope I quote him correctly—that resources should be concentrated on capital. After all his years in government, does he not know that all that the Government are doing in setting a capital allocation is allowing the council to spend its own ratepayers' money? Not a penny comes from the Government. Capital receipts are simply what the council gets from selling its housing stock. Again, not a penny of that comes from the Government. All that they are doing is reducing the good housing stock, but not getting any money in to replace it.

How is Glasgow supposed to pay off its massive debts? I remind Conservative Members that 40 per cent. of Glasgow's entire spending goes to pay off housing debt because of Glasgow's vast programme to clear slums and build houses after the war. Quite apart from the vast debt to be cleared, which is a millstone round Glasgow's neck, people live in intolerable housing conditions. Some houses are so damp that people are forced to shut off the bedrooms and sleep in the living room. Some have dangerous wiring and loose slates that take years to replace.

The Minister recently paid a visit to Maryhill. He was pleased to open a pleasant new housing association development, with a beautiful set of houses, with reasonable rents, which were a pleasure for anyone to move into. But he was not so willing to go a few yards up the road to see how people live in Ruchill, for example. The council cannot afford to do anything about the general environmental conditions of the people who live there. The Government are happy to be associated with the nice housing, but will not do a damned thing about the state of affairs for many thousands of people in Glasgow.

In conclusion, I can only say that the anger of the people of Glasgow has certainly been shown politically against the Government time and again. The Government have the cheek to talk about us buying support. What do they think they are doing when they keep on subsidising mortgage tax relief hugely, year after year, with no fancy talk about formulae to justify it? We want the same fair deal for council tenants.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): This is a black day for housing in Scotland. It is a black day for the 350,000 families who live in houses, with rotting windows and leaking roofs, which require modernisation. It is a black day for the 88,000 tenants living in houses that require rewiring. Many houses have wiring that is positively dangerous; some have rooms without electric sockets and others have kitchens with barely adequate electricity supplies. It is also a black day for the 153,000 houses that need major structural repairs and for those tenants who have to live in them. It is a black day for the 234,000 Scottish families who have to live in damp houses.

We have had an unedifying lecture from the Minister about the fact that two thirds of Scottish councils no longer receive any help from the Government or the taxpayer. We know that the combined cut in the rate fund contribution and the housing support grant this year is £14 million. We know that, under the Conservatives, almost no help has been given for housing those families—30,000 people in all—who, particularly at Christmas and in the winter, do not have a home of their own or a roof over their heads. The Conservatives have cut support to those families to an all-time low so that fewer than half the Scottish councils now receive help in housing the homeless.

That contrasts with the situation under the last Labour Government when 56 out of 56 district and island authorities received some support to help those who needed houses. Do Conservative Members wish to challenge that? They are prepared to sit and snigger among themselves. They will not get up on their feet and challenge those figures because they know that they are correct. Under the Labour Government, every Scottish council knew that the homeless people in its area could obtain some help.

[Mr. Nigel Griffiths]

What have the Tories done? They have ensured that no ratepayer or taxpayer has to spend any money to help the homeless. They have narrowed down the field so that only one third of local authorities in Scotland receive any help towards housing the homeless and that, within that one third, only council tenants bear the burden of helping those homeless families. That is the reality of eight years of Tory rule.

The orders perpetuate and exacerbate that policy. The homeless are now receiving help from the smallest number of people ever. It is not the better-off home owners, in Edinburgh and Glasgow, for example, who are being asked indirectly, through taxes, to help those homeless families, but the council tenants. The hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) said that council tenants are among the poorest people. That is why they receive the housing benefit that he supports.

Unfortunately, the Secretary of State for Social Services does not support that policy. After 11 April, millions of people, including 1 million pensioners, will suffer as a result of cuts in housing benefit. All Opposition Members and the vast majority of the people in this country feel some compassion for those who are down-and-outs, but the people who are being asked to dip into their pockets are council tenants whose earnings are below average and who form the poorest section of the population. That is the effect of the order which the Minister presented so proudly from the Dispatch Box. The poorest people of this country are being asked to help those who are even less fortunate than themselves. It is a great tribute to the people of this country that the poorest are willing to do that. People in my constituency are willing to help.

The hon. Member for Tayside, North said that Labour is buying votes by helping council tenants. That is far from the truth. The hon. Gentleman just has to open his eyes, even though that is difficult for him, and look around. Only a tiny minority of people in south Edinburgh own their own houses, but Labour's new heartlands are in Marchmont and Morningside.

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): The largest amount of home ownership in Scotland is to be found in my constituency. It has the smallest number of council houses. That gives the lie to the suggestion by the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) that Labour is buying votes through providing council houses. Our support is coming from home owners.

Mr. Griffiths: That point is well made.

Mr. Bill Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Griffiths: I hear the cry, "Point of order." I shall happily give way if the hon. Member for Tayside, North wants to make a bogus point of order.

Mr. Walker: I called out "Point of order" because I thought I heard the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) suggest that I was lying.

Mr. Griffiths: No Opposition Member would allege that the hon. Member for Tayside, North has the brains to lie, to tell the truth or to think anything out.

The problem is that council tenants, the poorest people, are being asked to foot the bill for homelessness in Scotland. Since 1979, Eastwood has lost £330,000 of grant to help the homeless. Eastwood district council matched the Government's contribution towards housing the homeless, but the Government are welshing on that partnership. Since 1979, Nithsdale has lost £1 million in housing support grant, much of which went towards housing the homeless. Kyle and Carrick, where the Secretary of State for Defence saw his majority slashed to fewer than 200, has had its budget slashed from £9 million to nothing by this Government. Edinburgh, the city that I am proud to represent, has lost £22 million under this Government.

I have received a letter from the Scottish Council for Single Homeless that spells out the effects of the housing support grant cuts in Edinburgh. There is a deficit this year of £330,000, and there will be a deficit of over £330,000 in the next financial year. That deficit will have to be met from the housing revenue account.

How does the Minister expect Edinburgh to provide that money when there is to be no support from the Government or the taxpayer? There is no answer to that question. The Government are not giving even a penny towards the provision of hostels. Both the Minister and the Secretary of State for Scotland take great pride in opening hostels, sheltered housing units and other showpieces that are largely local government and Labour council initiatives. They go along at the last minute and take the credit, but they give precious little support to those initiatives.

If the Government need to be convinced about that, they need refer only to the Secretary of State for Scotland's answer to me last Friday about Housing Corporation expenditure in Scotland between 1974 and the next financial year. They will see that under the Labour Government the Housing Corporation, from which so many Scottish housing associations receive money, was provided with enormous bounty. In real terms, spending increased fivefold under Labour. Under this Government, spending has barely increased by 50 per cent. in eight years.

When the Labour Government were in office, spending on housing associations and the Housing Corporation rose by 87 per cent. in 1975, 36 per cent. in 1976 and 46 per cent. in 1977. This spending increased in each year after that while the Labour Government were in office. We know that under the Conservative Government the projects that Ministers boast about have had their budgets cut. In 1984, the Government cut the Housing Corporation's budget. It was cut again in 1985, followed by a further cut in 1986. It is only in recent years that they have managed to increase the corporation's budget. A 2 per cent. increase in real terms has been squeezed for 1988-89.

The nub of our argument is that the Government have tried to steal the credit for what was done by the Labour Government. They have tried to denigrate the great work that was carried out by the Labour Government between 1974 and 1979. During that period there was a fivefold increase in spending within the private sector and housing associations. It is a disgrace that the work of my colleagues in the previous Labour Government is being denigrated. The lies must stop now. I challenge the Minister to challenge my figures, he having made a poor attempt to do so in Committee.

Even when we move from the co-operative and housing association sectors into what might be described as the Government's strong points, such as repair grants and the help that is given to home owners, we are aware of their woefully inadequate and pitiful record. This year, help given by the Government to home owners throughout Scotland will be cut by 16 per cent. The Minister knows that in south Edinburgh there will be thousands left on the waiting list, for 90 per cent. grants were nothing more than an electoral gimmick. It was made in the year before the 1983 general election, only to be dropped almost the day after the election by my predecessor.

The Government's housing record is abysmal. Notes are being passed to the Minister from the civil servants' Box. The only one that we want him to read this evening is, "I resign."

11.37 pm

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): There have been contributions of fervour and feeling on a subject that is deserving of them. That cannot be said of the two token contributions from the Conservative Benches, which have been virtually deserted.

I do not have to declare an interest, because Angus district council gets precisely nothing from the Government in terms of housing support grant. It receives nothing, zero, zilch or nil, and it is allowed to provide a similar amount in rate fund contributions. All housing improvements within the area of the district council fall on the shoulders of council house tenants. They receive no help from central Government. Housing support grant in Angus fell from £4·37 million to zero within three years. The Government do not understand the effect that such a dramatic reduction in resources has on a local authority that is endeavouring sensibly to plan its housing policy.

Prudent authorities are treated with the same contempt that is shown to authorities which the Government consider to be bad boys. Indeed, prudent authorities sometimes receive the worst treatment. Prudent budgeting is no safeguard against a Government who are so biased against local government.

It is ridiculous that housing policy in Scotland is being determined by the resources that can be raised from the selling of council houses and not by the needs of the people. It is clear that the Government's policy, in partnership with the private sector, is to starve Scottish authorities of the funds that are required to provide adequate housing for the Scottish people. Resources are being squeezed from councils. Only 25 authorities in Scotland are receiving help from the Government, and that number will dwindle to nil in the coming years. The figures show that two thirds of the total housing stock receives no central Government financial support. Yet local authorities should be a major engine in any drive to solve Scotland's housing problems.

The fall in the Government's support for Scottish housing contrasts starkly with their support for the political heartlands in south-east England, where huge public subisidies are given through mortgage interest tax relief. With 30 per cent. of the United Kingdom population, south-east England receives 50 per cent. of total relief, equivalent to well over £1 billion. Would that that money were spent in Scotland on our housing needs.

Specifically on the variation order, I ask the Minister how taking £707,000 from Roxburgh district will help its housing position, or how the £94,500 clawed back from Annandale and Eskdale will help that district. Indeed, how will the money taken from Argyll and Bute district do anything to help solve its rural housing problems? Based on a technical adjustment for interest rates, it would be better for these sums to remain within the housing system in each of the districts. In other words, the money is going in the wrong direction.

The calculations sum up the Conservative Government's attitude towards one of Scotland's major and long-lasting problems. [Interruption.] In view of the groaning on the Labour Benches, may I point out that I do not take long on my speeches, but I have the right to speak, and I will finish this speech. If hon. Members allow me to continue, I will finish promptly. If there have been delays, blame should be pointed in the direction of other hon. Members.

The Government's rate fund contribution is merely another way of stopping local independence of decision-making. It seems scarcely credible in the middle of a Scottish housing crisis, with homelessness and waiting lists increasing, with the cessation of public authority house building, and with dampness and other massive problems facing us, that these orders are before us to cheesepare sums of money which could otherwise be spent on helping to solve the problems. A proper Scottish house conditions survey could have been funded by the money that the Government are taking from Scottish local authorities, but nothing is happening.

We have a clear indication that the Government are going in the wrong direction. Instead of dealing with Scotland's housing problems by injecting more resources, they are squeezing money out of Scotland's private and public housing systems. These are technical documents which once again betray the Government's failure to deal adequately with Scotland's housing needs.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In response to the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh), may I say that Angus district council has decided not to increase rents next year.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths) raised again the question of improvements grants. For 1987-88 Edinburgh received a non-housing revenue account allocation of £8·5 million, plus £26 million which was earmarked for dealing with the grant backlogs. Glasgow had a share of that. The council's provisional non-HRA allocation for 1988-89 consists of £9·5 million, plus £14·5 million, earmarked for grant backlogs. In other words, the basic allocation on the non-HRA is up by £1 million if we take out the backlogs.

The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) said that much of the increase in housing support grant is due to interest rates. That is not so. The interest rate assumed for next year, 10·2 per cent., is only 0·1 per cent. above the rate for this year. The reason for the £12 million increase in housing support grant for 1988-89 is increased management and maintenance which is necessary to ensure that the housing stock is well looked after.

Sums spent on housing in Scotland in the public sector will increase from 1987-88. The planned gross capital expenditure was £719 million. That will go up to £748 millon. Hon. Members should not doubt that. In view of what has been said tonight, it should not be forgotten that the Government have again increased the provision for capital investment in Scottish housing. Although the housing revenue allocations for 1987-88 stood at record levels, the provisional allocations for 1988-89 are nearly 7 per cent. higher than the equivalent allocations for the current year. Of course, with the major disposals of stock to the private and voluntary sector, even greater investment is now being made in what was seen hitherto as local authority stock.

More local authority dwellings were improved last year — some 58,000, which is more than in any of the previous 10 years. More than 298,000 local authority dwellings, about a quarter of the stock, have been included in modernisation schemes costing about £1 billion——

It being one and a half hours after the motion was entered upon, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded to put successively the Question already proposed from the Chair and the Question on such of the remaining motions relating to Housing (Scotland) as were then made, pursuant to order [19 February].

Housing Support Grant (Scotland)

Resolved,

That the draft Housing Support Grant (Scotland) Variation Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 3rd February, be approved.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

11.55 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand that the Opposition Front Bench is not to move the prayer on the Order Paper. That is due to the fact that the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments has not yet completed its consideration of the relevant order because the Committee has asked the Department for an explanation of the vires of the instrument, which is important. It is important, too, to acknowledge the Opposition's position in ensuring that before a prayer or any other motion on an instrument is debated the Committee has the opportunity to complete its consideration and report to the House.

It is not a Standing Order that an instrument should be debated when it is reported to the House by the Joint Committee, but if the Opposition believe that a prayer should be laid against an instrument the Government should give them time in which to report it to the House. It would be unfair if the Opposition did not move a prayer in order to allow consideration to be completed and the Government did not then allow time for it to be moved in subsequent proceedings.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): The hon. Gentleman realises that it is not for me to comment on the substance of what he has said. On the procedural point, the House is indebted to him for putting that view on the record.

EUROPEAN LEGISLATION

Ordered,

PETITIONS

Rating Reform

11.58 pm

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Now that the House has dealt with a measure designed by Scotland's minority Tory administration to force up rents in Scotland, I take this opportunity to present a petition signed by 417 residents of the burgh of Cockenzie and Port Seton calling for the repeal of the legislation that is set to impose a grossly unfair poll tax on the people of Scotland.

The legislation has been overwhelmingly rejected by the Scottish electorate and it is still not too late to avoid the injustice and the chaos of the poll tax. I strongly support this appeal for the repeal of this dangerous legislation.

I have another petition on the same subject which I have been asked to submit. It is signed by 80 members of the Edinburgh 7/131 branch of the Transport and General Workers Union, which includes some of my constituents. The petition warns that the poll tax would discriminate against poor people in Scotland and favour more prosperous areas, so it would be likely to do great damage to the social fabric of our nation.

Once again, I join the petitioners in urging the House to reject this damaging legislation.

To lie upon the Table.

Hospital Complex (Downpatrick)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn. —[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

12 midnight

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): I am pleased and grateful to have this opportunity to speak about the crisis that faces the Downpatrick hospital complex in my constituency. I am also glad to see that the Minister responsible has returned to full health—the theme of the debate is good health.

When I applied for the debate, it was to ask for the provision of sufficient capital to rebuild what is known as the Downe hospital at Downpatrick—a building which is 104 years old and was built for another purpose entirely. We have since had an announcement from the Eastern health and social services board, which is responsible for the Downe unit of management, that it has been notified of a budget which is totally deficient for its purpose of supplying an adequate hospital and medical service to the entire board area. The board has said that it will face a deficit in 1988-89 of £7·6 million, not taking into account the fact that, in the next fiscal year, it must meet a wage and salary increase. The consequence of that shortfall is that the board is frantically—perhaps indecently—trying to close hospitals and wards to meet its unrealistic budget.

This is an old debate. It is 20 years old. I have had this argument with the Eastern board for that time. We are still without any capital programme to provide what it was recognised was needed as long ago as 1965. Notwithstanding that, we are now faced with the closure of a maternity hospital and the decimation of acute surgical wards. The hospital problem in Downpatrick has changed in the past couple of weeks, from seeking capital expenditure, to stemming the rot of closures and cuts.

I have the privilege to speak on my own behalf and on behalf of the entire community of Downe, of whatever political persuasion. I have received the unanimous support of the medical and paramedical members of the community.

Some 23 years ago, in the debates in Stormont and the then Department of Health, it was recognised that the Downe hospital needed to be replaced. Funds were earmarked for the enterprise. Unfortunately, we had only talk, and the money was redeployed to the Masserene hospital in Antrim.

A couple of years ago it was with a sense of déjà vu that, when I was seeking £6 million or £7 million of investment in that aging structure, we were told that no capital was available. Yet, out of the blue, £33 million suddenly became available for a hospital. Will hon. Members believe that again it was a hospital in the Antrim area? I do not begrudge money being well and usefully spent in the Antrim area, but our long-term approved need was not met in any way by the health board or by the Department.

In considering the problem, it is important to note the background against which I speak. Down is a rural area of 646 sq km, with a scattered population of 82 persons per sq km. It has no railway system, a poor bus service, and a road system that is still in the 18th century. Geographical features have a considerable impact on the delivery of health and community care services. None the less, the people of Down expect reasonable access to medical and surgical services.

That expectation was recognised by the Royal Commission on the National Health Service, which, in its 1979 report, stated:

"A fundamental principle of the national service must be an equality of provision, so far as this can be achieved without an unacceptable sacrifice of standards."

It went on to state:

"If inflexibility is to be avoided health authorities should implement national policy in the context of their particular geographical and demographic constraints."

That is the basis on which I urge the Minister to reconsider the Down district.

All rural areas have a service centre to which the rural community looks. At the moment that service area is the town of Downpatrick. I ask that a good hospital service be provided in that town. The alternative is totally inconceivable. It would mean that 40 per cent. of the entire area of the Eastern health board would be devoid of any real hospital and medical services.

In addition, there is an influx of inhabitants during three months of the year. Hon. Members may, or may not, know that the county of Down is the most beautiful and most tourist-oriented county in Ireland. It is not surprising —indeed, the Department of the Environment accepts this — that 1·2 million persons visit the area during a 12-week period. This means that, on a day-to-day basis, there are 11,500 extra people. On top of that, there are 900,000 overnight stays within that 12-week period, which means that another 9,800 people are resident in the area during the summer months. That is a total population surge of about 21,000.

Tourists and short-term stay people require medical services, just as the rest of the community do. In addition, injuries and accidents related to sailing, climbing, horse riding and other vigorous tourist pursuits put a greater demand on services than that which is normally expected in such a rural community. Again, the Royal Commission's report states:

"Hospitals must be accessible to the population they serve."

Another aspect of the background of Down relates to socio-economic factors. It is a poor, deprived area, which, in parts, has 21 per cent. unemployment. Other hon. Members may quote similar pockets of unemployment. There are other socio-economic factors.

The 1981 census of the Down district, as distinct from other local government areas in the Eastern health board district, produced certain facts. The census showed that the district had the highest average number of persons per household; the highest number of persons per room; the lowest percentage of households connected to the public water supply; the lowest percentage connected to public sewers; and the highest birth rate. I will add that, thankfully, it has the lowest perinatal mortality rate, due entirely to the presence of the maternity hospital. The district has a higher proportion of the population in the higher dependency bracket — the under-14s and those over 65 years of age. I am proud to boast that it also has the highest natural increase in population of all the districts.

In addition to those socio-economic factors, 32 per cent. of householders have no car. Of those in employment, 25 per cent. must commute outside the district. That adds another considerable dimension to the number of households without a motor car during the working day. Because of the lack of transport and the lack of a transport system, people cannot avail themselves of the hospital service unless that service is within a reasonable and convenient distance.

All those factors show a great need for an available and local service in the local hospitals, but what is being planned for the areas? There are plans for the closure of the maternity hospital and the destruction of our acute and surgical wards. Our maternity hospital was opened during 1981-82. Since then it has achieved a bed occupancy of 78·4 per cent., which is the third highest of the maternity units in the Eastern board area. However, the hospital has been singled out for closure simply because it has not reached that magical figure demanded by the authorities of 1,000 throughput births a year. Anyone would think that we were talking about cattle instead of human beings.

The total number of births in the district in 1986-87 was 1,073. Unfortunately, 355 were misdirected — in my opinion — to other maternity units. That statistician's delight, that bureaucratic blunder of 1,000 births, must not stand in the way of making adequate provision for the mothers-to-be, who very often will have to travel considerable distances from mountainous areas, but I doubt whether that will have occurred to the authorities.

I have no doubt that infant mortality will increase again to its previous levels. Infant mortality in the Down district was reduced to 5·34 deaths per 1,000 births, against a Northern Ireland average of 13·4 and a United Kingdom average of 11·4. That, if no other, is a justifiable reason for the maintenance and continuation of our maternity hospital.

What savings will be made? If those patients are placed elsewhere, they will need the same treatment and care, but with additional transport costs, additional stress and psychological factors that will probably extend the stay in hospital and so increase costs. There is no monetary sense in the matter at all. A monetary budget that takes no cognisance of the needs and welfare of the patient is flawed in the medical sense.

The other factor is the proposal to cut our surgical beds by almost 50 per cent. In practice that means that upwards of 1,000 people in the Down area who have received acute medical services in the past will have to go elsewhere, with the same costs for transport, the same stress, the lack of visitation and the psychological deprivation and new surroundings that I said would occur if the maternity unit were to close. The real effect will be to end the viability of the hospital as an acute hospital service.

I have not mentioned the fact that there is a large psychiatric hospital in the area, which, in turn, is dependent upon the maternity and surgical hospitals. Who, or what, is going to service the mentally ill and the seriously mentally retarded in that psychiatric hospital? The services are already being run down. Our ambulance service was transferred in 1986. Ear, nose and throat services and optical specialties were transferred in 1987. The financial administration organisation is to be transferred in 1988.

We are suffering from the past and continuing policy of the board and the Department — a desire for centralisation. Presently, centralisation is the god of medical administration. It is interesting to note that this week an eminent surgeon at the Royal Victoria hospital, who is one of the chief proponents of centralisation, in relation to Downe district hospital, said:

"This issue in this case is again not between peripheralisation and centralisation, but the extreme difficulties that would be involved for patients if Downe hospital were closed."

I am a layman, but it is clear that the medical opinion of Downe is unanimous and firm. The following observations have been made:

"1. We feel it is extremely unwise to make major policy decisions about the provision of services based solely on financial considerations.

2. The arguments about the pros and cons of retaining a maternity unit in Downpatrick have been rehearsed many times already, but the medical advice has been clear throughout, namely that the maternity services should be retained in Downpatrick because of its geographical isolation.

3. Closure of the maternity hospital would remove obstetrics and gynaecology from the GP rotational training programme of the unit. This programme is vital to the junior staffing of medical, surgical, geriatric and gynaecology departments."

It is also said that a 50 per cent. reduction in the number of acute surgical beds would mean that the unit would be unable to function effectively and therefore would be subject to future closure. It is also believed that the provision of existing facilities represents the minimum viable size of the unit.

I have expressed my grave concern about the effect of the proposals for the Down district. I ask the Minister to intervene directly to exercise his authority to prevent the gross deprivation of medical, maternity and, ultimately, psychiatric care. I ask the Minister and his Department not to stand aloof from the decision-making process of the Eastern health board. The Minister must not hide behind the departmental argument that it is for the board to decide. He must exercise his right to oversee the medical services for the Down district. The Minister and the Department must ensure that Downe receives equality of provision that is of an acceptable standard.

I am sure that the Minister is already in receipt of two reports from independent sources — one from PA Consultants and the other from Coopers and Lybrand. One deals with the need for the services and the other the costing of a modest, modern hospital for Downpatrick. I ask the Minister to consider urgently the points that I have made and that I know would receive the support of hon. Members if they were applied to their particular areas.

I ask the Minister to intervene to stop the closures and, at a reasonable date in the future, to lay aside a modest sum for the replacement of a 104-year-old building.

12.18 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Richard Needham): I thank the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) for commenting upon my health. My general practitioner was on holiday and therefore I have not made any use of the NHS, but I am glad to say that, at least for my benefit, I have fully recovered.

I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern, and he has expressed it in his usual forthright and eloquent way. He has raised two separate issues: the question of Downe hospital and the maternity unit.

As to the immediate threat, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Eastern board has issued a consultative document and it contains a wide range of possible options. As the hon. Member for South Down has said, this is not the first time that the matter has been discussed. The board will not take any decisions on the issue until there has been an opportunity for discussion. I appreciate that the time scale is fairly short. The end of the original time scale will not bring an end to the debate about what options the board is to adopt. The debate will have to continue.

Since the options are to be adopted by the board, I cannot go in any substantive way into the points that the hon. Gentleman has raised on the board's arguments or his own. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, it is the role of the board to make a determination and to judge the arguments. I cannot overrule that. I have listened very carefully to the hon. Gentleman because if the board comes forward with proposals the Department will have to consider them carefully.

The hon. Gentleman raised some points which gave me cause for concern. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman can compare the proposals for Antrim with those of Down. The proposals must be considered on their merits. If the merits of the case are such that Down should have a rebuilt hospital, that will be considered, as the case for a new hospital at Antrim was considered. Nor dó I find it particularly persuasive for the hon. Gentleman to argue that, because there is a large influx of tourists into a most beautiful part of Northern Ireland, facilities should be built which would be used for only two or three months of the year. As he rightly pointed out, we must build facilities to serve the population.

I understand the force of the hon. Gentleman's criticism, but the board has to live within its budget for the next year. The budget that we have had to place upon the board, the 5·2 per cent. increase, means that it will need to make savings of 2 to 3 per cent., which, as the hon. Gentleman said, is approximately £7 million. That means that the board will have to make difficult decisions. Clearly some of those decisions will not be popular.

We have to consider a point of principle in maintaining the acute services for Downpatrick. I appreciate the force of the arguments that the hon. Gentleman put so eloquently about the numbers involved in the population of the eastern area and the distance that people would have to travel were there to be a significant change in the acute care, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that there are problems in keeping a high-quality hospital open to small, dispersed and mainly rural communities.

It is not a question only of capital funds being made available for a new hospital. Even if we were to make the capital investment — I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman strongly believes that that capital investment should be made available—that is not the only problem. We are talking not only about buildings, but about the scarcity of staff, equipment and skills. It is not possible simply to buy those skills.

An acute hospital with modern facilities must be large enough to sustain adequate levels of junior medical staff. Otherwise consultants must put up with a heavy on-call commitment, and that cannot be satisfactory to maintain a service. An acute hospital of that sort must be viable in terms of capital costs, staff—the Downpatrick hospital has good, immensely dedicated consultants who work extremely hard—and the future. One must consider its capacity to attract, keep and train junior medical staff and to give them a range of specialties. Clearly, regional centres of excellence are bound to be more attractive. I am not saying that the argument for an acute hospital at Downpatrick is not necessarily strong, but it must be seen in the round and remembered that this is not only a question of money.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that the figure 1,000 had been grabbed from the sky; it has not. To have a successful and efficient maternity unit there must be a certain level of throughput. There must be sufficient clients for good paediatric cover, proper facilities and intensive care, and to allow staff to exercise and develop their skills. If there is a reason for doubt about the future of the Downpatrick maternity unit, it is that only 60 per cent. of mums in South Down use it. The hon. Gentleman said that mothers were misdirected, but I am not clear who misdirected them, whether their GPs, consultant gynaecologists or themselves. The unit has a capacity for 300 more babies a year than are born there. Many mums are voting with their feet for whatever reason. If the hon. Gentleman and community leaders want to keep that unit open, it is crucial that those who would naturally use it do so. It is questionable whether hospitals such as Downpatrick acute hospital and the maternity unit are viable if they are not properly utilised.

This debate has raged for many years. The Eastern board, in its area strategic plan, stated clearly that services would be maintained during the current planning period to 1992. I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern to reconcile that commitment with the problems of making the 2 or 3 per cent. savings to meet its 1988-89 budget. I can assure him that before any final decisions are made I shall want to explore this closely with the board chairman. If the board finally adopts a firm proposal which in any way affects Downpatrick, I shall make absolutely certain that it makes financial sense for the services involved.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that the Department will study closely any proposals from the board. This is not merely a question of funding; it concerns how the services are run on behalf of both the clients and staff so that the staff can give the quality of service that the people of Downpatrick deserve.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Twelve o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Imprisonment of Members

Mr. Speaker: I have been informed that Mr. William Ross, Mr. Clifford Forsythe, the Rev. Martin Smyth, and Mr. Harold McCusker were yesterday sentenced to terms of imprisonment of seven days. I shall cause the appropriate details of their offences to be published in the Votes and Proceedings and in the Official Report.

On Monday I notified the House that I had been informed that Mr. Peter Robinson, the hon. Member for Belfast, East, had been imprisoned for a period of 30 days. I am now informed that the sentence was one of seven days. I shall cause the corrected information to be published in the Votes and Proceedings and in the Official Report.

Following are the relevant letters from the Belfast magistrates' courts:

Dear Mr. Speaker

William Ross, Member of Parliament for Londonderry East, was convicted by me at Belfast Petty Sessions on 11 December 1987, of taking part in a public procession, contrary to Article 3 of the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987. I fined him £20·00, to be paid within 28 days.

As that fine has not been paid Mr. Ross was today committed to Prison for a period of 7 days.

Yours faithfully

Dear Mr. Speaker

John Clifford Forsythe, Member of Parliament for South Antrim, was convicted by me at Belfast Petty Sessions on 11 December 1987, of taking part in a public procession, contrary to Article 3 of the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987. I fined him £20.00, to be paid within 28 days.

As that fine has not been paid Mr. Forsythe was today committed to Prison for a period of 7 days.

Yours faithfully.
C.P. McRandal
Resident Magistrate.

Dear Mr. Speaker

Martin William Smyth, Member of Parliament for Belfast South, was convicted by me at Belfast Petty Sessions on 11 December 1987, of taking part in a public procession, contrary to Article 3 of the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987. I fined him £20.00, to be paid within 28 days.

As that fine has not been paid Mr. Smyth was today committed to Prison for a period of 7 days

Yours faithfully,
C. P. McRandal
Resident Magistrate.

Dear Mr. Speaker,

Harold McCusker, Member of Parliament for Upper Bann, was convicted by me at Belfast Petty Sessions on 11 December 1987, of taking part in a public procession, contrary to Article 3 of the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987. I fined him £20.00, to be paid within 28 days.

As that fine has not been paid Mr. McCusker was today committed to Prison for a period of 7 days.

Yours faithfully,
C. P. McRandal
Resident Magistrate.

Dear Mr Speaker

PETER ROBINSON, MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT FOR BELFAST EAST

On 17 February 1988, I sent you a letter signed by Mr F G Harty, Resident Magistrate, stating that Mr Robinson had been committed to Prison for a period of 30 days. I have now learned that he was in fact committed to Prison that day for a period of seven days only. I now enclose the appropriate letter signed by Mr M D McHugh, Resident Magistrate.

I regret very much this unfortunate error and apologise for any confusion it may have caused you. It occurred because Mr Robinson was apparently apprehended by the Police in respect of both unpaid fines at the same time. He paid one and was committed to Prison in respect of the other.

Yours faithfully

T V Patton
Clerk of Petty Sessions

Dear Mr. Speaker,

Peter Robinson, Member of Parliament for Belfast East, was convicted by me at Belfast Petty Sessions on 3 December 1987 of using on a road a mechanically propelled vehicle which was not exhibiting a licence in respect of that use contrary to section 12(4) of the Vehicles (Excise) Act (NI) 1972. I fined him £25, to be paid within 28 days.

As that fine has not been paid Mr. Robinson was today committed to Prison for a period of seven days.

Maurice D. McHugh
Resident Magistrate

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Mr. Speaker: Question Number 1, Mr. Harold McCusker.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It was a mistake to have read that out, as I have just read an announcement that the hon. Gentleman is unable to be present.

Stalker/Sampson Report

2. Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the disciplinary proceedings of the Royal Ulster Constabulary following events reported in the Stalker/Sampson report.

4. Mr. Archer: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has discussed with the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary relevant issues arising from the Stalker Sampson report.

9. Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any discussions during the past three weeks with the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary in relation to incidents which were investigated by Mr. Stalker and Mr. Sampson.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): As the House will be aware, the first part of my statement on 17 February dealt with the aspect of possible disciplinary proceedings as a result of the investigations carried out by Mr. Stalker and Mr. Sampson. I undertook to inform the House of further developments.

As I also told the House on 17 February, I have discussed the relevant aspects of the Stalker-Sampson inquiry report with the Chief Constable. In particular, he has accepted in principle all the recommendations made by Mr. McLachlan.

Mr. Clay: How can the Secretary of State claim any credibility for the disciplinary proceedings when senior officers who have perverted the course of justice are still in command? John Stalker was suspended as soon as any accusation was made against him. Given that the E4A unit was responsible for murder — [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw"] — will the right hon. Gentleman suspend from duty the man described by Stalker as "the senior police officer with the bulging briefcase," the man who set up the unit, Assistant Chief Constable Trevor Forbes, head of the Northern Ireland special branch?

Mr. King: What I could hear of the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question consisted partly of a farrago of stories gathered from various press sources, for which I am not sure how much authenticity he would claim.

Mr. Cryer: It is true.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Allow the Secretary of State to answer.

Mr. King: I do not accept the original premise of the hon. Gentleman's question. Matters concerning ranks of chief superintendent and below are the responsibility of the Chief Constable. Mr. Charles Kelly and his team have already started work and are in the Province now. The more senior ranks are a matter for the police authority. I can inform the House that Sir Philip Myers is already in touch with the authority.

Mr. Archer: May I ask the Secretary of State a question that I asked him on 17 February, which escaped him in the course of his answer? Since we all agree that the RUC cannot operate effectively without the confidence of the public, and since the right hon. Gentleman is now seeking to resolve that unhappy episode, would it not be wise to inject an independent element into the inquiries so that it cannot be said that this is merely police officers being investigated by yet more police officers?

Mr. King: With respect to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, the last thing that Northern Ireland and the police need are further inquiries of the length and scale that the right hon. and learned Gentleman might have in mind; there has already been an exhaustive inquiry. I made it clear to the House that there was no question of Mr. Stalker's work being suppressed. His work and that of the bulk of his team was available to Mr. Sampson, and that work was carried through. It is necessary to bring these disciplinary matters to an independent conclusion with the arrival of Mr. Kelly and with the appointment of a police authority to tackle its responsibilities.

Mr. Mallon: As the deputy chief constable of Greater Manchester, Mr. John Stalker, was suspended for the most spurious of reasons while investigating matters in the north of Ireland, does the Secretary of State not find it a curious contradiction that the Chief Constable of the RUC, who is under inquiry by the Northern Ireland Police Authority, remains on duty directing that force? Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that the expressions of absolute confidence in the Chief Constable of the RUC by the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister must inevitably prejudge the findings of the inquiry?

Mr. King: It is vital that the House remembers—it owes it to the RUC—that the events giving rise to these difficulties occurred in 1982. Before the reports and action of the Attorney-General, many hon. Members in all parts of the House paid tribute to the impartiality and determination of the RUC and to the courage that it showed in doing its work. I hope that hon. Members will not forget those words and that they will recognise that the credit for a substantial amount of the improvements that have taken place over the years must inevitably be given to the man who has led the force during that period.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is the right hon. Gentleman in a position to answer the question that was put to him last week by the representative of the police body in the House, namely that those police officers who were brought to court and charged with murder but who were found not guilty will not be tried or disciplined again under the present inquiry? Does he agree that it is wrong for hon. Members to pick out police officers and name them without substantiating the charge being made against them?

Mr. King: While I do not wish to imply that those officers will be affected, I must say that it is now Mr. Kelly's responsibility. Mr. Kelly and Mr. Jones, who is the Deputy Chief Constable, are working very actively with their team on this matter and it would be wrong for me to anticipate their findings. What I do know—I think that the hon. Gentleman also knows this—is that there is great feeling in Northern Ireland, after all the years that this matter has taken, that it is important to resolve it at the earliest possible date. With regard to this matter, I do not wish to comment on individual cases.

Mr. Kilfedder: The Secretary of State has paid tribute to the RUC. Is he aware that the vast majority of people in Northern Ireland, who for 20 years have been subjected to a brutal and callous terrorist campaign, have the utmost confidence in the RUC? They view it with the greatest pride and treasure the memories of those RUC officers who have been murdered violently by the Irish Republican Army.

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman may recall my closing remarks when I was announcing the disciplinary procedure. I said:

"This is a particular tragedy for a police force of the courage and professionalism of the RUC today, who have given ample recent evidence of their commitment to protecting the whole community from violence from whatever extreme it may come." — [Official Report, 17 February 1988; Vol. 127, c. 980.]

I stand by those words.

Mr. Soames: I warmly welcome the steps that my right hon. Friend announced a short time ago. However, will he accept that there was a degree of amazement at the response of the Republic of Ireland, which considers that the Government somehow preside over a banana republic in which the judiciary can be affected by a political decision? Will he at once lay to rest any such suggestion?

Mr. King: I am seeking to address some of the differences of view both on the Benches in this House and on the Benches in Dublin. The discussions that we had yesterday were most useful in that respect. These are very difficult issues and anyone who approaches them must honestly be conscious of the extraordinarily different—indeed, totally different—views on a number of issues. We are seeking a rather better common understanding.

Mr. Maginnis: Will the Secretary of State more firmly refute the allegation made by the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay), who suggested that the police were guilty of murder? Will he confirm that the police who were tried for murder were found not guilty, and will he also tell the House how he intends to deal with the situation where John Stalker, at a time when he was supposed to be carrying out an objective investigation into the RUC, was in fact communicating with the Manchester Evening News, conjecturing as to when Sir John Hermon might retire and suggesting that Mr. Anderton might like to succeed him? He later showed how subjective he was when he suggested that he, himself, was doing such a magnificent job that he might succeed Sir John Hermon as Chief Constable of the RUC. Is that not a disgraceful demonstration of unprofessional conduct by a man placed in a trusted position?

Mr. King: As I made clear to the House in my statement, much of the work done and various recommendations that I announced flowed from the inquiry carried out by Mr. Stalker and his team and all the recommendations were accepted in principle by the Chief Constable. I must add, however, that certain other aspects of the inquiry give cause for concern—not least what appeared in The Guardian, if it was correct—about the degree of confidentiality that was preserved. I am also concerned about the recent letter of a superintendent on Mr. Stalker's team and about the anxiety of a number of members of that team about the number of leaks during the inquiry.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the special branch in Ulster carries out its duties with great courage and at no small risk and that we should show our appreciation of that? Will he also confirm that those killed in the original incidents were given funerals with full military honours by the IRA?

Mr. King: On the latter point, that was certainly true in some cases. Undoubtedly, the special branch has performed outstanding service in Northern Ireland. It has saved very many lives in the security forces and among the general population. At the same time, as I made clear in my statement, it cannot be a force within a force. There were things that needed changing after 1982, and I believe that those changes have been understood. It is very important that, in the final analysis, whichever part of the police force a person may belong to, he is ultimately accountable.

Mr. McNamara: I am sure also that the whole House will agree with the last sentence of the Secretary of State. I am sure also that the right hon. Gentleman will recall the comment of Sir John Hermon that the family tree incident was "untrue and deeply offensive". If it was untrue, it was certainly deeply offensive. The Secretary of State will also recall that Mr. Stalker said:

"It is supportable by evidence".

Does the Secretary of State agree that this is no longer a private matter between two very senior and experienced police officers, but that the integrity of both of them is now at issue and that, in the interests of the police, it is essential that Mr. Stalker should now put his evidence into the public domain?

Mr. King: I should like to think a bit more about what the hon. Gentleman has said. I am not at all sure that I think that it is anything other than a private matter,. It is a most regrettable matter, and I do not want to enter into judgments upon it.

Security

5. Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will make a statement on the security situation.

6. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what improvements have been made in cross-border co-operation, to deal with the terrorist threat, in the last 12 months.

Mr. Tom King: Since I last answered questions in the House on 28 January, three members of the Ulster Defence Regiment and one civilian have died. The House will be aware that, sadly, two of those were the members who were killed last night close to the centre of Belfast.

The threat remains high, but the courageous and determined efforts of the security forces are continuing to yield results. In particular, they have recovered a number of significant caches of arms and ammunition thought to have belonged to both Loyalist and Republican terrorist organisations.

So far this year 34 people have been charged with serious offences and 222 weapons, 63,000 rounds of ammunition and 392lb of explosives have been recovered in Northern Ireland. In addition, already this year the Garda Siochana has made a number of very significant finds of arms and ammunition. These include some 125 weapons, 80,000 rounds of ammunition and almost 600lb of commercial explosives.

Mr. Latham: Following yet another statement from my right hon. Friend about atrocities and murders, is he aware that some Conservative Members voted for the Anglo-Irish agreement, which we have always supported, and that we have looked to it to improve border security, but that if it does not continue to do so we shall have to think again?

Mr. King: I note what my hon. Friend said. Perhaps he could explain to me how we are likely to do better in border security if we do not co-operate closely with the Government of the Irish Republic, because that defeats me. We face a serious threat in Northern Ireland at the moment which is considerably enhanced because of the involvement of new weapons which it is believed, on good grounds, come from Libya. That threat is clearly not just to Northern Ireland, but to the whole island of Ireland. In those circumstances, the closest co-operation with the Government of the Irish Republic is absolutely essential.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Has my right hon. Friend's attention been drawn to the remarkable success of the French and Spanish authorities in dealing with the Basque separatist movement through close co-operation? Will he assure the House that the respective heads of police from the North and South will meet shortly to improve co-ordination? Is he aware that he will have nothing but the full support of Conservative Members if he can achieve co-ordination between North and South on a far more advanced and sophisticated basis than over the past decade?

Mr. King: As my hon. Friend will appreciate, one can look at some of the figures that I was able to announce to the House about the success of the Garda Siochana. I am afraid that part of that is due to the scale of arms and explosives that may be present in the island of Ireland, but it is also a clear indication of the substantial commitment that it has been making on this matter.

I hope that we shall have an early conference — I think that we shall have a full conference — and, as I have said, I want to include cross-border security matters and to see the closest co-operation between the Chief Constable and the Commissioner. I make no secret of that fact, because it is most important. Because the RUC and the Garda are in the lead, they must co-operate closely in this, which they do.

Mr. John D. Taylor: Does the Secretary of State appreciate that complete confusion has arisen in Northern Ireland from the events of the past four weeks, and does he recognise that we do not know who to believe? Following the meeting in Dublin yesterday the Secretary of State announced that the Commissioner of the Garda Siochana would be meeting the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary at the next meeting of the Anglo-Irish Conference, but the Dublin Government immediately contradicted that statement. Who are we to believe?

Mr. King: If there is any confusion, I am sure that I can rely on the right hon. Gentleman to try to help us to clear it up. I am sure that he will play a leading part in that.

I made it clear that we had an excellent meeting yesterday. I think that the Tánaiste, Mr. Lenihan, and I found it valuable to discuss a number of issues. On the right hon. Gentleman's particular point, it is agreed—he will see this if he reads the communiqué — that there should be a full meeting of the conference in the near future. I have made it clear that I should like that to involve cross-border security operation. There is clearly some misunderstanding on the question of participation, but I intend to see whether that can be resolved at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Alton: Following the shooting of Aidan McAnespie by a young 19-year-old British soldier, and the release after three years of Private Thain, who himself was a young man when he was involved in the killing of another person, does the Secretary of State agree that the policy of putting young military personnel into sensitive security positions should be looked at again? Will he also accept that we on these Benches strongly believe that the Anglo-Irish Agreement should be consolidated and strengthened, and is the best way to proceed in fighting terrorism?

Mr. King: The House will recognise the heavy obligations and responsibilities that are laid on the security forces, and that is particularly so for young new members of regiments. The mainly outstanding way in which they have discharged those responsibilities is a tribute to the training and calibre of the troops that have served in Northern Ireland over the years. If anyone should ask why that soldier was in that sangar at that time, I would only say that every road block, vehicle checkpoint and watchtower in Northern Ireland exists thanks to the IRA and the terrorist.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Following the brutal murder last night of two members of the Ulster Defence Regiment, have the Government of the Irish Republic informed the Secretary of State whether they have any desire to hold an inquiry into those two deaths? Have the Government of the Irish Republic given any knowledge to the Secretary of State's office that they intend to hold an emergency debate in the Dail over those two deaths? Have the Government of the Irish Republic requested a special meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference as a result of those two deaths? If they have not, does the Secretary of State think that that is indicative of their political bias?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman makes the political point that he wishes to make in that contribution. I would merely add that the Irish Government have at no time suggested holding an inquiry into an affair in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hume: Given the recent decision to release Private Thain, which most reasonable people would believe strains the normal limits of compassion, will the Secretary of State accept from me, and many others who were politically involved in the early 1970s, that in that highly emotive period, when sectarian conflict was at its height and when 60,000 people changed homes in Belfast because of that sectarian conflict—the biggest movement in peacetime Europe—and with all the atrocities committed at that time, such as Bloody Sunday, and so on, it is understandable that young people from both sections of the community were sucked into the terrible violence, for which they are serving long sentences? In the light of the decision relating to Private Thain, would not normal compassion demand that we show the same compassion to all those young people? If the Secretary of State were to do that, it would have a powerful beneficial impact on the security and political situation in Northern Ireland.

Mr. King: The only qualification that I would make is that it would be wrong to equate the position of a soldier serving his country in Northern Ireland in a particular position with that of a young person of the same age who may have been involved in a terrorist purpose. None the less, I am sympathetic to the hon. Gentleman's point that young people who may easily be influenced by older people found themselves drawn into a situation which they now bitterly regret. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State looks at these cases carefully, bearing in mind the youth of the person involved. Of course, the very nature of "Secretary of State's pleasure" cases means that a person must have been under 18 when the crime was committed. We do look sympathetically at such cases, but we must obviously take into account the risk of reinvolvement.

Mr. Stanbrook: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, where there is terrorism on both sides of a common frontier, one might well expect the maximum degree of co-operation in dealing with that terrorism, whether or not there is in existence something called the Anglo-Irish Agreement?

Mr. King: I certainly believe that it is in the interests of both our countries. It is significant that, in spite of the recent difficulties and tensions over certain problems, the Taoiseach, Mr. Haughey, has made it clear that, although there may be an impasse on one or two particular issues, there is certainly no impasse on close cross-border security co-operation. That is in the interests of both our countries. Mr. Haughey has spelt that out in the Dail, and I never cease to spell it out in this House.

Mr. Flannery: Does the Secretary of State realise that when double standards are seen to prevail, as in the case of Private Thain—which he appears to dismiss rather too lightly in my opinion—that strengthens the hand of terrorism, because the terrorists see that what happens on one side does not happen on the other? Was not a group of people let out in that case, rather than just one person? Is it not a disgraceful situation, and will it not strengthen the IRA?

Mr. King: I have tried to explain the background in response to the question of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), and I cannot add much to that. I am sympathetic, as is the House, to very young people who find themselves caught up in the web of terrorism early in life, but the House must also have regard—and I should be failing in my responsibilities if I did not take account of this—to the risk of reinvolvement of people who are released. I must consider that carefully, as complaints would soon arise if we took the wrong decisions.

Mr. Mates: Does my right hon. Friend accept that Conservative Members note with great satisfaction the enormous improvement in security since the Anglo-Irish Agreement was signed, particularly as reflected in the huge finds of arms and ammunitions on both sides of the border, and in the increase in the number of arrests on both sides of the border for terrorist offences? Does he agree with me that, if the Anglo-Irish Agreement and the Conference had not been in place, the very difficult times through which we have been in the past three or four weeks would have been a great deal worse?

Mr. King: I certainly accept that. There have been difficulties in the history of the relationship of this country with the island of Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. Mr. Lenihan and I recognised yesterday, at our meeting, the benefit that is now coming from the working relationship and the understanding that have developed. I repeat the phrase that I used—we do not speak the same language, but we are beginning to learn to translate. That is important if we are to have a happier future.

Mr. McNamara: Is the Secretary of State aware that the Minister in charge of day-to-day security in Northern Ireland is the Minister who has returned Private Thain to the Army? Is he further aware that that Minister was also responsible for refusing a request to furnish the Fair Employment Agency with a reference supplied by a Catholic seeking a job on HMS Caroline, so that the Belfast Recorder said that, in all probability, he had refused to disclose the reference because the man was a Roman Catholic, and found the Ministry of Defence guilty of unlawful discrimination? In those circumstances, does the Secretary of State agree with The Daily Telegraph that that casts most serious doubts about his judgment as a Minister, particularly in the Northern Ireland Office?

Mr. King: As the hon. Gentleman has made that personal attack, he owed it to the House to be better informed of his facts before he made it. It gives me the opportunity to tell the hon. Gentleman and the House that the matters contained in the second half of the editorial to which he referred are not true.

County Down (Hospitals)

8. Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if, in view of the recent announcements on cash limits, he will take steps to ensure that the residents of South Down served by the Down group of hospitals will not be deprived of any of the minimum medical facilities which are at present available to them.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Richard Needham): The Eastern health and social services board has recently issued a detailed consultative document on options for changes to the pattern of services in its area, including South Down. Since the board itself has not yet reached any conclusions, it would not be right for me to comment at this stage.

Mr. McGrady: Is the Minister aware of the statement in the House yesterday by the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, about the biggest ever capital investment programme in the National Health Service for Scotland? Will he compare that with the draconian cuts and severe budget restrictions imposed on national health in Northern Ireland? In those circumstances, will he reconsider his Budget proposals for 1988-89 for NHS provision in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Needham: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's concern on this question of the Down services. This is the second time that we have been able to discuss the matter today. I have told him that I will consider most carefully any proposals from the board. I must point out that, as he is well aware, the level of health provision in Northern Ireland is second to none in the whole of the United Kingdom.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the serious concern in Northern Ireland about the way that he is handling hospitals? Is he also aware that if he continues on this line hospitalisation will be very difficult? It is not one section but the entire community that is suffering. I have taken an interest in the case that is before the House. It is not good enough for the Minister to tell us that it is a matter for the board. When he takes money away from the board, how can it make any other decision?

Mr. Needham: Rather than damaging the Health Service in Northern Ireland, the hon. Gentleman should accept that the level of provision of health care is higher in Northern Ireland than elsewhere in the United Kingdom, as it ought to be. While I accept that it creates problems for the Health Service, the provision of 5·2 per cent. additional funds this year is the absolute maximum that can be afforded because of the pressures of the law and order budget and unemployment.

Mr. John D. Taylor: In considering any changes in hospital provision within the Eastern board's area, will the Minister always bear in mind that the most rapidly increasing population is in the Bangor-Newtownards part of the area?

Mr. Needham: I am sure that the Eastern health board will take that into account when it considers the options.

Harland and Wolff (AOR1 Contract)

11. Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has now made any public subsidy available in relation to the AOR1 contract at Harland and Wolff.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Viggers): No, Sir.

Mr. Brown: In view of the Minister's predictable answer, will he assure the House that the Government are not in breach of the EEC sixth directive on shipbuilding, which must apply to Harland and Wolff as it does to other merchant shipyards? In the light of press speculation in Monday's Belfast Telegraph, can he make a statement to the House on the future of Harland and Wolff?

Mr. Viggers: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that Harland and Wolff must comply with the EC sixth directive. I saw the speculative story to which the hon. Gentleman referred. The position has not changed in recent weeks. The future of the yard will depend upon its ability to win orders — this, too, has not changed in recent weeks — within the constraints of the EC sixth directive, which limits Government subsidy on merchant shipping orders to 28 per cent.

Mr. Maginnis: Does the Minister agree that there is a difference between orders for merchant ships and orders for ships for the Royal Navy, the first category being eligible for subsidy, whereas the second is not? Will he tell the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) that it is time he realised that if the AOR2 had been allocated on merit, perhaps Swan Hunter would not have received the contract and it would have gone properly to Harland and Wolff, as the AOR1 did?

Mr. Viggers: The hon. Gentleman has made his own point to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown). The hon. Gentleman is right about shipbuilding orders. The EC sixth directive relates to merchant shipbuilding orders. I am pleased that Harland and Wolff has now virtually completed the ATS vessel, which should be delivered shortly to the Ministry of Defence. Of course, the AOR1 is also under construction in the yard.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Will the Minister tell the House that it is the view of the Northern Ireland Office that Harland and Wolff has been making determined efforts to better its lot in the shipbuilding industry? What is his Department doing to ensure that the speculation in recent newspaper reports will not come about.

Mr. Viggers: We congratulate Harland and Wolff on the efforts that it has made to improve its performance, but its future will depend on its ability to win further shipbuilding orders within the constraints to which I have referred.

Mr. Jim Marshall: May I press the Minister further on the future of Harland and Wolff? He will be aware that in the Belfast Telegraph on Monday of this week there was an article which said that closure was an option being considered by the Government. Will the Minister take the opportunity to deny that closure is on the cards? As the Minister knows, the economic future of Belfast and of Northern Ireland will be disastrous if the shipyard is closed. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask hon. Members not to carry on private conversations?

Mr. Viggers: I have already said in my response to the initial question that the position has not changed in recent weeks. The future of the yard must depend on management's ability to win orders. That is not the Government's responsibility. It is the responsibility of management, and we support it in its search.

School Statistics

12. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of schools in Northern Ireland have a selective intake; and what percentage of school leavers in each sector achieve five or more higher grade O-levels or equivalent.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Dr. Brian Mawhinney): In most areas of Northern Ireland pupils are selected for grammar or secondary intermediate school education on the basis of a transfer test undertaken at age 11. Twenty-nine per cent. of the secondary schools in Northern Ireland are grammar schools and 71 per cent. are secondary intermediate schools. The percentages with five or more higher grade O-levels are 83 and 14 respectively.

Mr. Coombs: Does my hon. Friend agree that the figures that he has given, in overall terms and indeed for pupils in non-selective schools, are significantly higher than for many authorities in England and Wales? Does he also agree that the more flexible, less ideological and more pragmatic attitude towards selective education in Northern Ireland contains important lessons for those who wish to raise standards in England and Wales?

Dr. Mawhinney: The Government are committed to raising standards in schools throughout the United Kingdom. I can confirm that in Northern Ireland 36 per cent. of school leavers have five or more good grade O-levels, as compared with 27 per cent. in England and Wales. I have to tell my hon. Friend, however, that in Northern Ireland those who leave school with no qualifications at all represent 22 per cent. of the pupils, whereas the figure in England and Wales is 10 per cent. That is obviously a matter of concern, and we must have responsibility for children's education and the raising of educational standards right across the education spectrum.

Ms. Short: Is the Minister not concerned that 71 per cent. of children in Northern Ireland go to secondary schools, where they have only a 14 per cent. chance of obtaining significant O-level passes? Does that not mean that the bulk of children are not receiving real opportunities in secondary education? Will he reconsider the position?

Dr. Mawhinney: I do not accept what the hon. Lady has said. We seek in Northern Ireland to run a school system that maximises children's potential. It is a mistake to assume that the only children worth educating are those who are intellectually bright. All children have the potential for development, and we try to run a school system that produces that development.

Mr. Kilfedder: The religious apartheid that exists in education in Northern Ireland—two systems supported by the taxpayer—cruelly divides young people during their formative years when they should be getting to know each other, and learning together. Will the Minister, who has already done considerable work in this regard, provide further money for the integrated schools in Northern Ireland, which provide a good academic education?

Dr. Mawhinney: I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman for the commitment that he has expressed over such a long period to seeking to educate the children of Northern Ireland together, or at least in closer association than in the past. He knows that we are trying to be as helpful as possible, in a variety of ways, to reduce the present divide between the children.

Sex Discrimination Order

14. Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many replies he has received to his request for observations on the draft Sex Discrimination (Northern Ireland) Order.

Mr. Viggers: The answer is 27.

Ms. Mowlam: Will the Minister state his own commitment to equal opportunities for woman in Northern Ireland, and will he amend the draft order so that it is in line with European legislation?

Mr. Viggers: The Government are committed to equality of opportunity in Northern Ireland, as in the rest of the United Kingdom. We think it right, however, that promotion of equality of opportunity in relation to gender in Northern Ireland should be handled as it is in the rest of the United Kingdom.

As for our own commitment in Northern Ireland, I am pleased to inform the hon. Lady that funding compares very favourably with that of the Equal Opportunities Commission in Great Britain. It was increased by 11 per cent. in the year before last, and by 9 per cent. in the current year.

Kilroot Power Station

16. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what decision he has made regarding phase II of Kilroot power station.

Mr. Viggers: So many hon. Members are not here, for various reasons, that it has been quite difficult to keep pace with the questions.

Mr. Speaker: It is quite understandable.

Mr. Viggers: Revised bids for the provision of new generating capacity, including the completion of Kilroot phase II, were received from Northern Ireland Electricity and Antrim Power Company Ltd. at the end of January 1988. The revised proposals are currently being examined and until that process has been completed the Government will not be in a position to make a decision on future generating capacity.

Mr. Foulkes: I am grateful for that reply—eventually. I hope that the Minister will be rather more expeditious when considering the various options for Kilroot power station. I hope that he will bear in mind that Northern Ireland Electricity wants to convert phase II to coal and that that will also be very important for the coal industry in Ayrshire, particularly the area that I represent. I hope that, as a penance for his appalling delay in answering my question, he will agree that it ought to be converted to coal and give a long-term guarantee that that coal will come from Ayrshire.

Mr. Viggers: The hon. Gentleman is quite correct in saying that the availability of the completion of Kilroot power station with coal provides an attractive option for Northern Ireland. But there is a further attractive option for Northern Ireland, and that is the indigenous brown lignite resource. We are considering very carefully whether coal or lignite is the appropriate resource for future generating capacity, and whether, if brown lignite is the choice, it should be through NIE or through the private bid which has been submitted to us.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Couchman: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 25 February.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Couchman: I recognise that my right hon. Friend, in her pre-eminent position as First Lord of the Treasury, will not share any Budget secrets with the House today. Nevertheless, will she confirm that she has impressed on her right hon. Friend the Chancellor that the experience of the last nine years shows that there is nothing contradictory or irreconcilable about raising tax thresholds, lowering tax rates and increasing public expenditure, notably on the National Health Service, in the sensible and prudent way that we have done and that we discussed last night? Is it not a fact that a low-tax economy increases incentive and productivity and ultimately leads to a higher tax yield for the services that we all desire?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. Lowering direct taxes is an essential part of getting the growth that we have seen over the last few years and therefore getting the resources to spend on such things as the National Health Service and increased nurses' pay. We also have to remember that nurses, too, pay income tax, and that when a nurse on £170 a week knows that she pays £46 a week in tax and national insurance contributions together she is not going to say that she wants taxes to be kept at that level. She would much prefer to have more net take-home pay through reduced taxation.

Mr. Kinnock: If the banning of organisations completely dedicated to securing peaceful change in South Africa does not make the Prime Minister stop her pathetic appeasement of apartheid, what will?

The Prime Minister: We do not appease apartheid in any way. As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, we spend considerable sums of money in helping black South Africans to get the education that some of them might otherwise not get, and on helping security in the front-line states. I wish to make it quite clear that I condemn the latest move by President Botha to suppress free argument and debate. It will be a great setback to the possibility of peaceful negotiations. However, the application of universal sanctions would not improve, but only make worse, a very difficult situation.

Mr. Kinnock: When the Prime Minister's words of condemnation are mocked by the Botha regime and held in contempt by the victims of that regime, is it not plain to everyone that those words deserve that contempt and encourage further repression by those in charge of apartheid? When Bishop Tutu says that South Africa is heading for war, and when her own Foreign Secretary says that he thinks that the latest bannings make violence more likely, why does she not convene the Security Council, press for comprehensive sanctions and make an effort that is really worth while?

The Prime Minister: We do not make a difficult situation any easier by adding to it starvation and poverty for those whom we wish to help.

Q2. Mr. Neil Thorne: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 25 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Thorne: Will my right hon. Friend condemn the actions of those head-in-the-sand trade union leaders in the National Health Service in Scotland who led the strike yesterday, against the interests of the patients who could benefit enormously from the extra funds that would become available if the Health Service in Scotland had the benefit of the privatisation of services that applies to the Health Service in England?

The Prime Minister: Yes. It was a political strike in Scotland yesterday on the part of the nurses. Competitive tendering in England has released some £100 million a year that will go direct to extra patient care. It is appalling that there are people in Scotland who would rather waste money than save it by competitive tendering, and thus have more money to spend on patient care. We utterly condemn that strike, which led to about 400 operations being postponed.

Mr. Steel: Will the Prime Minister explain to the House how the current cuts in the family planning provisions in the Health Service will save money in the long run, given that the likely result will be greater occupancy of maternity beds or more abortions?

The Prime Minister: I hope that those who need and want such advice will continue to take it. I do not believe that any changes would have the effect that the right hon. Gentleman says.

Q3. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 25 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hughes: Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning the murder last night of two members of the Ulster Defence Regiment and the return of terror tactics to the centre of Belfast? Does she agree that if foreign Governments wish to look at the security forces in Northern Ireland, they also should look at the use of the bomb-to-kill policy of Republican terrorists?

The Prime Minister: It is a tragedy that two more members of the Ulster Defence Regiment were killed last night, bringing the number of the security forces killed in Northern Ireland this year to six, in addition to the 27 who were killed last year. I hope that those who seek to undermine or criticise the security forces will remember the merciless attacks to which they are subjected and be thankful for the work that they do.

Mr. Maginnis: Does the Prime Minister recall how, in the wake of the Enniskillen tragedy, the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) urged her to agree "that no one should use the terrible suffering of those people of Enniskillen for political reasons?"—[Official Report, 12 November 1987; Vol. 122, c. 558.]

Does she believe that the same restraint should now be shown in regard to the tragic shooting in Aughnacloy last Sunday? Does she agree that it is unjust, unhelpful and uncharitable for Cardinal O'Fiaich to preach in his pulpit that that incident was murder?

The Prime Minister: Northern Ireland has suffered a great deal of violence, and that violence is continuing. Some individual tragic incidents have come to the public notice more than others. Our task should be the same on both sides of the border—to do everything we can to increase security and reduce the violence, because it is aimed not only at Northern Ireland; it is fundamentally aimed at the future of democracy in the Republic of Ireland.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Will the right hon. Lady bear in mind what happened in Belfast last night? She will appreciate how I feel today, when I say that one of those young men was a member of my church, engaged to a young lady who is a member of my church, and the last time I spoke to them was to arrange their marriage. The other young man who was murdered last night was from the same district. I ask her to have a word with the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland about the circumstances of the killing. Is she aware that a hoarding erected by the Lang company obscured the vision of the patrol, preventing it from seeing what was happening in the Smithfield area? The patrol had made representations to its superior officers about this, and no action was taken. Will she see to it that the matter is thoroughly investigated and that young men who go on duty are listened to?

The Prime Minister: Yes, we understand how the hon. Gentleman feels. He may rest assured that we all feel the same way and express our sympathy to the families of those people, and to the families of those who were injured. I have heard what the hon. Gentleman said about the hoarding. The matter is being thoroughly investigated. I echo the sentiment, which I know he feels, that men of the Ulster Defence Regiment are particularly brave. We really are very fortunate that, whatever happens in Northern Ireland, and whatever the number of tragedies, people are still prepared to volunteer to come forward to protect democracy.

Mr. Eadie: Is the right hon. Lady aware that in Scotland since the general election her party has lost 2 per cent. support, and it was very poor before the general election? Can the right hon. Lady tell us whether it is part of her Government's strategy that we must lose 7,000 jobs in the mining industry as the price of privatisation? Why did she bring in aid the brief supplied by the SSEB, when she knew perfectly well that the matter was about to go to the courts?

The Prime Minister: If one is interested in jobs, and we are—although I note that the Opposition support many strikes aimed at the destruction of jobs and at moving jobs elsewhere—one is interested in each and every industry being highly competitive and able to supply its material to other industries at a world competitive price as delivered to the power stations. I understand that the latter matter has now been set down for a date for hearing and, therefore, I can say nothing further.

Q5. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 25 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Smith: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in August 1986—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have missed No. 4 I will go back to it after this question.

Mr. Smith: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in August 1986 the National Institute of Economic and Social Research forecast, for the calendar year 1987, growth of 1·8 per cent. and a PSBR of £11 billion? As it is now clear that growth in 1987 was 4·8 per cent. and there was no public sector borrowing requirement at all, will my right hon. Friend advise the Treasury to ignore the latest forecasts from the institute, except perhaps to advise it to buy a new computer?

The Prime Minister: Economic forecasting is, of course, notoriously difficult. I noticed an article in one of last Sunday's newspapers, which compared the actual forecasts with the outturn, and the forecasters did not come off very well. I have noticed the one to which my hon. Friend referred, but I think that it is now well understood and agreed that the most respected forecasts are those of the Treasury, and I am proud to be First Lord of it.

Mr. Speaker: I apologise to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth). Question No. 4.

Q4. Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 25 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Howarth: Does the Prime Minister agree with the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security that families should be urged to forgo a second holiday abroad to fund private health care, or does she join the Labour Benches in urging people to forgo a 1p reduction in tax to secure the health of the whole nation?

The Prime Minister: I am all for families being able to keep a bigger proportion of their own earnings, so that they can make their own choice.

Mr. Lord: Does the Prime Minister agree with me that the hospital matron was unique, in that she was able to deal with consultants and doctors, understood the needs of patients and nurses, and was at the same time able to keep a very careful eye on such basic items as bed linen and bandages? I ask the Prime Minister to look at the matter urgently and reintroduce this valuable post as quickly as possible.

The Prime Minister: Yes. I think that many members of the public regret that there is now no official post of hospital matron, because they believe that it kept up the standard of hospitals in a unique way. It is possible for the head nurse still to have that title in hospital, but that is not quite the same as a post. A number of people have the title. More local health authorities can have it if they so wish. It is a matter that we shall look at in our general review.

Q7. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 25 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Boyes: Is the Prime Minister aware that thousands of pensioners who live in houses with community alarms and similar apparatus, including up to 300 in Sunderland borough, have been waiting months for the NTVLRO to make a decision about whether they qualify for concessionary licences? Will she speed up this process and, further, when she instructs the Chancellor of the Exchequer what to put in his Budget, will she make sure that he leaves some money so that these folk get what they deserve, a 5p licence for their television?

The Prime Minister: I will of course call the attention of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) has said. It is not our policy to have 5p television licences for all old-age pensioners, as he knows, although that is the case in certain homes. Such a licence would only put the burden on all other television licence payers.

Business of the House

3.33 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for next week.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

Mr. Dobson: I thank the Leader of the House for his statement. The Opposition welcome the fact that there will be an early opportunity in Government time to debate the Government's proposals to increase electricity prices and sell off the electricity supply industry, including nuclear power stations, to private owners.

Can the Leader of the House tell us why the debate on Welsh affairs next week is being held not on St. David's day but the day after?

Will the Leader of the House tell us when we can expect the Select Committee on televising proceedings of the House to get down to work?

Finally, perhaps in an effort to improve order in the House before it is televised, can the Leader of the House tell us whether he is taking steps on the Government side to end the deliberate barracking of Opposition speakers, such as that faced by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) yesterday, and end the concerted efforts of Conservative Members to take up time in debates so that Opposition Members with direct constituency interests in those debates are excluded from them?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman has asked me three questions. First, I am sorry that it has not proved possible to arrange the debate on Welsh affairs for St. David's day, but, all things considered, I do not believe that we have done too badly.

With regard to televising the House and the establishment of the Select Committee, there are active discussions taking place through the usual channels and with all parts of the House. I hope that we can get that Select Committee set up as soon as possible so that we can get on with things. The hon. Gentleman's criticisms in his third question sound a bit like whingeing and I believe that they are a matter for you, Mr. Speaker, rather than for me.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I wonder whether my right hon. Friend remembers that, last October, I had to go to court, at great expense to myself, to defend the confidentiality of correspondence between myself and a constituent who was involved as a witness in a murder case? Therefore, I wonder whether my right hon. Friend would agree to a debate on the confidentiality of correspondence between Members and their constituents especially given the fact that last week, during the rate-capping debate, at column 1240, the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell) quoted the contents of a letter sent to me by the director of finance of Ealing council, and evidently copied to the hon. Member without my knowledge, concerning one of my constituents. That letter was a private matter between myself, my constituent and the director of finance and I believe that an important principle was breached, let alone good manners.

Mr. Wakeham: I do remember my hon. Friend's involvement in that matter last October, but I do not believe that I can promise him a debate on that subject. I should have thought that such things were better dealt with by the conventions of the House, that confidential documents should be kept confidential. I should have thought that to proceed in that way was in the best interests of us all.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): May I thank the Leader of the House for agreeing to have the debate on the Scottish education order on the Floor of the House on Monday evening.

Given that a number of timetable motions have been tabled, when does the right hon. Gentleman expect that the House will have an opportunity to debate the reports of the Select Committee on Procedure about timetable motions as well as its recommendations about private Members' business, particularly those relating to the use of petitions?

There have been newspaper reports that the Scottish Select Committee is again being delayed because of the unwillingness of Conservative Members to volunteer to serve on it. Can the Leader of the House say when the House will be able to give instructions to the Committee of Selection to give the go-ahead for the Scottish Select Committee to be established?

Mr. Wakeham: The Procedure Committee has a number of reports outstanding and it is certainly my intention to provide time for a debate on them. At this stage I cannot give a specific undertaking about the timing of that debate, but I believe that it is extremely important that hon. Members on both sides of the House should study those reports before we proceed to a debate.

With regard to the Scottish Select Committee, I have had a helpful letter from the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and I believe that that will enable us to make some further progress.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): Although I agree with my right hon. Friend about the importance of studying the reports of the Procedure Committee before they are debated, does my right hon. Friend also agree that it is extremely important that we have that Committee back in being because there are a number of matters to which it should turn its attention?

Mr. Wakeham: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend and, indeed, discussions are presently going on through the usual channels to try to get that Committee set up.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the Leader of the House aware that the Clerks of the House have said that the Opren drug disaster is not sub judice under the rules of the House? Yet the Government have done nothing to help the 1,300 applicants who have, between them, received a total amount less than was given to one American citizen. Why cannot we debate that issue?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that the right hon. Gentleman and a number of other hon. Members are concerned about this matter, but I cannot promise him an early debate on it. I do not think I can add anything of substance to what I said about it two or three weeks ago.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, although the report produced yesterday by the Public Accounts Committee on charities says little that people in the charity world have not been saying for a number of years, its publication, coming on top of the recent decision not to prosecute the Moonies, and last year's efficiency review under Sir Philip Woodfield, will have added to the interest in a debate in the House in Government time on charities and the urgent need to tighten the regulations?

Mr. Wakeham: I appreciate that this is an important matter. As my hon. Friend said, the report has only just been published. The Government are considering it and their observations will be published in a Treasury minute in due course. That is the best thing to do first.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): When may we expect a statement on Scottish electricity privatisation, which is important not only in itself, but because it is clearly the cause of the impasse and breakdown in relationships between British Coal and the South of Scotland Electricity Board?

Mr. Wakeham: I can confirm that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will be making a statement in the near future.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): In view of the large number of our hon. Friends who have signed the early-day motion on the National Union of Students closed shop, will my right hon. Friend give an undertaking about an early debate on that important subject, as literally hundreds of thousands of people are affected by that petty tyranny?

[That this House welcomes the 1987 Employment Act which introduces legislation that will significantly reverse closed shop arrangements, but notes that hundreds of thousands of students will still have no choice over whether or not they join the National Union of Students; and hopes that the Secretary of State for Education and Science will take action to rectify this anomalous position as soon as possible.]

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that a number of our hon. Friends feel strongly about this. I cannot promise an early debate on the subject, but it seems to me that, with a little ingenuity, it might well be raised on the remaining stages of the Education Reform Bill.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Will the Leader of the House recall a matter that I have raised with him during business questions before? I refer to the prayer, tabled as early-day motion No. 499 in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), on the subject of changes in regulations for planning inquiries relating to power stations and overhead power lines.

[That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Electricity Generating Stations and Overhead Lines (Inquiries Procedure) Rules 1987 (S.I., 1987, No. 2182), dated 16th December 1987, a copy of which was laid before this House on 18th December, be annulled.]

Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that the praying days for the measure were exhausted on 19 February? Will he give us an assurance that the matter will be debated on the Floor of the House on revocation?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that the time has run out for praying but I do not think that that should necessarily stop us having a debate if one can be agreed through the usual channels. We are trying to work that out at the moment.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Is the Leader of the House aware that many hon. Members on both sides are concerned about certain parts of the Firearms (Amendment) Bill, and in particular about the lack of provision in it for compensation for shooters who will have their weapons taken away? He will be aware that the Minister announced a compensation buy-back scheme in Committee after a constructive debate. When will he lay the money resolution?

Mr. Wakeham: The Government are considering the matter. We hope to table a motion as soon as possible, but I can add nothing more to that.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): Will the Leader of the House reconsider his decision about the Welsh day debate being called for Wednesday? As a foreigner, the Secretary of State may not appreciate the significance of St. David's day to Wales. We do not want our daffodils drooping on Wednesday. We demand a debate on St. David's day; we have been asking for that for years. It is time the Leader of the House appreciated the significance of that day to the people of Wales.

Mr. Wakeham: I am not too sure about all this foreigner nonsense. My father was born in Cardiff and I reckon that makes me more Welsh than some people who consider themselves Welsh. I thought I had done pretty well to hit 2 March; I am sorry if that upsets the hon. Gentleman. I suggest that he finds out how to look after his daffodil.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): My right hon. Friend will be aware that diplomatic moves are afoot to advance the peace process in the middle east. Will he, in the light of the considerable interest in the subject that has been shown among hon. Members, arrange for a wide-ranging foreign affairs debate before very long?

Mr. Wakeham: There will clearly be a need for a foreign affairs debate before too long, but I cannot promise one in the immediate future. There will be Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs Questions next Wednesday, so perhaps my hon. Friend could try his luck then.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Will the Leader of the House accept that some of us regard it as an anachronism that there should have to be an annual Welsh day when Parliament should be dealing with our problems all the year round?

On a more substantive matter, will he tell the House of the fate of the Griffiths report? When can we expect a statement? Will he give an assurance that that important report will be published?

Mr. Wakeham: I can think of worse things to do than to debate Welsh affairs in the House all the time. I cannot make a promise on the matter, but I shall refer the hon. Gentleman's question about the Griffiths report to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Will my right hon. Friend accept that many people agree with him that space research must take its place with other priorities? None the less, does he agree that the report of the Lord Shackleton illustrates that there are grounds for concern about the United Kingdom's space programme? Surely this subject must be worthy of a full debate in the House.

Mr. Wakeham: It is certainly worthy of debate. The Government would be happy to defend their record on space research, which we consider to be good given all the commitments involved. My hon. Friend might try his hand, subject to you, Mr. Speaker, during Monday's debate on British science when he could raise some of his points then.

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): May I press the Leader of the House to expand slightly on the answer that he gave about the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs? It would ease frustration among Labour Members if we could know whether the right hon. Gentleman will be in a position to put forward Government names for the Committee in the near future.

Mr. Wakeham: To travel hopefully is not always to arrive, but I shall do my best. I had been waiting for a letter from the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). I have now received a helpful and constructive letter from him, but I cannot add anything further.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): May I renew my call to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House for a debate in Government time on the problems facing the civil aviation industry? Last Monday, we had a good run for our money on the subject of air safety, which highlighted the need for a debate on that topic. By 31 March, the Civil Aviation Authority will require comments on its review of air licensing policy. It seems quite wrong for decisions to be made on that subject until the House has had a proper opportunity to discuss all the issues involved.

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that my hon. Friend takes a great interest in these important matters. I wish that I could help him by promising a debate in the near future. Unfortunately, there are many conflicting calls on our time. The chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority is actively reviewing the procedure for investigating and reporting air misses. No doubt my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will be reporting to the House in the near future. That will be the next step.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Will the Leader of the House make time for a debate on low pay? When the Prime Minister visits my constituency tomorrow we hope to draw attention to the growing problem of low pay, particularly in the Health Service, where the disastrous privatisation programme has meant that not even jobcentres will accept advertisements from Mediclean.

Mr. Wakeham: I wish that I could find time for the hon. Lady to have a debate on the subject. We are coming up to the season for an extended debate on the Budget resolutions. Some of the points that the hon. Lady wishes to make could be made in that debate.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): My right hon. Friend will know that for several weeks I have been pressing for a statement on meningitis. I am grateful to him for the courteous and detailed letter that he sent me following my request last week. This is a matter of national importance, not merely personal importance. I press the Government to make a statement on meningitis because many people who read snippets here and there in the newspapers do not know the full extent and nature of the problem. It is time that the Government cared and made a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks about the way in which I dealt with the matter last time. I shall refer the issue to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to establish whether he thinks anything further should be done.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Leader of the House arrange a debate or a statement on the current dispute at TV-am? Is he aware that for several months there has been a dispute, with a lockout of members of the Association of Cinematograph, Television and Allied Technicians, because of the management's attitude? Does he know that, according to recent reports, in contravention of section 20 of the Broadcasting Act 1981, the Saudis now own almost a controlling share in that organisation? Will the right hon. Gentleman have a word with his hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken)—one of the directors of the company—who has issued a statement calling on Tory MPs to go to TV-am with fellow directors on Wednesday to break through the picket line? When he gets there, I shall be there, along with some of my friends, to ensure that those from other television companies who look to this dispute in the hope of maximising their profits do not turn it into another Wapping.

Mr. Wakeham: When the hon. Gentleman started his question, I was determined not to have another debate. Having listened to him and realised to what extent he has got the wrong end of the stick over most of the issues involved, I was tempted to change my mind. However, I thought better of it; there will be no debate.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that a large number of right hon. and hon. Members have signed early-day motion 6?

[That this House deplores the fact that, alone among public service pensioners, those whose service was overseas cannot count pre-appointment war service towards their pensions; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to remedy this injustice to a dwindling group of elderly people whose working lives were spent in adverse conditions while dedicated to the service of British interests overseas.]

It draws the attention of the Government to the anomaly whereby all public service pensioners get war service credit in their pensions unless that service was overseas. Will my right hon. Friend allow us a debate so that what is fast becoming a majority of hon. Members may impress upon the Government the need to do justice to this group of very deserving people?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that this is an important matter, and my hon. Friend has raised it on a number of occasions. However, I cannot promise an early debate and I cannot reasonably add much to what my hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development said earlier in the week.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff South, and Penarth): The Leader of the House has had opportunities to explain the reasons for not having a debate on Welsh affairs on St. David's day. He has not yet given us a reason. Will he take this further opportunity to do so? Will he reassure us that it is not simply because of the non-availability of the Secretary of State for Wales, who may prefer creating photo-opportunities in Wales to attending to serious business in this House? Will the arrival of the television cameras in this House attract the Secretary of State to be with us for a debate on St. David's day and will the Leader of the House assure us that next year we can have the debate on St. David's day?

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot at this stage promise the date of the debate in 1989. On this year's debate, if the hon. Gentleman does not know already, he will shortly know how these matters are arranged. They are arranged through the usual channels for the best convenience of everybody in the House and we did our best to meet all the requirements in this case. It is usually not wise to speculate or make slightly mischievous statements about what one thinks the reasons are, because one is usually wrong.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will my right hon. Friend consider having a debate on Scottish affairs only on St. Andrew's day and a debate on English affairs on St. George's day?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend does not say what we should do for the rest of the time. His suggestion is very helpful, but I do not think that I can quite accommodate it.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): May I again ask the Leader of the House to consider a debate in Government time on the important subject of speech therapy provision in our schools? He will agree with me that many parents are very distressed at the shortage of qualified people to teach and help youngsters suffering speech defects.

Will he also reconsider his disappointing reply on the Welsh day debate and may I remind him that my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) will have no difficulty in looking after his daffodil?

Mr. Wakeham: I felt sure that the hon. Gentleman would have to get in on the act on the question of the Welsh day debate. I cannot be more helpful than I was before.

I imagine that the whole House recognises that the problems of children with speech defects are a serious matter. I should like to provide time for an early debate and I shall look into the matter, but I cannot promise that I shall succeed.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Will the Leader of the House please bear in mind that when the Criminal Justice Bill returns to the House of Commons there will doubtless be a well-supported clause for the reintroduction of capital punishment? As that is a matter of such public interest and has such public support, and as the state has a duty to protect its citizens, will my right hon. Friend please allow a full day of debate on that important matter?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that my hon. Friend is fast on his feet in such matters, but we should wait until the Bill returns to this House to see what amendments are tabled. We shall then work out how best to deal with them in the customary fashion.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): May we have a debate on the growing misery of vandalism and theft that afflicts shops, homes, churches and schools, especially in my constituency, and on the Home Secretary's refusal to make available the extra police who are needed on the largest estates? May we ask the Home Secretary for a statement on when he proposes to reply to the request from the chief constable of Leicestershire for 91 additional policemen, which will not be enough to contain the menace that has increased during the past nine years?

Mr. Wakeham: I shall certainly refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. I very much hope that in any reply my right hon. Friend may make he will point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman the additional resources that are now available in the number of police as a result of this Conservative Government's policies in recent years.

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): May I reinforce the plea of my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) for a debate on civil aviation because there are not only the matters to which my hon. Friend referred? I ask my right hon. Friend to note other matters, such as airline competition policy, airport capacity and the licensing of certain foreign carriers coming to this country's regional airports, all of which are jostling for attention and would justify a useful debate.

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the strength of what my hon. Friend says, but I do not think I can add to what I said earlier.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): From the questions asked the Leader of the House will realise the importance attached by Scottish Members to the Scottish Select Committee. What priority does the Leader of the House place on a Committee which is unique by the fact of its non-existence? In saying that a letter will lead to further progress, can he guarantee an announcement some time during the 20th century?

Mr. Wakeham: A Committee that does not exist is not unique. Many Committees that do not exist are unique. I cannot add anything more, but I am working quite hard on this matter, as the hon. Gentleman well knows.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (Derbyshire, West): Will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate on local government in Derbyshire where, as the latest of its nonsensical ideas, the county council has now issued 100 guidelines, which no doubt took a lot of time, to staff in its schools to say that they should not refer in letters to "he" or "she" when talking about their pupils? Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is yet another of the county council's nonsensical ideas, following that of printing on all school notepaper, "Derbyshire supports nuclear-free zones"? A debate would be a useful exercise to expose the abuse of local government that we are currently facing in Derbyshire.

Mr. Wakeham: I have to say to my hon. Friend that in all charity there are not enough hours in the day to expose all the nonsenses of that local authority. However, it seems to me that he might find an opportunity in the not too distant future to table an amendment to the Local Government Finance Bill when it comes back to the Floor of the House.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Does the Leader of the House remember the Prime Minister reluctantly admitting that about 170,000 pensioners have been robbed of £1 million in compensation as a result of the recent error in the calculation of the retail prices index? Does he also remember that several hon. Members of all parties have raised this matter with him? Can he give us some inkling of the outcome of his meeting with the Prime Minister on this subject? If he is not prepared to reconsider the matter to ensure that the Government meet their moral obligation to pay that money, will he at least ensure that that £1 million is given to pensioner organisations which are campaigning for a substantial increase in pensions and for a better deal for pensioners?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman, who is usually so careful about these things, should re-read the statement because he clearly did not take it on board. The Government have done something which they were under no legal obligation to do. They believe that they have got it right. On the previous occasion that the matter was raised in the House, one of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends raised the case of an individual pensioner, which I did not believe was a sensible way of proceeding. The Government's statements on these matters have shown that, for all practical purposes, they have dealt with the matter in as fair and reasonable a way as possible.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): Will there be time for an early debate to consider the terms of early-day motion 652 relating to miscarriages of justice which so far today has the names of 157 right hon. and hon. Members?

[That this House, in view of the widespread disquiet at the recent judgment by the Court of Appeal in the case of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings, calls upon the Home Secretary to establish an independent review tribunal, along the lines recommended by the Home Affairs Select Committee Report on Miscarriages of Justice, in particular to examine the claim by the honourable Member for Sunderland South that he has traced and interviewed the four men responsible for the bombings and that they are all in Ireland.]

If not, may we have a substantial debate on the Floor of the House at Report stage of the Criminal Justice Bill?

Mr. Wakeham: What is discussed when the Criminal Justice Bill comes back to the House is not a matter for me. I do not see how I can reasonably arrange a debate on this issue at the present time, particularly in view of proceedings which I understand are shortly to take place in the courts.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): May we have a statement on the EEC agreement with Turkey on the importing of acrylic yarns, which has a restrictive safeguard clause which, before it can be operated, involves the sacking of workers and the closure of mills? Is the Leader of the House aware that already that agreement with Turkey through the EEC has led to short-time working in Bradford and a statement is urgently needed to protect jobs? Is it not time that some attention was given to the way in which the Government are continually capitulating to the demands of the Common Market with a consequent adverse effect on jobs in constituencies such as mine?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not accept the substance of the hon. Gentleman's question, but I shall certainly refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): In response to the question put to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), does my right hon. Friend consider that perhaps we should shortly have a debate on broadcasting so that that hon. Gentleman can explain to his lower-paid constituents, with whose woes he never fails to regale us, how it is that next week he will be appearing on a potentially violent picket line in order to defend the rights of television technicians who earn in excess of £40,000 a year for less than 30 hours a week?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend puts his point well and I wish that I could arrange such a debate next week, but I am afraid that I do not see how I can fit it in.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is the Leader of the House aware that the non-political organisation, Hospital Alert, has arranged a national lobby of Parliament today and at least 5,000 people will be coming to the Palace of Westminster? Will he give an assurance that can be circulated to people throughout the country who make contact with that organisation that every Member of the House, apart from Ministers and Parliamentary Private Secretaries, are free to sign the early-day motion, which calls for additional resources for the National Health Service? Will he say that there is no need for any hon. Member to excuse his or her failure to sign because it can be amended to secure the necessary objective?

[That this House congratulates the Confederation of Health Service Employees on the publication of its Charter for the National Health Service entitled "2p for Health"; urges that when the Chancellor announces his Budget on 15th March he uses the money put aside for a 2p tax cut for the National Health Service instead; calls on National Health Service staff, those who use its services and those who care about its future to unite in calling for that money, which amounts to £2·5 billion, to be used to fund a way out of the crisis; calls for £2,000 million to go directly into patient services, taking National Health Service funding back to the real level it enjoyed in 1979 and £500 million to be spent immediately, to improve pay and conditions for staff; calls for funding to continue to be through the tax system so that care can be given free at the time of delivery; calls for a rise in health authority funding of at least 2·5 per cent. above the increase in gross domestic product over the next 12 years to bring health spending up to the average for West European countries so as to provide a stable financial framework and enable long-term planning; calls for the urgent talks on how to improve working conditions; calls for full funding for pay awards to relieve the pressure on hard-pressed health authorities in defence of patient services; calls for a guaranteed independent system of pay determination for all health staff; calls for a users' charter of rights setting out a legal right to treatment, calls for a duty on health authorities to look at the quality as well as the cost of services; and calls for the involvement of staff and users in ensuring that standards are met.

Mr. Wakeham: I am sorry to lecture the hon. Gentleman, but the first thing that one has to do before signing an early-day motion is to see whether its terms are reasonable and sensible and I hope that all will recognise that there has been a substantial increase in funding in the NHS under the Government which is likely to continue in future.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Did the Leader of the House hear that amazing interview given by the Rev. Pat Robertson, one of the Republican party's presidential candidates, in which he said that he had had a discussion with God who had told him that Europe and the middle east would be destroyed and the world taken over by the evangelists? Does the right hon. Gentleman share my concern that someone like the Rev. Pat Robertson might become President of the United States and, through the nuclear button, have the wherewithal to fulfil that prophecy?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This must bear some relation to our business here.

Mr. Banks: It relates to a request for a debate on broadcasting to enable the House to make its opinions clearly heard. We do not want those television evangelists polluting our airwaves with the disgusting spectacle of people such as Pat Robertson and Jimmy Swaggart pouring out their emotions. They are nothing more than Right-wing conspirators. Can we have a debate?

Mr. Wakeham: I had been wondering whether the hon. Gentleman had been overworking recently. I am bound to say that if he thinks that that is a sensible subject for a debate next week, he should go on holiday for a while.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Will the Leader of the House concede that a growing number of hon. Members on both sides of the House, and, indeed, people outside, feel that it is difficult for the Government and the Opposition to conduct their business effectively in the House after 10 pm? That may be even more evident with the televising of Parliament. Since there is no Procedure Committee, will the Leader of the House advise us how best this matter can be brought to the attention of the House for an early decision?

Mr. Wakeham: There is another hon. Member who seems to be falling by the wayside.

For many years the House has tried to conduct as much of its business as it can before 10 pm, but I do not see that, in the foreseeable future, we shall be able to finish our business before 10. I have a feeling that the hon. Gentleman would be the first to complain if some of the subjects that he wanted to debate could not be discussed.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the fact that members of the National and Local Government Officers Association have until 15 March to cast their vote in the political fund ballot? Is he also aware that NALGO is grossly misrepresenting the Trade Unions Act 1984? Will he arrange a debate so that the House can discuss NALGO's distorted campaign of misinformation in an attempt to mislead its members into voting yes?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that this is an important matter. I see the substance in what my hon. Friend says, but I cannot promise him an early debate. I suggest that he puts down a question to the Secretary of State for Employment for answer at Question Time next Tuesday.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Does the Leader of the House realise that the Scottish Grand Committee, which does still exist, has not met since daffodils last bloomed in all the lands of the United Kingdom? Has there ever been a time since the Union of Parliaments in 1707 when the Scottish Grand Committee has failed to meet for such a period of time, when the Welsh Grand Committee has met on three occasions since the general election? Is it because the Secretary of State for Scotland is fearful to come before the massed ranks of the Opposition to debate the crisis in the Health Service and in education in Scotland, not to mention the diversion of money from the important bypasses in my constituency to the A74, and many other issues?

Mr. Wakeham: If the hon. Gentleman likes to comfort himself with that view of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, whom I heard giving a good account of himself in the House earlier this week, he is welcome to do so. Whether the Scottish Grand Committee meets in Edinburgh is not entirely a matter for me. Other parts of the House have a view on that. I can only say that I am glad that my ancestry was Welsh rather than Scots, as they seem to be a bit easier to control.

Electricity (Privatisation)

4.8 pm

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Cecil Parkinson): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the future of the electricity supply industry in England and Wales.

In our manifesto, we promised to bring forward proposals to privatise the industry. Our purpose is to give the customer and the employees a better deal and a direct stake in the industry. I believe that the industry will achieve more if it is moved into the private sector, freed from Government interference, and made accountable to its customers and shareholders, including its employee shareholders.

In framing my proposals, I have adopted six principles. Decisions about the supply of electricity should be driven by the needs of customers. Competition is the best guarantee of the customers' interests. Regulation should be designed to promote competition, oversee prices and protect the customers' interests in areas where natural monopoly will remain. Security and safety of supply must be maintained. Customers should be given new rights, not just safeguards. All who work in the industry should be offered a direct stake in their future, new career opportunities and the freedom to manage their commercial affairs without interference from Government.

There is substantial room for competition in the electricity industry. The distribution and transmission of electricity are largely natural monopolies, in which it would not be economic to duplicate resources, but there is no natural monopoly in electricity generation, which accounts for some three quarters of the costs of electricity. Only if competition is introduced will there be real incentives for generators to build power stations efficiently, to have their stations available and to fuel and run them efficiently.

There are three conditions which must be met if competition in generation is to develop. First, the effective monopoly enjoyed by the Central Electricity Generating Board will have to be ended. It will not be sufficient to leave the CEGB in its dominant position and rely on the growth of competition from Scotland, France and private generators. Second, ownership and control of the national grid will have to be transferred to the distribution side of the industry. However well regulated, the CEGB would have little incentive to allow competing generators fair access to a grid that it owned and controlled. Private generating companies would have little incentive to enter the market and compete. Finally, the CEGB's obligation to provide bulk supplies of electricity will have to be ended, as it obliges the CEGB to take all the key decisions on power supply.

I therefore propose to introduce legislation at the earliest opportunity to provide powers to restructure and privatise the industry. Those powers will be used to reorganise the CEGB into three new companies. The first will be a new generating company, owning some 30 per cent. of the CEGB's existing capacity, all of it non-nuclear. The second will comprise the remainder of the CEGB's generating capacity, both fossil-fueled and nuclear. The third will be a national grid company, whose ownership will be transferred to the 12 existing area boards. The area boards will in turn be converted into 12 distribution companies, preserving their strong regional identity. The Government will consult the industry about the implications of privatisation for the employees and the continuing functions of the Electricity Council, but the council itself will be abolished when the new structure is put in place. When they have been established, the shares in the 12 distribution companies and two generating companies will be sold to the public and employees.

In future, the distribution companies will be able to look to private generators, Scotland, France, the two large generating companies or their own generation to meet demand. The new structure will introduce competition, which will be the best guarantee of the customer's interests, but the legislation will also provide safeguards and new rights. It will create new opportunities for employees.

First, it will establish regulatory arrangements to promote competition, to provide incentives for efficiency and to oversee electricity prices to the consumer.

Secondly, a number of measures will be taken to ensure the security of supply. Because there are not alternatives to electricity in many of its uses, security of supply is of great importance. The legislation will therefore place a clear obligation to supply on the 12 distribution companies, which will ensure that they contract for sufficient capacity, but security of supply is not simply a question of having sufficient capacity. Power has to be transmitted through the national grid and the grid controllers have a central role in planning and directing the use of power stations so as to prevent the failure of the system and to minimise cost. Our proposals will ensure that the national grid company, owned by the distribution companies, retains that central role. The integrity of the grid and the operation of power stations in merit order will be preserved.

The other principal condition for maintaining secure supply is to ensure that electricity is generated from the diversity of fuels. It would be irresponsible to rely on fossil fuels to meet all our electricity generating requirements. The legislation will therefore provide for a clear obligation to be placed on the distribution companies to contract for a specified proportion of non-fossil-fuelled generating capacity.

The legislation will also incorporate an electricity supply code, consolidating and updating the legislation that currently governs the supply of electricity, and dates back to the last century. Above all, we shall maintain present standards of safety throughout the industry.

Finally, the legislation will establish new rights for the consumer. Even after privatisation, the local distribution companies will remain natural monopolies. Although their prices will be regulated, I do not believe that this will be sufficient. The consumer will therefore be given the right to financial compensation, if the distribution companies fail to provide a guaranteed level of service. They will also be required to provide a range of performance indicators of standards of service, which will be published.

Competition and other measures that I have described will benefit the consumer, but the employees will also benefit and that is just as important. The new structure of the industry will provide wider career opportunities for employees and there will be attractive provisions to ensure that they can acquire shares. Existing pension obligations will be safeguarded. The legislation will make no changes to the industry's negotiating and consultation machinery.

Because of the importance of these proposals, I am today publishing them in the form of a White Paper and copies are now available in the Library and in the Vote Office.

The electricity industry has much to be proud of, but I believe that it can achieve more. My proposals will create a modern competitive industry, owned by the public and responsive to the needs of customers and employees.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): I think that the House will at last welcome a statement from the Government on the privatisation of electricity and the publication of the White Paper which we have been calling for. The Secretary of State has presented a highly technical matter to us and we shall need to give proper thought to it. A week on Monday, we shall have the opportunity to debate the issue and to make our points after consideration.

We have heard for a considerable time all the controversy about the Government's proposals. The Secretary of State has confirmed again today that consumers' interests and needs will be guaranteed by competition, but, at the same time, we have heard that he will protect monopolies. It is not a question of private competition; it is a question of monopolies, oligopolies and regulated control and has absolutely nothing to do with competition. Any close reading of the White Paper would certainly show that. If that is contested, the Secretary of State, in both his statement and the White Paper, talks of "natural monopolies". [Interruption.] If Conservative Members do not understand what that means for the exploitation of the consumer, they do not understand the theory of their own competition philosophy.

Does the Secretary of State accept that the White Paper takes the organisation of the electricity supply industry back 50 years? Does he accept th the integration of the system has produced its efficiency and cheaper prices? Does he accept that the dismantling of the electricity supply industry is against the world trend and represents a triumph of ideology over common sense? Why does he dismantle the electricity supply industry that has ensured adequate investment, a reliable, national grid and electricity prices that are presently among the lowest in the world and produced by a public utility?

Has the Secretary of State read the 1981 report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, established by this Government, on the generation of electricity and its 1987 report on bulk transmission of electricity? Is he aware that both reports concluded that, although criticisms could be made, the public utility had not operated against the public interest? That is the judgment of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission which was set up by the Government.

Does the Secretary of State accept the recent Electricity Council report, which shows that, on the latest figures for electricity prices, Britain is the sixth cheapest of the 20 major economies in the world—cheap to the consumer and cheap to industry? [Interruption.] That was produced by the Electricity Council, a fact which may cause some humour on the Government Benches. What guarantee can the Secretary of State give that privatisation will produce cheaper prices than those produced by the public utility?

Does the Secretary of State accept that the electricity price increases due in April have been rejected as unjustified by the CBI, the Electricity Consumers Council and any other consumer body? Indeed, his own White Paper says nothing about electricity prices. Has he read the independent report by Oxford Economic Research Associates, commissioned by the CBI, which rejects the notion that a 15 per cent. increase over two years is necessary to finance his £40 billion investment programme? Will he accept that the increase amounts to nothing more than a privatisation tax designed to fatten the industry prior to privatisation, and to be paid by the consumer?

What steps will the Secretary of State take to prevent the newly privatised electricity supply industry proposed in the White Paper from colluding on prices and quality of service? Is not the Secretary of State attempting to construct a wholly inappropriate model of competition in an industry where competition has had no place and never had, publicly or privately here or abroad? Does he accept that even in the United States there is not a minuscule of competition? Will we not have a rerun of the British Airways-BCal scenario where in the end the larger company buys out the smaller company? Is it not just monopoly first by collusion and then takeover?

What steps does the Secretary of State intend to take to ensure that British generating capacity is not taken over by foreign owners? Will he consider having a golden share, for whatever that is worth after Britoil, to protect the British capacity to generate electricity? Can he assure us with total confidence that Lord Marshall is wrong to say that the separation of the grid from transmission will risk the security of supply, or will the Secretary of State be known as the first Minister for blackouts?

Will the Secretary of State also ensure that the principle of obligation to supply to which he referred, which is now to be placed on the distribution companies, will guarantee maximum co-operation from private companies in the generation of power under any circumstances, and particularly in emergencies?

In view of the Government's active intention to encourage coal imports in a newly privatised industry, can the Secretary of State tell us what effect that will have on the British industry? Will it not mean an estimated import of 30 million tonnes of coal and add £1 billion to the balance of trade deficit, which already stands at a record level of £14 billion? Will job losses be as high as the 75,000 estimated by the Coalfield Communities Campaign? [HON. MEMBERS: "Too long."] The Secretary of State took well over 10 minutes to read his statement on the White Paper. I must protest at the barracking of the yobboes on the Government side. I look to you, Mr. Speaker, to give me support.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman wants my support, he shall have it.

Mr. Prescott: If the Secretary of State believes in the power of the market, why does he intend to import nuclear generation into the newly privatised industry? The Secretary of State, who believes in market forces, intends to force private distribution companies to take a share of nuclear energy, yet when it comes to the coal industry he says that market forces will prevail and coal will be bought from the cheapest source of supply. Why is the rule different for nuclear energy when the Government believe so strongly in the market solution? This is intervention by the Government, which is totally inconsistent.

Why is privatisation going ahead when the Secretary of State has singularly failed to present the House with any evidence to counter the charge that it will lead to higher prices, job losses and poorer service to the consumer? Is this the price to be paid for future tax cuts?

In conclusion——

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have a heavy day in front of us. The hon. Gentleman should now conclude.

Mr. Prescott: Has the Secretary of State read the report of the Gas Consumers Council which shows that, after the privatisation of gas, disconnections last year rose by 35 per cent.? Can he give the House a guarantee that a similar fate will not face consumers in a privatised electricity industry, with consequences for those who may suffer cold-related illnesses, including hypothermia, and who suffer fuel poverty? After all, 30,000 people die each year from cold-related illnesses. When will the Secretary of state produce a long-term energy policy which is capable of meeting the long-term needs of the nation and using the energy resources which are available in a sensible and coherent way?

The Secretary of State, who defends his policy in the name of the consumer, must note that only five paragraphs out of 65 in the White Paper say anything about the consumer. This is not a policy about energy. It is not a policy for the benefit of the consumer or even for the benefit of those employed in the industry. It is solely a policy to maximise the price of selling off Treasury and energy assets to finance tax cuts.

Mr. Parkinson: I am afraid that is not nearly as difficult as the hon. Gentleman would wish it to be. I accept that it is a long White Paper and that the hon. Gentleman has not had it long. When he reads it more carefully, he will find the answers to quite a few of his questions set out in clear detail.

I shall go through some of the points which he raised. He said that I say in the White Paper that distribution is a natural monopoly; that is true. But I also say that nearly 80 per cent. of the costs of electricity arise from generation, and that is not a natural monopoly. The object is to seek to introduce competition into generation and, at the same time, to make sure that the distributors do not abuse their monopoly power, that they are properly regulated and that customers have a choice and also have rights which are enshrined in law.

The hon. Gentleman also said that what is proposed is against the world trend. The plain fact is that there is no world model for electricity supply and generation. The model which we have put before the House, which we believe will work well, is now being widely discussed by far-sighted people in the American supply industry.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether the industry will be efficient. We believe that it will be more efficient. We will build on the basis that is there. The main point of the White Paper, which he must recognise, is that at present the industry is totally producer-dominated. Electricity is produced by a single supplier and the customer has no choice but to accept whatever cost that supplier hands over. We are putting the customer in the driving seat. We are tilting the balance of the industry so that it will not in future be producer-dominated but will be dominated by the needs of the consumer. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Will it be cheaper?"] Yes, in due course it will be cheaper because competition will exert downward pressure on costs. It will not happen overnight. [Interruption.] In that case, we will do even better. All the signs are that competition will produce pressure on costs. At present, 80 per cent. of the costs are pushed over on a cost-plus basis to the customer. That will not be the case in future.

The hon. Gentleman asked about price increases. He quoted the CBI approvingly. I hope he reads that paper carefully. When he has, I cannot imagine that he will find a thing in it with which he will agree. Electricity represents 2 per cent. of industry's costs. For the first time since April 1985, we are proposing an increase of 8 per cent. That means an increase of less than one sixth of 1 per cent. over three-years.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Not for the big users.

Mr. Parkinson: There are some heavy users, and they are at a disadvantage. However, we have made arrangements to try to help them with their problems. One of the factors that hinder us is that we cannot offer undue preference to any one customer. Under our new structure, heavy users will be able to contract with generators and use the grid as a common carrier, and the problems that the hon. Gentleman and the CBI are moaning about will be dealt with.

The hon. Gentleman talks about collusion. Again, he says that there will be only two generators. There will not. Scotland already has the capacity to support more than 2 GW south of the border, and that capacity could grow. The inter-connector needs strengthening, but effectively we already have three generators. We have the cross-Channel link, and we have two or three private generators feeding into the system. There will be many more in the future. The area boards will have the right to generate, and most are already making plans either to purchase direct or to install capacity of their own.

The hon. Gentleman asked about a golden share. We shall make arrangements to ensure that the industries remain independent. [Interruption.] There are other ways which are very effective, and they will be adopted. [HON. MEMBERS: "Britoil?"] Yes, Britoil has shown that there are weaknesses in that arrangement, but there are other versions that can be put in place just as easily.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the obligation to supply being transferred to the distributors. I do not think that he understands the significance of that. I have already pointed out that at present the industry is completely dominated by the costs of one monopoly supplier, and the distributors have no choice but to accept that cost. In future, they will be able to shop around for capacity and to strike bargains.

The hon. Gentleman talked about coal imports. Coal imports are possible now. They do not take place, because of the long-term agreement between the CEGB and British Coal. If British Coal remains a reliable, competitive supplier, it will continue to supply the industry's substantial needs, but we shall not make it a supplier of obligation. We shall ensure that it remains the supplier of choice, on the basis of its performance. That is why the Government are making available £2 million a day of the taxpayers' money so that Britain has a modern, competitive coal industry.

If the hon. Gentleman really cares about the future of coal, I advise him to talk to the unions in the industry and explain to them the need for flexible, modern working to go with the flexible, modern investment. [Interruption.] I am just about to explain.

The hon. Gentleman asked about nuclear power. We believe that diversity of supply is essential for security of supply.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Why cannot the same apply to coal?

Mr. Parkinson: The hon. Gentleman asks why we cannot have coal use to produce electricity. But we shall: coal will remain a substantial supplier to the industry. It will still be overwhelmingly the biggest single source of power. That will be built into the system. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no point in the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) asking questions from a sedentary position. If he is patient, he may have a chance to ask them on his feet.

Mr. Parkinson: We believe that it is in the national interest to have diversity, and nuclear power is part of that diversity. That was part of our election manifesto. It has been a declared policy of the Government, and remains so. One of the reasons for which we need diversity of supply is the abuse of monopoly power that certain elements of the coal industry have demonstrated that they enjoy using.

I was asked about disconnections. There is no reason why disconnections should increase under a privatised industry, and we shall make arrangements to ensure that the code of conduct remains in place and is observed.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am bound to have regard to the subsequent business for today, which is an important debate on Northern Ireland. I shall allow questions on the statement until 5.15 pm, and then we really must move on. I shall bear in mind that the hon. Members whom I call today will not stand quite such a good chance in the debate on Monday.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the additional competition that he proposes, and the creation of numerous new sources of electricity supply, is very welcome and will greatly assist the consumer — a point that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) seemed to ignore completely in his interminable harangue?

As the Government propose that the entire nuclear programme should now go into the private sector, and as the nuclear costs will be protected by the requirement of the distribution company to buy nuclear, and that will therefore be passed on to the consumer, will my right hon. Friend reassure us that the nuclear building programme will be rigorously overhauled, tightly controlled and made suitable for the needs of the 1990s—and, in particular, suitable for a world in which oil and coal prices will remain very low?

Mr. Parkinson: I know my right hon. Friend's views about nuclear generation. We believe that a generation of pressurised water reactors—the same technology, with a repeat build, six being built one after the other—will offer a sensible, secure way of meeting the nuclear obligation.

Of course, as a result of the customer's obligation to buy electricity from nuclear generation, the nuclear industry will be in a privileged position, and that aspect will have to be regulated very carefully.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): Why is the Secretary of State treating the nuclear industry differently from the coal industry? Why has he given a guarantee for nuclear power and British generation, but gives no guarantee that the British coal industry will be protected?

We see what is happening in Scotland. This could sound the death knell for the British coal industry unless there is a guarantee in the White Paper and in Government policy.

Mr. Parkinson: The right hon. Gentleman is being extremely defeatist. Since 1979, the Government have made an investment of nearly £6 billion in the coal industry: £2 million a day is being invested. The industry is responding. It is becoming more competitive. I believe that it is capable of facing up to the competition, and that it does not need the protection that the right hon. Gentleman demands.

It is a very negative approach to the industry to say that it has no future unless it is entirely protected. It must make good use of the investment. It must have modern working practices to go with the modern machinery, and its future will then be secure. That is in the hands of those who work in the industry.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the Select Committee on Energy has begun a major and comprehensive inquiry — belatedly, through no fault of its own. He will also be aware that the inquiry has already disclosed not only that this is a matter of immense complexity, but that there are profound disagreements on the structure, consequences and objectives of privatisation.

As the inquiry is unlikely to be completed until June, may I ask my right hon. Friend for an assurance that the proposals will not be regarded as having been set in concrete, but that the evidence and conclusions that the Select Committee may reach will be taken into careful consideration?

Mr. Parkinson: Of course we shall take the Select Committee's conclusions into consideration. However, these are Government proposals enshrined in a White Paper, and I have made it clear that we intend to bring forward legislation as soon as possible. Between now and the introduction of the Bill, an immense amount of detailed decision-making must be done. We believe that the Select Committee can make a real contribution to that decision-making, but the central structure is that which the Government have proposed to the House, and on which they intend to legislate.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Would the Secretary of State be entirely happy if his assessments of energy prices as a result of the impending increase were subject to the scathing and searching criticism that they seem to deserve? Does he accept that his statement seemed to contain a recognition of the impressive achievement of the publicly owned electricity supply industry throughout the post-war period, meeting national needs and growing demand? Does not his suggestion that there should be an element of compensation for failure to supply seem to illustrate that, despite the ebullience of the White Paper, the Government are now beginning to have some doubts and some feeling that caution is necessary?

Mr. Parkinson: No, Sir — quite the reverse. The proposals which we are making and which will be enshrined in the legislation have been developed in part by the East Midlands electricity board and are being tried in the area already. We think that the idea is a good one, should be enshrined in legislation and should be made available to all customers of the electricity supply industry, and that is what we are doing. So it is not any sign of lack of confidence; it is adopting a practical experience which the industry has just gone through.

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his statement. Is he aware that it will be welcomed by Government Members, the vast majority of people in the electricity supply industry and, of course, consumers of electricity? Will he assure the House that the nuclear generation of electricity will continue to flourish, and that it will not be cosseted or allowed to benefit from cross-subsidisation, but rather will be exposed to the full rigours of competition, which will be to its long-term advantage?

Mr. Parkinson: I thank my hon. Friend for his remarks. It is a fact that the structure which I have proposed today is supported by all the area boards and by the Electricity Council. We have yet to hear the reaction of the CEGB. [Interruption.] Just in case the hon. Gentleman sneers, two thirds of the people in the industry work in the area boards.

The Government have committed themselves to a nuclear programme because they believe, as I said earlier, that nuclear power provides an essential component of the diversity of supply that is the basis of our security. I believe that it is possible and will be possible for it to be provided on an economic basis.

It is an extremely complex subject, because we are talking about the costs of power stations which will be built within the next 10 years and will still be operating 40 years from now. Nuclear power offers a certainty about cost and a certainty about supply, so it is very hard to have a debate based purely on the economics.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Since this is the first privatisation of a public monopoly that really does improve competition and provide customer choice and some sensible consumer rights, would it not be more logical for the Government not to impose any further electricity price rises but to wait until market forces operate on the industry? Similarly, would it not be more logical for the Government not to commission any further nuclear plants until the nuclear generating industry is subjected to objective through-costing under the same market principles?

Mr. Parkinson: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his recognition that we are creating a structure which will offer the prospects of competition and a better deal for the customer. He asked about prices. The level of return achieved by the industry at present is too low. It is about 2·45 per cent., which is less than one half of the rate of return that the Labour Government of which he was a member decided was necessary. We are proposing, over two years and after a period of no increases at all, to move the rate of return nearer to the rate of return that is acceptable. We need to do that to create an income base which will support the borrowing and the funding of the huge programme on which we are about to embark; £45 billion will need to be invested between now and the year 2000 either by private generators or by the successor companies to the CEGB if this country is to have a secure electricity supply. These price increases are necessary to build up an income base that will fund that investment.

Mr. Norman Tebbit (Chingford): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement is very welcome? Perhaps no part of it is more welcome than his announcement that in effect the old principle of no undue preference in supply will disappear——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Gissa job.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Tebbit. [Interruption.] The right hon. Gentleman has as much right as anybody else.

Mr. Tebbit: —in order that proper bargaining can take place between major users and suppliers? Is he also aware that perhaps the most encouraging feature of the discussion following his statement today is the announcement from the Opposition Front Bench that the Labour party is now committed to consumerism and competition in the energy industry? Has my right hon. Friend heard whether that is going to apply to Labour policy on coal?

Mr. Parkinson: What we have heard from the Labour party today is a reaffirmation of its members' belief in competition and the customer and the demand that he should not be allowed to have any choice at all, which is typical of the Socialists that they are. I agree with my right hon. Friend that major users need access to power at competitive prices and that the present legislative structure makes that very difficult. In future, major users will have the right to enter into contracts, to use the grid as a common carrier and to make arrangements to meet their own special needs.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Is the Secretary of State aware that his announcement this afternoon is the death knell of the mining industry? It is fairly obvious that he has no intention of making any alternative arrangements regarding the understanding between British Coal and the CEGB and that, at present low world prices, British Coal will not be able to compete. That being the case, British Coal and many thousands more miners' jobs will go to the wall. This could well be deliberate Government policy.

Mr. Parkinson: It is not Government policy. Government policy is to make investments in the industry which will ensure that it is modern and competitive, and to encourage those who run it to adapt their working methods to match the modern machinery. There is no question of the CEGB being able to buy 70 million tonnes of coal at the marginal world price of coal, because the world market in coal is too small. So the hon. Gentleman is inventing a frightening spectre, which is unnecessary. If the miners in his constituency work hard with the modern machinery and use it well, they will be able to compete and they will have the opportunity to supply. There is no reason why a privatised industry should turn its back on a supplier on its doorstep that offers reliable supplies at competitive prices, but that means an end to strikes, working to rule, total waste of time and industrial conflict. Those are the things that are really posing a threat to the future of the coal industry.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the broad thrust of his statement today will be greatly welcomed? But there is one area of considerable concern that reflects on heavy users of electricity. It is not adequate for my right hon. Friend to use phrases such as "try to help" or "leave it to local negotiation". The core of British industry, the heavy users, need special help and special deals. Will he ensure that, now that we have the opportunity of new legislation, they will be protected?

Mr. Parkinson: That is precisely the point that I was making. Because of our rules about undue preference, although we do make arrangements that help the heavy users, there is a limit to what can be done. In future, heavy users will have the opportunity to contract direct with suppliers and to use the grid as a common carrier. I believe that our proposals offer a real opportunity of dealing with that very difficult problem.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Why, before making his statement today, did the Secretary of State so studiedly refuse to offer any kind of meaningful consultation to the industry's management, the trade unions and the consumer councils on what he is proposing? Will it not look like rank hypocrisy to talk of his concern for the consumer when he refused even to consult the consumer councils?

Mr. Parkinson: Since last June, I have consulted extremely widely with all sides of the industry and have had discussions with academics, economists, unions, management and consumers—with all people who have an opinion about the structure of the industry. It is simply not true that there has been no consultation. However, I have not been able to accept the views of some of the people whom I have consulted. Their definition of consultation is that I should change all my opinions and accept theirs. There have been many discussions, but I cannot accommodate everyone. Some of those who have not been accommodated are now saying that they have not been consulted. That simply is not true.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his decision to retain the integrity of the national grid as a common carrier is welcome and realistic, as all our major power stations have been located on the basis of environmental and supply considerations, and not on the basis of where the greatest demand has been?

Mr. Parkinson: My hon. Friend is right in saying that the integrity and the operation of the grid are vital parts of our system. Our proposals make arrangements to maintain all the benefits of that. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for pointing out to the House the importance of the grid.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): How will the price of nuclear-generated electricity be fixed? Can I have an assurance that it will not necessarily follow the price of coal, because of the long-term implications of investment in nuclear plant? Secondly, can I have an assurance that today's announcement will not in any way influence the future of British Nuclear Fuels plc as a publicly owned company?

Mr. Parkinson: I am sorry, but I did not hear the second half of the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It was a request for an assurance on the future of British Nuclear Fuels plc as a publicly owned company.

Mr. Parkinson: My statement today contained a very strong reaffirmation of the Government's commitment to the nuclear supply industry. That must be the best possible news for BNFL. BNFL has made tremendous strides in recent years. I believe that its future is more secure as a result of today's announcement.

At present, we buy our electricity from the nuclear power stations on a cost-plus basis. It is simply fed through in the bulk supply tariff to the customers. In future, the costs will have to be regulated because, for diversity reasons, we are guaranteeing a market for the electricity. Therefore, that particular source of supply will need to be quite carefully regulated.

Mr. Alastair Goodlad (Eddisbury): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the imaginative and sensible proposals that he has announced, which combine the introduction of competition with the preservation of the merit order and the integrity and excellence of the nuclear industry, will be widely welcomed throughout the electricity supply industry, which will make the future arrangements work with the dedication and determination that it has shown in the past?

Mr. Parkinson: I thank my hon. Friend for the compliment that he pays to the people who work in the industry. We want to build on their achievements in future. I believe that the prospects for everyone working in the industry will be improved by my announcement today and not threatened in any way. I am sure that the people who work in the industry will work hard to implement the proposals and produce a modern, competitive electricity supply industry.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Does the Secretary of State accept that the proposals will mean more regulation and direction in the industry? The way in which the Secretary of State and the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) spoke about consumerism really is claptrap. The consumers will have only one electricity line to their homes, supplied by only one electricity board. They will have no real choice except that of the primary fuel.

The Secretary of State enunciated six principles on which he was drawing up proposals. No. 5 was that customers should be given new rights. What does he mean by new rights for customers? Will they have special rights if they are old-age pensioners or if they cannot pay their bills, or will it be the same as with British Gas, with an ever-increasing number of disconnections since privatisation?

Lastly, will the Secretary of State tell the House how research and development into potential new sources of energy is to be funded? Who will be responsible for developing such schemes as the fast breeder reactor or the Severn barrage schemes?

Mr. Parkinson: I made it clear in my statement that the distribution companies are regional monopolies and therefore will be subject to regulation in the private sector. That is necessary, and I believe that it will be acceptable to the House.

As for customer rights, I explained to the House—perhaps the hon. Gentleman was not here — that performance standards will be set. If those standards are not met, the customer will have the right to a rebate for any failure by the industry to perform. /Interruption./ I notice that one or two Opposition Members are smiling, but the system is working extremely well in the east midlands. It is a very useful management tool as it shows which areas are operating inefficiently and enables management to take action to improve performance.

Most renewable research at present is funded by my Department, and 30 per cent. of the costs of the fast reactors are being met by the CEGB. Obviously, that will have to be a matter for negotiation, but most of the research into renewables is funded by the taxpayer through the Department of Energy.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): The proposals are undoubtedly in the long-term interest of the employees of the CEGB and other new companies. In the short term, there will be confusion for many as to who is to be their future employer, including the 600 or 700 employees at Europa house in Stockport. How will these problems be resolved? Will my right hon. Friend put their fears at rest?

Mr. Parkinson: I know of my hon. Friend's interest in the subject. On numerous occasions he has told me about the problems and interests of his constituents. One of the reasons why we made the statement to the House and produced the White Paper was to reassure people in the industry and to end speculation about the future structure of the industry. We have made arrangements for every employee of the electricity supply industry—all 137,000 of them—to receive tomorrow copies of the statement and of the White Paper, which has been written specifically with the interests of the employees, among others, in mind.

Mr. Jack Thompson (Wansbeck): It seems from the Secretary of State's statement that there will be many technical arguments about the development of the White Paper in future debates on this issue. There is some suspicion about the technical advice that the Secretary of State has received. Who advised him about removing the control of the grid from the generating side of the industry? The logic of that is impossible to understand.

The Secretary of State did not mention safety in the industry. There is a very high standard of safety in the industry, although the nuclear side is suspect. There is a lack of public confidence in the nuclear side of the industry, but in general it has a good safety record. Obviously, when the industry is privatised there will be less enthusiasm to invest in its safety aspects.

The other area——

Hon. Members: Speech.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman put his question succinctly?

Mr. Thompson: May I ask the Secretary of State to comment on the effects on the environment when the industry is privatised?

Mr. Parkinson: On the first question, about the technical aspect, we have had the benefit of advice from outstanding consultants, but we have also consulted widely. It is now a matter of agreement between the CEGB and ourselves that there is no technical difficulty about the removal of the grid. It would argue that there are costs involved and we would argue that savings would flow from the increased competition that would result from the transfer of the grid.

The hon. Gentleman raised a favourite subject of Opposition Members: the suggestion that somehow or other the private sector is less interested in safety than the public sector. There is no evidence of any kind for that assertion; it is just a myth that Opposition Members persist in trying to push. There will be no change in the safety regulations, except that the regulations, which are enshrined in 24 statutes going back to the 1880s, will be put into a modern form. The standards will not be lowered; if anything, they will be improved.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): In view of my right hon. Friend's statement, and the transformation of British Coal's performance in the past three years—production is up by 60 per cent. and coal prices at the power stations are down by 22 per cent. — can he advise my constituents what they should do to secure the future?

Hon. Members: Vote Labour.

Mr. Parkinson: There is no reason to believe that voting Labour would do anything but put a great blight on their prospects, because the prospects for the coal industry depend upon the economy. The hallmark of Labour Governments is economic chaos and crisis. We will continue to promote a sound economy that grows, and that is good news for the miners. Secondly, as my hon. Friend pointed out, if productivity continues to improve, new machinery is well used and new investments are properly exploited, there is no reason at all why the British coal industry should not have a very good future.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): Will the Secretary of State guarantee that ministerial responsibility for all aspects of nuclear safety, and so public accountability, will be maintained? Will he say that there will be no minimum nuclear element, as opposed to non-fossil-fuel element, in the requirement for generating capacity and no extra cost put on the taxpayers by the proposals? When will the Minister state that consumers will benefit from this, as the only thing that has happened so far is that prices have increased, affecting the poor and the powerless?

Mr. Parkinson: The change in prices would have occurred whether or not the industry was privatised. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to accept that fact. It spoils most of his statements, but it happens to be true. Secondly, as for Ministers being responsible for nuclear safety, the nuclear installations inspectorate is responsible for nuclear safety. It is licensed as a wholly independent body and it is being strengthened. There is no question that its responsibilities will be changed in any way.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is not the truth of the matter that the statement is the next step in privatisation, after the fattening-up process of increasing prices in the electricity industry, which means that poor pensioners will have to pay the bill for the privatisation which will follow in order to line the pockets of Back-Bench Tory Members, many of whom will be anxious for directorships arising out of the legislation, including the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit)? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Time is getting on.

Mr. Skinner: Why should the nuclear industry be feather-bedded in the White Paper, while the coal industry is expected to compete with the slave labour conditions of the South African market and the nine-year-olds mining coal in Colombia? Is he aware that the proposals will provide the Left wing with the means to take us back into public ownership?

Mr. Parkinson: The hon. Gentleman had better have a word with his Front Bench. They are trying desperately to run away from the notion of renationalisation.

Mr. Skinner: I am not worried about that.

Mr. Parkinson: He is not worried about it, but they are worried by him. Perhaps he could have a word with his hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, because he has moved his position recently. He used to make those rather inane remarks about lining the pockets of the City. He now realises that, if a higher price is obtained for the industry, it will come to the Treasury and the taxpayers, so perhaps the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend could have a word and try to understand the problems.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): If it is possible for a competent person to build a nuclear power station, under the plan who will undertake the necessary research for nuclear safety and pay compensation in the event of a nuclear accident? As my hon. Friend is conceding to the distribution companies the right to produce electricity, is he prepared to concede to the CEGB full marketing rights and the later opportunity, if need be, to take over some of the distribution enterprises?

Mr. Parkinson: We should like to see the distribution companies remain as independent bodies. One of the strengths of those companies is that their head offices are based in the regions they serve. As a result of the proposals, 12 very substantial regionally based companies will be created in which the workers and people of those regions will have shares and can take a stake. The local identity of the boards is a very important factor which we wish to preserve in the course of the privatisation of the industry.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that many area boards are convinced that they can contract to the private sector for power, or generate their own power, more cheaply than they can buy it from the CEGB? Will he accept that, in the interim before privatisation, it is very important that the private sector should have the opportunity to compete fairly on tariffs and the construction of power stations?

Mr. Parkinson: My hon. Friend is right. One of the reasons why the legislation is necessary is that the Energy Act 1983 simply has not worked, because the monopoly generator has control of the grid. What I have announced today will mean that the private generators can look forward to having access to the grid, using it as a common carrier and striking contracts with people who wish to buy their electricity. The area boards welcome the opportunity finally to have some choice about the generator from which they buy their electricity.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): The Secretary of State will already know that the actuarial risk of any accident in a nuclear power station and the consequential costs must be underwritten by the taxpayers through the House. What provision does the Secretary of State intend to make for the burden of such a liability in the 70 per cent. that he intends to launch on the market? What provision does he intend to make in legislation for the cost incurred in decommissioning the Magnox stations that are already coming to the end of their lives? Who will bear that cost —the British taxpayer again?

Mr. Parkinson: Provisions have already been made and are being made continuously in the accounts of the CEGB for the cost of the decommissioning. At the moment, the provision stands at just under £470 million. That provision is being built up as the stations are being operated. Details of the kind the hon. Gentleman talks about will have to be settled in negotiations between the industry and ourselves. Until the structure was settled, many of the detailed arrangements simply could not be negotiated, but they will be and the full details will be presented in the legislation brought to the House at the beginning of the next Session.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Will my right hon. Friend accept that his attempts to reconcile the needs of competition with guaranteed supply and having strategic non-fossil-fuel capacity have been highly successful? Does he agree that it is ironic that the great monopolists in the Opposition should accuse him of all people of not introducing enough competition in the White Paper? Does he accept that the White Paper will be warmly welcomed by Conservative Members?

Mr. Parkinson: I thank my hon. Friend for those remarks. I listened with amazement to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) criticising me for not introducing enough competition, when his proposal is to maintain a huge monopoly supplier.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): Is the Secretary of State aware that future generations will condemn him for the long-term damage he will do to the national interest? I listened intently to his speech and I did not hear of any provisions that would satisfy the nuclear nuts, except in their own nuclear waste. I listened to what he said about dumping; he does not have a clue about it. I suggest that when he switches on his electric lights, powered with coal from Colombia that has been brought to the surface by the blood of children, he should learn what dumping is about and the long-term damage it will do to the country.

Mr. Parkinson: The hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) and other hon. Gentlemen refer to Colombia. We consume about 100 million tonnes of coal in this country. The latest estimate is that approximately 200,000 tonnes of it comes from Colombia. May I break some news to the hon. Gentleman, which he would regard as good news, although some of my right hon. and hon. Friends might not? There are not the handling facilities to bring in more than about 15 million tonnes of coal, should that be desired, nor can facilities be developed. That is part of the price we paid for reassuring the miners that we wanted to sustain their monopoly. We now realise that that was a big mistake. The monopoly supply position of the British coal industry has been abused, and used as an economic and political weapon. The miners, by their activities, made the people suspicious of being over-dependent on coal.

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): May I assure my right hon. Friend of the great support he will have from all the alternative electricity generating industries, which will have at long last a chance to sell their wave, wind and solar energy or any other form of alternative power. We all welcome the White Paper from the viewpoints of the environment, choice and the consumer.

Mr. Parkinson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He has highlighted an important fact—that the commitment to non-fossil fuels includes renewable fuels. In certain areas of the world, such as California, there are substantial renewables generating power plants. If any of the alternative sources of energy prove to be economic, those will become part of the proportion of non-fossil-fuel-produced electricity available for purchase.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will preserve the list of those hon. Members who have not yet been called, and shall ensure that they will have some priority if they wish to speak in the subsequent debate.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that the Secretary of State said at the conclusion of his statement that the White Paper was available now in the Vote Office. It is a convention that a White Paper should be published here and that the Secretary of State should make a statement to the House first of all. Yet again, Mr. Speaker, the television news coverage at 1 pm today carried full details, as did today's early morning newspapers. Quite clearly, the Secretary of State has ignored his primary obligation to the House, which I believe that hon. Members wish to sustain, as well as you yourself, Mr. Speaker. We can have resort only to you to defend the rights of the House against an elective dictatorship that is intent on ignoring the rights of the House and their obligations to come here first. If it was otherwise, the first information about the project would have been given to the House rather than to television and the newspapers.

Mr. Parkinson: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I join the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), for once, in deploring this leak of the White Paper and of the details. We had nothing at all to gain from it and we sought very hard indeed to make sure that the House was the first body to hear of our decisions.

The decision was finally taken in the Cabinet this morning and was announced to the House as soon as possible after that.

Mr. Redmond: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have been listening to the Secretary of State's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) who deplored information being leaked prior to the Secretary of State's announcement to the House. Will the Secretary of State pursue an inquiry to find out the source of that leak, as I did not hear him mention that course? I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, whether the Secretary of State intends to hold an inquiry.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can we be assured that an inquiry will take place? If we do not have an inquiry into such a leak, that means in effect that we condone it by doing nothing, and further leaks will occur.

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is worth recalling that the Secretary of State probably admitted that it is not usual for Secretaries of State to say that there had not been a leak, and that the matter had gone to the Cabinet for consideration this morning, so that he could not understand how the information had got out. But he never said that what did get out was wrong. Apparently, the information was correctly reported in some newspapers this morning and on the television news, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) said. The Secretary of State says now that he has no knowledge of how it happened and that it was not caused by him, and there must be a prima facie case for an inquiry. The Secretary of State ought to have the guts to get up and tell us now.

Mr. Cryer: He is just shrugging his shoulders.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not a matter for me whether there should be an inquiry. I repeat what I have so frequently said—that the House should always be the first to be told. I have heard what the Secretary of State says about this matter. I hope that the press will keep the embargoes placed against these statements.

Questions to Ministers

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I genuinely mean no criticism of you, but on the Order Paper today there were 47 questions to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland of which 24 were from Labour Back Benchers. You will note that in the course of Question Time, which lasted three quarters of an hour, you were able to call only two Labour Back Benchers.

I do not complain about that, and I appreciate that you are circumscribed, Sir, to some extent by the fact that you feel obliged to call Members from constituencies in Northern Ireland, as well as Conservative Members and other Opposition Members. In so far as Northern Ireland's affairs are of great interest to members of the Labour party, may I ask that Opposition Back Benchers are given more time during Question Time to raise these important matters, as otherwise the debates in Question Time will be completely distorted and, without the contributions of my right hon. and hon. Friends from the Front Bench, unreasonable and unfair?

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask hon. Members to allow me to deal with one question at a time. I will certainly bear in mind what the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) says. I hope that I deal fairly with all sides of the House, and if I have not done so, I shall review the position, as I do every day. However, whenever Front Bench Members rise, as the hon. Gentleman knows, that tends to reduce Opposition Back Benchers' opportunities.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I will put together the five motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered.

That the draft Veterinary Surgeons Act 1966 (Schedule 3 Amendment) Order 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Social Security (Contributions, Re-rating) Order 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Social Security (Treasury Supplement to and Allocation of Contributions) (Re-rating) Order 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Social Security (Contributions) Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Public Lending Right (Increase of Limit) Order 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Wakeham.]

Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions)

Mr. Speaker: We now come to the debate on Northern Ireland.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Could you inform us about the incoming debate? I understand that at 7 o'clock, opposed private Members' business is coming before the House. What time will be given to this very important debate on Northern Ireland?

Mr. Speaker: I can tell the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) that this debate will be interrupted at 7 o'clock for opposed private business, and if it has not concluded at that time it may continue after 10 pm until 11.30 pm.

5.18 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): I beg to move,

That the draft Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Acts 1978 and 1987 (Continuance) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 16 February, be approved.

The continuance order is the first to be made under the new 1987 Act. Previously, the House was asked to approve the orders every six months, and this is the first time that it comes forward for annual renewal. The advantage of this longer period is that it is possible to review developments rather more carefully in the period between renewal debates. It has provided for the first time for Lord Colville to report to the House on the operation of the Act, as I asked him to do.

I propose to discuss briefly the background to the Act, to describe the changes made to the emergency provisions under the 1987 Act, and something of their progress. I will deal with Lord Colville's comments in his first report and say a little about the wider issues and the present scene in Northern Ireland.

I am conscious that there are a number of hon. Members who wish to speak and I will try to condense my remarks to the essential areas of concern that I believe are proper to enable me to present the order to the House. I hope that that will not be thought a discourtesy.

The Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 provides the security forces in Northern Ireland with extra powers to deal with the special problems of terrorism in Northern Ireland. They include powers to stop and question, arrest, enter, search and seize. It also provides powers to proscribe organisations and creates offences concerning the collection of information that might be useful to terrorists, training people in the manufacture or use of firearms or explosives for improper purposes and displaying public support for proscribed organisations. All of the provisions relating to those powers will lapse on 21 March unless continued in force by this order.

The 1978 Act also provides the legal authority for the operation of the so-called "Diplock courts" by which serious terrorist offences are tried by a single judge sitting without a jury. The Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1987 incorporated into the emergency provisions certain recommendations of Sir George Baker. They included the provision that all emergency arrest powers now require "reasonable grounds for suspicion" and that searches of dwellings and searches of persons other than in a public place also require "reasonable grounds for suspicion" and that the maximum period for which the RUC can hold a suspected terrorist, on its own authority, is now 48 hours instead of 72 hours. The onus in bail applications in scheduled cases is now on the prosecution rather than the defence. Other recommendations were that the statutory guidance on the admissibility on confession evidence in scheduled cases should be rephrased to reflect the court's view that admissions obtained by the use or threat of violence should not be admissible, and that concerning the judge's discretion to exclude any admission in the interests of justice or out of fairness to the accused. Both Acts will lapse in 1992 and if similar provisions continue to be necessary they will have to be re-enacted by means of a Bill.

The Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1987 also introduced a statutory right for persons arrested under section 12 of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1974 to have someone notified of their arrest and whereabouts and to have access to legal advice. Section 12 is the main arrest power used in connection with terrorism in Northern Ireland. The Act also gave the authority to impose statutory time limits on pre-trial stages of proceedings and introduced a statutory scheme for regulating security guard companies in Northern Ireland.

The 1987 Act was a major piece of legislation. Its purpose was, of course, further to refine the emergency powers and to try to improve, yet again, on that delicate balance between protecting the rights of individuals caught up in such situations and avoiding handicapping the security forces' fight against terrorism.

This is the first opportunity to review the progress of the 1987 Act and its new powers. One of those powers is for regulating security guard companies. It is now an offence to provide such security services without a certificate from my Department. If it is believed that proscribed organisations are likely to benefit from such security services a company is unable to receive a certificate. Such regulating is part of our continued campaign to tackle the problems of paramilitary racketeering as a means of fund-raising — vital to the continuance of terrorism — and which we intend to do everything we can to choke off.

It is interesting to note that in the first period of operation of the certification scheme a number of security guard operations have already chosen not to apply for certificates. Therefore, I believe that there is some evidence to suggest that that scheme is starting to have some effect.

I asked Lord Colville to report on the working of the Acts and this is the first year in which he has submitted his report. I thank Lord Colville for his careful and diligent study when carrying out that review. I believe that his report has been of benefit to hon. Members when considering the progress that has been made.

The first requirement that I made of Lord Colville was that he should consider and advise whether any temporary provisions might lapse and to report on the way in which the Acts have been applied. It is interesting to note Lord Colville's first and main conclusion:

"the overwhelming view is an insistence on, or acceptance of, the emergency powers remaining in force."

The Government agreed with his conclusion and that is why we are here today. We regret the need for the emergency powers, but faced with the current situation in Northern Ireland we believe that they are essential. Lord Colville also said:

[Mr. Tom King]

"I gained the impression that the Act is being used with due reflection, moderation and commonsense; that refinements of earlier activities have reduced the reaction, at least, to what are seen as oppressive powers; and that the courts are strict in their interpretation of police and military activities both in criminal and civil suits."

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Is it not the case that, somewhere, Lord Colville referred to the use of tape recordings in the interrogation of suspected persons? Should not a code of practice embrace the use of tape recordings in such matters?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I am aware that Lord Colville made no reference to that matter in his report on the Emergency Provisions Acts, but I am advised that it is mentioned in his report on the Prevention of Terrorism Act. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his efficient prompting. There was no mention of that matter in connection with the order that we are discussing.

An important commendation from Lord Colville is that "the Northern Ireland courts are astute to interpret the Emergency Provisions Acts most strictly in favour of the liberty of the subject."

Lord Colville has made a number of recommendations. He asked for clearer statistics relating to the breakdown between offences certified out and we are considering whether something can be done about that. Anyone who studies the Colville report will note that a significant number of offences were certified out in the various years. Lord Colville asked whether we might change from the procedure of certifying out to certifying in. On balance, Lord Colville came down against that change. The House will be aware of the reasons he gave and we believe that that judgment was right.

Lord Colville suggested removing robbery and aggravated burglary from the scheduled list. We certainly want to see as many jury trials as we can and we shall consider those proposals.

Under the 1987 Act I have powers—I have not used those powers yet and we are observing the scheme that is currently operating in England and Wales—regarding the introduction of time limits. The House will see that, in the annex to Lord Colville's report, he notes the considerable improvement in the waiting time before trial. We certainly hope that that reduction is improved.

Lord Colville also referred to the need for the early introduction of a code of practice relating to the emergency powers. He asked whether that code would cover the section 12 arrest powers and I confirm that that is so.

Those are the main considerations to which I would wish to draw attention. If hon. Members wish to raise other matters my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office will seek to address them.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): What has happened to the Home Office inquiry that was set up a year and a half ago into kidnap insurance? That relates to one part of the Act. What has been resolved? Is the work still going on?

Mr. King: I shall have to take notice of that point. If we have the information, my right hon. Friend will try to respond to it.

The purpose of the order is to enable the powers that I have described to remain in force for a further 12 months. I have described the detailed outline of the 1978 Act and the 1987 Act, and Lord Colville's comments on them. Now I want to discuss the background against which this debate takes place.

The tragic outrage last night in the centre of Belfast is the latest confirmation, if any were needed, of the difficult and different problems that we face in Northern Ireland. The levels of violence in 1987 may have been below the worst levels of the 1970s, but there was a most unwelcome increase in violence, at least to the levels of the early 1980s. Last year there were 93 deaths in the Province and there have been 10 already this year. Amongst those were 11 members of the Army and the UDR, 16 members of the RUC and the RUC reserve, a large number of civilians, including Lord Justice Gibson and his wife, and 11 bystanders at the Remembrance Day parade at Enniskillen. I remember also the eight terrorists killed at Loughall, the four terrorists blown up by their own bombs and the seven members who were killed in the INLA feud. I mention them all because many of them were young men, and, whatever our attitude to their motivations, they were all people who lost their lives in the sadness and futility and pointlessness of the terrorist campaign in Northern Ireland, which achieves nothing.

No one in the House takes pleasure in any deaths, but that is the tragic record of the past year. All that the terrorist campaign produces is sorrow, grief, unemployment, the obstruction of normal life and extra problems for the community. Sometimes people ascribe blame for the road blocks, vehicle check-points and watchtowers, but, as I said at Question Time, those things are there because of the IRA and the other terrorist organisations that have introduced this obscene problem to Northern Ireland. The community must use every means at its disposal to protect itself against this evil violence.

The threat that we now face is maintained and, sadly, enhanced by the outside intervention of substantial arms resources on a scale hitherto unparalleled in the terrorist campaign in Northern Ireland. I refer to the involvement of the Libyan supplies. That intervention poses a dangerous and difficult problem and brings into even sharper focus the outstanding courage and dedication of everyone in the security forces. This is a dangerous time and everyone in Northern Ireland knows that, and I commend the courage of the RUC, the reserve, the UDR, the British Army, the judges, the judiciary, people working in the law courts and the prisons, and the whole community, who are trying to stand against the dangers, often at much personal risk.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): A moment ago my right hon. Friend referred to the Libyan connection. Are diplomatic relations between Dublin and Tripoli still maintained?

Mr. King: Yes, Sir. That is my understanding.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Does the Secretary of State agree that if the RUC is to have the full confidence and support of the minority community it is important that the ghost of the Stalker inquiry is finally laid to rest? In conjunction with that, does he accept that the shoot-to-kill policy that has been exposed, the events that took place in 1982 in the hayshed in Ballyneery road, Lurgan, and the subsequent destruction of the tape recordings that were made, are still something that the House must face? On whose orders were those tape recordings destroyed in 1982?

Mr. King: Many misunderstandings and misrepresentations have bedevilled this affair. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman used the phrase "shoot to kill". Shoot to kill is the wrong phrase. Does it mean shoot on sight, or without proper warning, or without observing the correct procedures for the use of force? Whatever it means, no evidence was identified and the Attorney-General made that clear to the House. That is important. I notice that one of my predecessors, the noble Lord Prior, has confirmed that, as far as his Office was concerned, no such policy was pursued.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): I thank the Secretary of State for trying to clarify the definition of shoot to kill. Is that not somewhat at variance with the view expressed by the deputy chief constable of the RUC, who said that the unit was trained to act with the maximum speed, firepower and aggression?

Mr. King: The suggestion that the unit was to do that outside the rules of engagement and correct practice is not true. That, too, is important. It is well known that that was a clear finding that was endorsed by Mr. Sampson, and it needs to be put clearly on the record.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House that the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) made a statement that it would be well into the 21st century before the nationalist people supported the RUC? Will he make it clear that that is what the people of Northern Ireland are up against?

Mr. King: I have often expressed my concern from the Dispatch Box for the fullest support for the security forces. I think that the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) may have misunderstood my remarks, on an earlier occasion, which were in no sense a personal affront to him; they had to do only with the sort of issues that arise. I recall occasions when there were plans for marches in Ballynahinch and Limavady, when the RUC and the Army turned out, with young 18-year-old soldiers, perhaps experiencing such an event for the first time, to defend and protect the nationalist community. Given the sort of risks that the RUC undertakes on behalf of all the community, it is entitled to expect the open and avowed support of every elected politician and responsible representative.

I understand some of the difficulties and the background but if we are to rise above the problems of past years we must recognise that the RUC has made a determined effort to work for all the community in Northern Ireland and it is entitled to find a response from the nationalist community.

Mr. Mallon: I regret having to interrupt again, but I cannot allow that point to pass without clarifying it. Some definition of acceptance is needed. Is the Secretary of State making a distinction, as he should, between the acceptance of and support for the police carrying out their duties impartially, and saying—accurately—that we shall not arrive for a considerable period of time at a day when the police will be indigenous to the communities in which they — even now — do not live, and people in those communities will be able to join the police service and support it in that way? There is a world of difference between acceptance and the creation of a police service that is indigenous to every part of the community in the north of Ireland.

Mr. King: When we analyse the problems we want to be clear where the blame lies. We know that the blame lies with the people who are determined, as terrorists, to intimidate everybody out of supporting the police force.

We are aware of the problems experienced by Catholics joining the police force. I remember visiting the old Enniskillen training centre and being told about a lad who turned up from the Bogside to join the RUC. A message was given to him, quite quickly, that that was not a terribly good idea if his family wanted to continue living in the Bogside.

While everyone would like members of the police force to be drawn from the local indigenous community, at the present time other methods must be used. The police are doing their best for both communities and I hope that they will receive support in so doing.

A great debt is owed to the RUC, but the present position in Northern Ireland is under the spotlight. One is conscious of the fact that events of earlier years are influencing attitudes. I have expressed my regret that those factors should cut across the public's perception of a force that, in recent years, has given outstanding service. I hope that people throughout Northern Ireland will recognise the RUC as it is today and not dwell on the problems with which it has been faced in the past, which we have been seeking to tackle.

The RUC deserves public support because it has achieved major successes against the threat with which it has been faced. In the past five months alone there have been five major arms finds. Significantly, as the House knows, there have been two major finds in the Republic. There have been Republican and nationalist arms finds. The apprehension of the Eksund, which many initially thought had solved the problem, was perhaps merely a warning of the scale of the problem that we would face, and recent evidence has proved that to be the case.

In paying tribute to the security forces in Northern Ireland, I should like to express my appreciation of the achievements of the Garda in recent months. They have helped to prevent the possibility of appalling carnage and suffering in Northern Ireland. There has been co-operation with the Irish Government and the supply line of weaponry has been revealed. The search by 7,000 personnel — which was the biggest ever — that led to those weapons finds is evidence enough of the increasing commitment of the Republic. Their efforts, together with the security forces and the attraction of the greatest possible support of the community in Northern Ireland, are vital components of the effective response against terrorism.

I sense a growing anger and resentment in Northern Ireland at the pointlessness of the terrorist campaign. I understand very well the problems that traditionally the security forces may have faced in some parts of the nationalist community.

The 1978 and 1987 Acts, which the order seeks to renew, ensure that the security forces can effectively discharge their responsibilities to the community and provide the maximum protection against terrorism. They further seek to strike a delicate balance between that maximum protection and the rights of the individual. Against that balance, I commend the order to the House.

5.43 pm

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): I join the Secretary of State in expressing support for the security forces in Northern Ireland and the Republic and appreciation of the work that they do on our behalf and of the dangers that they run on behalf of all members of the community.

I trust that we can now return to the proper use of the Intergovernmental Conference for discussing many of these matters, so that we do not have what the Secretary of State called "megaphone diplomacy across the Irish sea." Had the Attorney-General had the benefit of the Intergovernmental Conference, some of the recent difficulties would not have arisen.

This is the first opportunity that the House has had to consider the emergency provisions Acts since the modest alterations that were made to the 1978 Act last year. We supported the 1987 legislation because, although it failed to include the major reforms that we should have liked, there were some minor improvements. Nevertheless, the Government did not accept any of the major amendments that were proposed by the Opposition. The legislation continues to provide for internment by Executive fiat without access to the due process of the law; it continues to provide for a too high proportion of jury-less trials in Northern Ireland; it contains no significant changes to the Diplock system; it continues to certify out cases to be tried with a jury rather than certifying them in; and it continues to allow extraordinary powers of search and detention by the Army.

When we look at the proposed reforms, which we relied on the Government to carry out, we find that the codes of practice have yet to materialise, that the RUC code of conduct has yet to be published and, more important, that the promised Government statement to limit the time that people spend on remand before trial has yet to be implemented.

Some of those criticisms have not arisen simply because of tardiness by the Government. In his letter to the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights about the publication of its latest report, the Secretary of State said that he had no intention of making the changes that had been urged on the Government by the Labour party and by right hon. and hon. Members in other parts of the House. That is because the Government are happy with the present extraordinary legislation. They are complacent about its effects on people in Northern Ireland and, apparently, they are unperturbed by the recent deterioration in Anglo-Irish relations. That was so when I was writing this speech, but since then we have seen certain signs of contrivance from the Secretary of State.

In that context, reluctantly, but because of the lack of progress by the Government in all the matters that we regard as important, we are concerned about the renewal of what remains a counter-productive and anti-civil libertarian piece of legislation.

In particular, the Government have refused to face the challenge of the definition of "lethal force"—a question that was very much to the forefront over the shooting of Mr. Aidan McAnespie last Sunday and the release of Private Thain. It may be shown that Mr. McAnespie was killed as the result of a tragic accident, but, whatever the cause, it has served to highlight the fact that between 1969 and 1987 the security forces have been responsible for the deaths of 304 people in Northern Ireland, of whom the majority—167—had no paramilitary connections; they were civilians.

Five years ago, the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights called on the Government to consider embodying strengthened rules on the use of lethal force in the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1987 — a recommendation to which the Labour party attempted to give effect. The Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights described the use of lethal force,

"as one of the most controversial aspects of the security situation in recent years."

The law has been criticised as being "too vague" and "out of date." The test of "reasonableness" in the use of such force was "too lax" and might contravene the European Convention on Human Rights. The commission stated that the circumstances pertaining in Northern Ireland required

"amendment to the law to embody more clearly the view of Parliament as to the general nature of the circumstances in which potentially lethal force might be used."

Again, this year, it noted that the 1987 Act had not amended the law, which remained "vague and unsatisfactory."

Viscount Colville, in his first review of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1987, noted that the failure to legislate on the issue in the 1987 Act meant that the options available to the court when deaths occurred as a result of action by the security forces was either complete acquittal, which, he said, the victim's family and the community tended to think outrageous, or conviction for murder "with mandatory life sentence", which many thought too harsh.

Ironically, Viscount Colville cited the case of Private Thain. I wonder whether, at the time of writing, he knew that he was out of prison and that he was back in the Army, having served less than three years of his life sentence.

Lord Colville pointed out that an amendment to allow for a verdict of manslaughter,

"would go some way to satisfying the community" and,

"would also be just to members of the security forces."

I trust that we might see that coming into operation.

The question of the use of lethal force lies at the heart of the Stalker affair. Had clear legal guidelines on the use of lethal force existed in 1982 we might have been spared the past five years or so of controversy.

Earlier this month, I said that Labour wanted justice in Northern Ireland—not a quick execution in a field, not undercover death squads and no "dirty war." I used those words because it is in precisely those terms that some in the Province see British justice and others—often evil men—seek to represent it.

If the Government had set out to do their best to undermine and destroy all the good work of the past two and a half years in rebuilding confidence among Nationalists in the administration of justice and the rule of law—and confidence in the RUC—they could have done no better than they did over the Stalker affair and subsequent events. Mr. John Stalker, the then deputy chief constable of Greater Manchester, was asked to investigate the deaths of six people, five of whom, we now know, had paramilitary connections. One was an apolitical youth of 17.

Basically, the scenario was that a hayshed was under surveillance, the IRA put explosives in the hayshed, the RUC was aware of that fact and bugged the hayshed, but the bug failed. The IRA took out its explosives, which were used in a culvert bomb, which tragically exploded, killing three policemen at Kinnego.

Sir John Hermon knew of the bugging of the hayshed, according to RTE's "Today, Tonight" programme of 30 October 1986, and he asked an investigating officer at the scene of the Kinnego blast, "Were these the explosives the force was supposed to be watching?"

If that account is accurate, a number of questions arise with regard to the Chief Constable. They were broadcast on RTE's programme, but we still have no answers to them. Perhaps the Minister will answer them. Did Sir John know of the renewed surveillance even before Michael Tighe was shot? Did he know of the tape's existence, while the Director of Public Prosecutions, Sir Barry Shaw, was ignorant of this crucial evidence? Did he know of the tape and its existence in secret, while Stalker was initially kept in the dark?

There is also the question whether the then Secretary of State, Mr. James Prior, or the other Minister then responsible for security, Lord Gowrie, was aware of the electronic surveillance in the hayshed. But there is more, because we now know that there was not only an original tape but a copy. As Lady Bracknell might have said, to lose one tape may be regarded as a misfortune, but to lose both looks like carelessness—or a deliberate attempt to suppress evidence of criminal negligence.

If the RUC destroyed its tape before Mr. Stalker discovered its existence, and merely had a transcript of it, how was it that the MI5 copy was "weeded" after a senior MI5 representative said that he had no objection to Stalker's hearing the tape? Was he aware that MI5 had its own tape which he could have let Mr. Stalker hear? Is it not strange that a tape was weeded that certainly had on it the sound of gunshots and either the shouting of warnings before the opening of fire or the reaction of people after shots had been fired? One way or another, the tape would have cleared up the conflict of evidence between MacCauley and the RUC. To say that this was routine weeding out of a tape with gunshots heard on it beggars the imagination. It appears that it may have been weeded after it was learnt that Mr. Stalker was seeking to get the tape—a fact certainly already known to MI5, if it had not already reached the news media.

It was the deaths and the apparent cover-up that led to the accusation that the British were operating a shoot-to-kill policy in Northern Ireland. Stalker said he found no evidence "of a formal, officially endorsed policy".

Mr. Sampson found the same. The Government and the RUC, on the basis of that fact, claim that no such shoot-to-kill policy existed. Who are we, in the face of such assurances, to argue otherwise? Except that that is not quite what Mr. Stalker said. He said:

"the circumstances of those shootings pointed to a Police inclination, if not a policy, to shoot suspects dead without warning, rather than to arrest them" and he believed that

"heavily armed, psyched-up officers were being sent out to meet terrorists head-on, and they felt justified in shooting on sight".

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It is being said in Northern Ireland that the Secretary of State has been told that it was Sir John Hermon who instructed other officers to destroy the tape. Can the Secretary of State now deny that he has been told that Sir John Hermon gave the instruction? Will he come to the Dispatch Box and say that now?

Mr. Alton rose—

Mr. McNamara: If the Secretary of State wishes to intervene, I shall give way. Otherwise, I give way to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton).

Mr. Alton: When I met Sir John Hermon a week ago and put that very question to him, I was given the clear understanding that the tape had been destroyed some time after the events had occurred. I was left in no doubt that that had nothing whatever to do with the RUC. That is why it is crucial that this matter should be cleared up. The RUC is being undermined, and the confidence of the minority part of the community is being undermined, because people are uncertain who was responsible for the events. That is why we cannot tell whether there was a clear policy or whether there was simply an implication, as the hon. Gentleman puts it.

Mr. McNamara: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will join the Labour party in demanding a judicial inquiry.

Of course, all this happened during a period of rampant terrorism, as Sir John Hermon says, and the figures bear it out. Are we so other-worldly that we cannot understand the attitude of mind that prevailed at that time—an attitude of mind that might lead responsible people to say to those given the job of combating rampant terrorism on the ground, "I don't want to know what you are doing, but I hope you enjoy doing it" — the Pontius Pilate syndrome?

We can understand such attitudes amongst senior officers and even politicians and it is my view that there was no formal shoot-to-kill policy. However, I believe that there was the wink, the nod, the turning of the blind eye. Emotion rather than reason prevailed, and that was a pity for the rule of law in Northern Ireland.

There is enough in what I have said so far to justify a judicial inquiry such as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has been calling for since the Attorney-General's statement on 25 January. There are other reasons, and we must look at them. There is the question of the role of the Prime Minister in this affair.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): The hon. Gentleman has made a number of pretty serious allegations, some of which he has attributed to Stalker and some of which he has adopted himself. Where is his evidence to support the charge specifically that senior officers of the Royal Ulster Constabulary sent others out with a nod and a wink to break the criminal law? How does he know that?

Mr. McNamara: In the trial for murder, Mr. Robinson stated that he was told to lie about the situation by his superior officers and that he was told to say that events happened in other places. We know from the Stalker report—this is yet to be corrected by the Government—that alterations were made to records of the movement of cars, the places where people were and the places where events happened.

Therefore, one is entitled to use another quotation, which I shall come to later and which will deal with the point made by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths.) However, I would say again that the hon.

[Mr. McNamara]

Gentleman should condemn the Government for not allowing us a public inquiry, which would enable us to know the facts. Those whom the hon. Gentleman represents in the House could only benefit from that.

Of course, much could have been avoided if the McDermot report of 1970 to the Northern Ireland Government, which recommended that the DPP in Northern Ireland should be independent and not responsible to the Attorney-General, had been accepted. We should not then have been in this mess. It might help if we re-examined the McDermot report and if the Government introduced legislation on those lines to prevent a recurrence of these events.

We start with the problem that the Prime Minister regards the police in the same way as she regards the security services—as her personal preserve and subject to the Government rather than to an independent body. She equates the national interest with that of the Tory Government of the day. Thus, in statements from Downing street, a member of the police force was referred to as "the Government's employee"—presumably that came from the Prime Minister's "familiar", the head of the press office. When we have the Prime Minister and her office starting off with that kind of attitude to the police, striking at the constitutional doctrine of their independence, is it any wonder that there is lack of confidence?

Then we have the Prime Minister's response to the whole of the tragedy in Northern Ireland. Her emotion rules her head, and we understand the personal reasons for some of her emotions and we have every sympathy with her. However, if she were not in such a hurry to score emotional points and to demonstrate on the media last Thursday night the depth of her emotional upset, the situation might be better. She accused of murder those of my constituents, and constituents of hon. and right hon. Members throughout the House, who took it upon themselves to combat terrorism while serving in Northern Ireland as members of Her Majesty's forces. She spoke of 2,600 people in Northern Ireland, since the start of the recent troubles, as having been murdered. Yet, if we look at the figures we find that of those 2,627 deaths—that is far too many and none of them can be justified in any way —by the end of 1987, 304 were killed by the security forces and 55 per cent. of them were civilians.

Everybody deplores any death, and condemns strongly the murders by paramilitaries on both sides, but I would hesitate to call 304 deaths at the hands of the security forces — 169 of them civilians with no known paramilitary connections — "murders". The Prime Minister must be careful in the way that she uses words because she can destroy a good case.

It could be, of course, that the Prime Minister, as head of the Secret Service, knows things that we do not in this regard, and to which we are not privy. I hope that that is not the case. Or perhaps, once again, it was an occasion when the Prime Minister allowed her emotion to overcome her reason, and used figures like confetti at a Moonie wedding. She was quick to say in her recent discussions with the Taoiseach, "This is an emotional problem and you don't defeat emotion with reason", but we will win only if we are rational in our approach.

Therefore, we have called for a judicial inquiry because we believe that the Attorney-General could not conceivably have reached his conclusion that the public interest and national security dictated that members of the RUC should not be prosecuted for conspiracy to pervert the course of justice, despite compelling evidence that they had so conspired, without consulting the Prime Minister. She gave her advice as head of the security forces, emotionally involved, blinkered in her reaction to what the result of that decision might be for the safety of our troops on the streets in Northern Ireland and the success of the campaign against the men of violence. She must have been consulted. She must have been aware of, or had the ultimate responsibility as head of the secret services for, their role in the Stalker affair—the role of MI5, the planting of the bugs.

Therefore, we understand the truculence that the Prime Minister displayed in her answer last Thursday to my hon. Friend the Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) and to the demands made by the leaders of the Ulster Unionist party and the Democratic Unionist party that the buck should not stop with junior, or even senior, officers of the RUC. There is political and security force involvement.

We know also that there are senior politicians who adopted the attitude, "I don't want to know what you are doing, but are you enjoying it?" and knew of the existence of those special RUC units. In fact, in 1979, when first in her new job as Prime Minister, when the crescendo was building up, at the height of the IRA campaign, the Prime Minister herself visited the highly secret Bessbrook support unit. The account in The Irish Times refers to Mrs. Thatcher approaching to meet the men of that unit from a helicopter:

> "When it landed, Mrs. Thatcher strolled towards the BSU men with her characteristic purposefulness, pausing only to glare over her shoulder at Denis who had fallen down the helicopter steps.
> An ex-BSU man takes up the story: 'She came up to us and said "so you're the special unit we've heard about?" and then she started shaking hands and talking to each man. I remember her saying: "I don't know what you're doing, but are you enjoying it?" . . . She kept on congratulating our Inspector, calling him by his Christian name, saying what a good job the men were doing and "long may you continue."'"

The question to which we need to know the answer is "Did the attitude reflected in the phrase, 'I don't know what you're doing' permeate the whole of her Administration at that time and until the fatal shootings?" Was it, as Mr. Stalker later said:

> "What I did get was a feeling that an atmosphere was raised to such an extent and the adrenalin was flowing to such a level that the feeling was 'OK, dead or alive we'll be protected to some extent. We're soldiers really, in Police uniform, and we can probably justify deaths afterwards because we are in a war.', but I never found that there was any suggestion that there was a 'shoot-to-kill' policy. It was a feeling of 'Let's do it to them before they do it to us.'"

As those men were trained in speed and aggression of response, as members of the headquarters' mobile support units, that seems to be close to an unofficial shoot-to-kill policy that was at that time in operation in those very difficult situations in that part of Northern Ireland, where terrorism was rampant. That is why we believe that we should have a judicial inquiry — because there is evidence, innuendo and rumour, which will be referred to continually during the debate. When the Secretary of State calls on us for evidence, the answer is that that evidence, if it exists, is in the reports which none of us has yet been allowed to see and which the country has a right to know about. Because of the cover-up over the tapes and the concoctions of stories, we still do not know—perhaps the Minister will tell us when he replies to the debate—whether the cover-up story that was sanctioned in the Robinson case was first telephoned through to headquarters at Knock in Belfast, as has been alleged.

Northern Ireland is a very dangerous and very unhappy place. The Prime Minister's decision, as head of the security forces, and the Attorney-General's decision, with regard to no prosecutions following the Stalker-Sampson inquiry, have undermined the rule of law, and confidence in the RUC. Secret disciplinary procedures behind closed doors are no substitute. It is a nasty story, a grubby tale, with the fingerprints of the Prime Minister all over it. The hayshed tape lies at the heart of this story — [Interruption.] Well, she is head of the security forces and was consulted by the Attorney-General.

The Government still have the opportunity to come clean, by having a judicial inquiry under the Tribunals and Inquiries Act 1971 to look at the Stalker affair, the shoot-to-kill policy—if there was one—the cover-up and the roles of the Prime Minister, the Attorney-General and the security forces.

We are not seeking to find scapegoats — the Government are doing that. We seek to find the truth—the first casualty in this tragic affair. If, out of all this sorry mess, we could at least have the truth, in the end it might have been worth it. At least we could face the future with some degree of confidence.

6.6 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): I do not really believe that this House or the country on this side of the Irish sea really understands what is going on in Northern Ireland. As Members of Parliament, we discover that if there is an incident such as has been discussed at length by the spokesman for the Opposition, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), there will be a great hue and cry and a great parliamentary hubbub. However, when one looks at what is happening in Northern Ireland and sees how innocent people and those who are trying to do their duty in defending all sections of the community are being mown down and murdered, there seems a great silence. It is a thundering silence so far as the people of Northern Ireland are concerned.

The hon. Members for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross), for Antrim, South (Mr. Forsythe), for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) and for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) are in gaol tonight. I utterly and totally deplore the fact that we are having this debate tonight; all Members representing Northern Ireland should have had an opportunity to be present in the House on this occasion because this is the first opportunity that Northern Ireland Members, who represent the people of Northern Ireland through the ballot box, have had to discuss these events in a debate in this House.

Today is supposed to be devoted to Northern Ireland business, but we have had a long statement about the privatisation of electricity and we are told that at 7 o'clock this debate is to cease. That is a real outrage to the people of Northern Ireland. It is a crying shame that it is tonight that such issues are before us that should be debated in this House—it is better that they are debated in the House. I do not agree with what the spokesman for the Opposition said, but then he would not agree with many things that I say. It is better to discuss such matters in the House and it is better that the people of Northern Ireland should know that their representatives have an opportunity to say what has to be said in the House.

The Unionists of Northern Ireland can discuss their affairs in an Anglo-Irish Conference, of which we know nothing because it is all done in secret. It has been revealed that the understanding of both parties in the Anglo-Irish Conference is really a misunderstanding. Last night, we were informed by the Secretary of State that the next meeting of the Anglo-Irish Conference would be attended by the two chiefs of the police forces in the North and the South. The Secretary of State had hardly left Dublin than a strong statement was made that that was not the case. In fact, Mr. Lenihan told us that they might discuss the fair employment position — or the unfair employment position, whichever way one looks at it — at the next meeting. The people of Northern Ireland are involved in that. We have to pay the price, but we are never told anything.

At 7 o'clock tonight, the axe will come down. If we want to wait until 10 o'clock, we can, by the grace and favour of the powers that be, have an hour and a half and, at 11.30, go home.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): For many years the hon. Gentleman and I have differed profoundly on Northern Ireland, but on this issue I completely agree with him. For us to have a debate split up in this way shows that somebody does not see the issue of Northern Ireland in its proper perspective. It is disgraceful that this situation has been thrust upon us.

Rev. Ian Paisley: All right-thinking people in Northern Ireland, and the right-thinking Members of the House who are interested in Northern Ireland debates — although not many are and I have been in the House long enough to know that not many people stay throughout any debate —know that the Secretary of State is only answerable to the House. He goes down to Dublin and answers the Ministers there, but he is not responsible to them. He does not need to answer to them; he is responsible to the House and to the people of Northern Ireland. However, we have been robbed of our rights.

When we did not come to the House, we were told that we should be at the House. Then, when we come to the House, we are not given enough time to debate. In fact, one fellow asked me what I was doing here and said that I should be away home. The situation has deteriorated into a farce for the people of Northern Ireland. The House should conduct its business in such a way that all the people of Northern Ireland will know that these matters are being treated with great seriousness, no matter what side of the fence one is on.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): In fact, we may not even resume the debate at 10 o'clock. There could be two Divisions, following the private business, which means that the debate might not resume until 10.30, which would mean that this crucial debate will have been reduced to about two and three quarter hours.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I think that we shall also have another one and a half hours, but what time of the night will that be? Moreover, the people of Northern Ireland are anxious to know what the House is doing, and at that late hour there will be no press coverage. The Secretary of State has it in his power to say that the debate will be adjourned at 7 o'clock and resumed on another day. That would help everyone. It would also mean that those Members who are in gaol could attend.

[Rev. Ian Paisley]

Let me just say that the men in gaol tonight would not be there if they were Members of Parliament on this side of the water. The law on parades in Northern Ireland is different from the law on this side of the water. Here one must give six days' notice; there one must give seven days' notice. Those men would not be in prison at all if they had made their protests on this side of the water.

Why were the powers that be anxious that Unionists should not be in the House tonight? Were they afraid of what the Unionists would say? Were they afraid of the Ulster representatives taking part in the debate?

Mr. Mallon: I find myself in the unique situation of agreeing with the hon. Gentleman on this. Would it not be as well to have clarification now, because those of us who wish to speak want to leave time for everyone to make a contribution? If we had such clarification now we would be better able to facilitate other hon. Members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Let me try to help hon. Members. If the private business comes on at 7 o'clock before this debate is concluded, this debate will be resumed at the concluson of private business at 10 o'clock or before, as the case may be. If Divisions take us beyond 10 o'clock, the debate on Northern Ireland business can go on until 11.30.

Mr. McNamara: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can you confirm that the order that follows will have another hour and a half, and that will have some relevance to what we are debating now?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes, that is the case. At the conclusion of the debate on this order, even though that may be after 10 o'clock, the subsequent order will then have up to one and a half hours.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you allow me to give notice that I shall not rise again to intervene in the debate, but I wish to protest, as I have often protested, at the handling of Northern Ireland business.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Let me make a plea to the Secretary of State. It is in his power at 7 o'clock to move that the debate be adjourned. If there is agreement with the other side, the debate could be resumed next week. This is my only opportunity to speak, and it is difficult for me not to say what I have to say. My constituents will ask why I did not say certain things and they will not understand if I say that I had only a few minutes and had to allow time for others to speak. People in Northern Ireland believe that we can talk for as long as we like, but that is not the way of the House. If English Members of Parliament were treated as we have been treated tonight, there would be one unholy row in the House. They would not tolerate it. I am making a plea to the Secretary of State to adjourn the debate at 7 o'clock.

Did the Secretary of State know that there would be a long statement today, or did he think that we would be able to start this debate earlier? That would have allowed at least some semblance of time to carry on this debate. The Secretary of State has it within his power to give this debate an airing in the way that I have suggested. I invite him to tell us whether he is prepared to do so.

Mr. Tom King: The hon. Gentleman knows that the business of the House is not a matter for me but I am sympathetic to the problem that hon. Members face. I shall look into the matter and see whether there is any possibility of his request being met, but there is still some uncertainty about the time that we have today. Unfortunately, many hon. Members wanted to question the Secretary of State for Energy on his statement today and there was bound to be a business statement, which obviously contributed to the problem. I shall look into the matter, but I do not know whether anything can be done.

Mr. McNamara: We should like to have a reply by 7 o'clock.

Rev. Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As you are now in the Chair, perhaps you will clarify the position. We are led to believe that, at 7 o'clock, there will be an interruption for opposed private business. If that lasts until 10 o'clock, an hour and a half will remain for this business. If there are two Divisions on the private business, it will probably finish at half past 10 and we shall have an hour and half after that for this business.

In your absence, Mr. Speaker, I have been making a protest, for which there has been support from both sides of the House, about the fact that we have no time to discuss a vital matter in respect of Northern Ireland. It is now 20 minutes past 6. The two official spokemen have had an opportunity to state their position, and it is now the turn of Back Benchers to do so.

Mr. Speaker: I can tell the hon. Gentleman, as I did earlier, that this debate will be interrupted at 7 o'clock and that we shall return to it after the conclusion of the opposed private business. If that is concluded before 10 o'clock, we shall return to this debate before 10 o'clock, but this debate can continue until 11.30 pm and the following debate can continue for a further hour and a half.

Mr. Gow: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As I understand it, if at 10 o'clock there were one, two or even three Divisions, a quarter of an hour, half an hour or three quarters of an hour would be denied to this debate. Is that right?

Mr. Speaker: The Question on this motion will be put at 11.30 pm, so this debate can go until 11.30 pm. The time taken up by the Division will not affect subsequent debates. I was not in the Chair when the matter was first raised, so I am not totally seized of the problem.

Mr. Gow: You, Mr. Speaker, have confirmed the worst fears of all hon. Members. If there are one, two or three Divisions on the opposed private business at 10 o'clock the time taken on those Divisions will be lost to this debate.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, that would be correct. Some time for this debate would be lost. The debate may continue only until 11.30 pm, so, if there were a number of Divisions at 10 o'clock, I fear that some time would be lost.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I believe that I am in somewhat of an impasse. I do not believe that I am being permitted to put my case. We want to put our case and we want to hear the answer from the Front Bench.

Certain charges have been made from the Opposition Front Bench tonight and other hon. Members will be asking questions. If the debate continues until 10 to 7, we shall have a hotch-potch of an answer. No one will have the opportunity to obtain a proper answer. We are now told that, if Divisions continue until 10.45 pm, we shall have only three quarters of an hour to finish the debate. I support the comment of the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), that it is not fair to ask people to debate the matter in this way. I hope that Ministers will tell us quickly whether they are prepared to do as I have suggested, and adjourn the debate.

I wish to bring a number of matters to the attention of the House. I speak under a considerable strain tonight because, as I said in an earlier question to the Prime Minister, a member of my own church was murdered last night in the city of Belfast. He was a young man to whom I recently spoke about his marriage. He was planning to marry a young lady from my church. His death hangs very heavily on me. I have not been able to be at home because I have been performing my duties in Brussels and I feel very sore about the matter.

Some buildings have been removed from Royal avenue in the centre of Belfast. Laing, the contractors, are busy on a development which takes in the old Smithfield market area. To protect that building site, they erected a large hoarding on the Royal avenue site. A patrol had to take up duty near that hoarding and, because of that hoarding, there was a blind side that the patrol could not keep properly under surveillance.

The members of the Ulster Defence Regiment on that patrol said to their commanding officer, "Look, we need to have something done so that we are not a sitting target for an assassination attempt." Evidently, the matter was examined and the officer concerned—no doubt his rank will be disclosed in the examination promised by the Prime Minister today—is reported to have said, "No, we can't do anything. If you don't like what you are asked to do, you can leave the regiment."

Those young men were not objecting to their duty, but they have been told over and over again to watch themselves. They were on the ground and they knew the type of attack that could be launched upon them. Such an attack was launched upon them and today two families are plunged into the depths of sorrow as a result of what has taken place.

I do not wish to comment further on that, but I look forward to a proper examination of the facts and an investigation of what has occurred. The men were trying to do their duty efficiently and effectively and to keep up the high standards in respect of safety measures in which they were trained. If an officer said to them, "If you don't like what you are asked to do, resign from the regiment," that officer will have to be dealt with and disciplined.

Those men give, after hours, their services to the Ulster Defence Regiment to defend every section of the community and they should be given due respect by their commanding officers. The matter of the hoarding also needs to be investigated.

I started this speech by saying that I did not think that people in this House and on this side of the water know what is happening in Northern Ireland. On 17 January, a constituent of mine, young Stephen Tweed, who lives between Ballymena and Ballymoney on the outskirts of a village known as Dunloy — he is a Government employee and a part-time soldier in the Ulster Defence Regiment—was driving, with his girl friend, down the lane to his father's farmhouse. Forty one bullets were pumped into his car by two Armalite rifles in the hands of two members of the Irish Republican Army. I have visited the scene and looked at the car. It is a miracle that anybody came out of that car alive. Both the boy and his girl friend escaped without a scratch.

Just after that event, there appeared on the sign of an old school wall, in large writing, the words:

"Tweed goes on, but not for long", followed by the registration number of his car and signed by the IRA. That has been on the wall of the old school for days in an area which is strongly infiltrated by the IRA, inciting and inviting a further attack on the man and his home. If that had happened in England, the police would immediately have obliterated the sign because it is an incitement to murder. I have gone to the police in Ballymoney. I have told them that the sign should be erased. They agreed, but said that the owner of the property is not in sympathy with taking the sign off; he objects to anyone removing it.

These are some of the things which are happening in Northern Ireland. I am trying to show the House what we are up against. Before I came into the debate, I rang the police and was informed that the sign is still there, but that they were working on it. I said, "Superintendent, that is not good enough. The sign is inciting people to carry out a murder which has been attempted and has failed. If it was in any other part of the community, it would have been dealt with immediately."

Some hon. Members have applied strictures to the Royal Ulster Constabulary. It is all right when Royal Ulster Constabulary members are beating the heads of Protestants in Portadown: then there are cheers from the Opposition. In fact, a leading member of the same party as the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon), Councillor Briege Rodgers, had something to say about Portadown. She said that Portadown was the capital of Protestantism and that if the Protestants were beaten there, they would be beaten everywhere. That was her attitude. I have heard hon. Members speak of the great work which the RUC did in beating up Protestants who wanted to walk through a certain area. It is important that the House gets to grips with the position and knows exactly what is happening.

What about Mr. Stephen Tweed? He was visited by a member of the security forces who handed him a ·22 pistol and told him that he could protect himself. Any hon. Member who thinks that a pea-shooter of that strength is any protection for a man——

Mr. Mallon: The hon. Gentleman should know.

Rev. Ian Paisley —who is under such tremendous threat should have his head examined. It is all right for the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) to comment. He has set up many UDR men.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Gentleman was complaining about the time available for hon. Members from Northern Ireland in the debate. He has spoken now for nearly half an hour and he will leave hardly enough time for other hon. Members. He is being totally unfair to the House.

Mr. Alton: On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) may wish to reflect on the comment he has just made about an hon. Member setting up a member of the UDR. I hope he will withdraw that remark.

Mr. Speaker: I am not responsible for what is said. However, the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) has been speaking for rather a long time.

Rev. Ian Paisley: There are four Members from Northern Ireland in the House. We are getting until 7 o'clock. The Government Front Bench spokesman — [Interruption.] We were told by the managers of the business that an arrangement had been made by the two Front Benches to get the business over by 7 o'clock. We were no party to that arrangement.

Mr. Speaker: Nor was I. I have already told the hon. Member that the debate may go on after 10 o'clock, or even before that if the opposed private business is over.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can we find out from the Secretary of State, through yourself, whether the Government have agreed to adjourn the debate at 7 o'clock to another occasion when we will have sufficient time to discuss this serious matter?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me. Let us wait until we get to 7 o'clock.

Rev. Ian Paisley: It would be better for the House if we knew before that. It is unfair to the House and to other hon. Members — [Interruption.] Hon. Members may heckle me as much as they like. [AN HON. MEMBER: "The hon. Gentleman will still be speaking at 7 o'clock."] That is all right. It would not be the first time that I had talked out a debate. Opposition Members too have talked out debates. [Interruption.] I am glad that that came from the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh, because we know that when a stone is thrown among a lot of dogs the one that is hit the hardest yelps the loudest. I am happy about his remark.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) does not seem to know much about Northern Ireland. He should read the records of the first Assembly, when he will find out that Unionists refused to sit with the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh because of the things which he had said about the UDR. If he would like more information about the UDR, perhaps he should remember that his friend Dick Spring and his friend Dr. FitzGerald said after the Anglo-Irish Agreement was signed that it would be the end of the UDR. So there has been an attempt to discredit the UDR and to attack its members.

Mr. Alton: I think the hon. Gentleman will agree that there is a world of difference between saying that an hon. Member has discredited the UDR or disagrees with things which it has done and saying that an hon. Member tried to set up members of the UDR which gave the clear impression that the hon. Member had been involved in organising events which led to UDR men losing their lives.

Rev. Ian Paisley: It is very easy to set up people in Northern Ireland. Two police officers were named in the House by the Opposition Front Bench; the names were not even right, but those men were set up as soon as they were mentioned. Someone has only to say that the UDR is a pack of murderers and its members are set up in the same way as RUC officers have been.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): Is it not the case that in 1975 and in 1987 the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) made statements attacking the integrity of UDR members and the partisanship of the organisation, and within days the IRA replied to his comments by killing members of the regiment?

Rev. Ian Paisley: I want to return to the young man who has been set up by the IRA for a further attack on his life. He has been offered a ·22 pistol to defend himself. There is not a police officer in London, a comparatively peaceful city, who is asked to carry out the protection of Government officers with only a ·22 pistol. Yet that is all the protection offered to a man who has had 41 bullets pumped into his car, who is in danger of being wiped out, and who has a sign 100 yards from the farmhouse inciting people to kill him. I would be failing in my duty as Member of Parliament for the area, no matter what hon. Members think of me and no matter what agitation goes on about parliamentary time, if I did not raise that matter in the House this evening. That is my duty, and I shall do my duty, whether it is popular or unpopular with this House.

It is scandalous for any two parties in this House to make an arrangement for 7 o'clock involving Northern Ireland business, and thinking that they can do it because they have five Unionist Members comfortably behind bars. That is something that the people of Northern Ireland will not tolerate, and something that I, as a Member of this House, will vigorously protest against.

Serious events are taking place in Northern Ireland at present. Everyone there knows that a large consignment of sophisticated and powerful weaponry has been brought into Northern Ireland, and into the Irish Republic. The Garda in the South are alarmed; Mr. Haughey himself is alarmed; the authorities here are alarmed.

I have heard it said that the search in the South came about because of the Anglo-Irish Agreement. Let me disillusion the House. No search was made in the South as a result of any representations through the Anglo-Irish Conference. A message conveyed to the Gardai from the French police giving the facts about the shipment was what started the search. That is why Mr. Haughey asked for sophisticated search machinery, which he borrowed from the Northern Ireland authorities, to help his search.

Those of us who live in Northern Ireland keep our ears open, and we know what is happening. The search took place because Mr. Haughey saw that his Government could go down.

Is the House aware that in the hands of the IRA is a bomb which, if it alights on a Land Rover, can penetrate 6 in of steel and destroy it? [Interruption.] I am told that it is a grenade. On Monday night, I was at the bedside of a sergeant. The lower part of his body had been almost blown off in Coalisland. He needed 14 pints of blood, and was fighting for his life. I stood there with his wife and family.

What do hon. Members think is the morale of the policemen who now go out in Land Rovers knowing that in the hands of the terrorists is a bomb that can penetrate 6 in of steel and destroy them? These are facts that the House needs to know.

One of the Members of this House who are in prison tonight — the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker), whose outspokenness is well known — said this in the House:

> "Is the House aware that, in the previous 11 years, five of the six men who were shot"— this is what all the investigation is about—

"and their associates—this is not intended to excuse any wrongdoing—had murdered 222 people in my constituency, 42 of whom were policemen, 35 of whom were UDR men, over 20 of whom were innocent Catholics and the rest were regular soldiers — constituents of hon. Members — and Protestants." — [Official Report, 17 February 1988; Vol. 127, c. 990.]

That is the background of what we are discussing tonight. We cannot discuss such a horrific background without keeping in mind the background of Northern Ireland.

I know that, if the campaign with these modern weapons is launched on the security forces, we shall be in the utmost difficulty. We only have to see helicopters shot out of the skies and aeroplanes brought down to see what will happen in Northern Ireland.

I see that the Secretary of State has returned to the Chamber. Perhaps he can tell us whether the debate will stop at 7 o'clock.

I now see that the Leader of the House has come in as well. I shall give way to him, if he wishes to make a statement. It seems that the Leader of the House is not going to make a statement. If he is intending to make one, however, it would be helpful to me if he made it now, so that I can judge the position.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way for a moment. I appreciate that the debate started rather late—that is just one of the things that happen here—and I understand that many hon. Members on both sides of the House wish to speak. Perhaps it would be for the convenience of the House if we adjourned the debate at 7 o'clock. I propose that it should be resumed at a convenient date, which I would discuss through the usual channels.

Mr. McNamara: We should be happy to accept that arrangement.

Mr. Gow: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Now that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House is here, let me say that many hon. Members on both sides of the House would doubtless like to take the opportunity of telling him that many people consider the arrangements for today's debate most unsatisfactory.

Having made that point, I hope that we will all join in saying to my right hon. Friend that we greatly appreciate the sensitive way in which he has handled the matter.

Mr. Alton: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I join the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) in thanking the Leader of the House for coming to the Dispatch Box to make his statement. Let me also join him in saying that the procedures that we use for dealing with Northern Ireland business are clearly wholly unsatisfactory. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will examine the way in which Standing Orders operate and Orders in Council are brought, and also the way in which very short periods are allocated to deal with matters of great sensitivity and political importance.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I thank the Leader of the House for his announcement. I also thank him on behalf of the Official Unionists who are not present in the House tonight. I think that everyone knows why they are not present. They adopted the same attitude as the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) and said that they would not seek to be called in the debate.

What the right hon. Gentleman has said is gratifying, and will be welcomed in Northern Ireland. It will show the people there that the House is prepared to take time to discuss these vital matters.

Mr. Tom King: The hon. Gentleman may at the same time be able to bring great relief to some of his hon. Friends who are at present languishing elsewhere. He explained that they are there because they are being treated differently from hon. Members in other parts of the House in having to give seven days' notice, whereas in England and Wales six days' notice is required. I am amazed to hear that explanation, which is based entirely on a failure to understand parliamentary draftsmanship. The time requirement for Northern Ireland is identical to that in the rest of the United Kingdom. He may wish, therefore, to advise those hon. Members that they are languishing in vain.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I am sorry that the Secretary of State has not read his own Order in Council. I am sorry that he does not know the difference between pieces of legislation that he sponsors in the House, and that he does not know the charges brought against those hon. Members. I was in court with them on the very same charges. How could they be brought to court for not giving seven days' notice if, as the Secretary of State has said, the law is the same as in the rest of the United Kingdom?

At another time I will speak in the House about the order on public order and I will show the Secretary of State in Hansard the provisions in that order that were not voted down by the House and are not applicable in England and Wales. When will the Secretary of State have sense and tell the truth to the House? To come to the House and tell us that the public order order is the same as that for the rest of the United Kingdom is absolute tommy rot. I would use a stronger expression, Mr. Speaker, only you would call me to order.

I trust that the Secretary of State will now read his own legislation. The public order order in Northern Ireland is entirely different from the legislation in the rest of the United Kingdom.

The Secretary of State was wearing a great smile. He seems to enjoy the fact that those hon. Members are languishing in prison. I have news for him. He could put the Unionist leaders into prison for years, but it would not destroy their credibility with the people. When they take part in an election, they will be returned with overwhelming votes.

Mr. Mallon: Does the hon. Gentleman not see any contradiction in the situation prevailing at the present time, in which other hon. Members are languishing, as he puts it, in prison because of their opposition to the public order order, while if they were here they would be voting for the renewal of this piece of legislation?

Rev. Ian Paisley: I never said that they were languishing in prison. It was the Secretary of State who said that—the man who rejoices when Members of the House are in that situation. He says that he understands, but he does not understand. If he understood, he would realise that it would be better to keep elected leaders out of prison and have them here in the House. For the day will come, if he keeps on doing what he is doing, when he will be faced with people of a different type, who will not bother with the constitutional way of doing things.

[Rev. Ian Paisley]

In this dangerous situation, when there are arms in the country from Libya and the position is constantly deteriorating, it ill becomes the Secretary of State to treat us with the contempt with which he has treated us tonight. I am sure that when the hon. Members come out of their short imprisonment, they will not have the same privilege as was given to my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), who was locked in with a Republican rebel, especially chosen, no doubt, on the orders of the Secretary of State, thinking perhaps that he would be able to proselytise and convert the hon. Member. It was very interesting that the next day they removed the Republican quickly from the Protestant influence of that prison cell because they thought that he would be converted to proper convictions. [Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh, and I can laugh, although I have been in prison many times and according to the public order order I shall be going again. But I shall stand up in court and read what the Secretary of State said—that I should not be there, that I have committed no crime—and we shall see what the DPP says in court about the Secretary of State.

We hear all this talk about Sinn Fein being isolated by the SDLP, that the SDLP is pushing Sinn Fein away. I want to tell the House what happened in the Magherafelt council the other night. The Sinn Fein members got up, after a vicious attack led by the godfather of terrorism, a man called Davey, who has set up many good men to be killed. He moved that Queen Elizabeth II——

Mr. McNamara: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but earlier he accused the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) of setting up UDR men. He has now accused somebody outside of setting up men to be killed. The implication of the use of that phrase is that he was saying the same about the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh. I think that the hon. Gentleman should be made to withdraw that, as happened with my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone).

Mr. Speaker: I hope that the hon. Member will withdraw, if that was what he was saying.

Rev. Ian Paisley: You can read Hansard, Mr. Speaker, and you will see exactly what I said. I am afraid that I cannot withdraw until you have done that, because this is not a correct statement.

The man I am talking about, Davey, is well known as an IRA godfather. If I am not allowed in the House——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not talking about the gentleman outside the House whom the hon. Member mentioned; I am talking about an hon. Member inside the House.

Rev. Ian Paisley: All I am saying, Sir, is that you can read Hansard. I will bow to your ruling. If you read Hansard, no doubt you will get in touch with me and if you want me to do something no doubt you will tell me what it is. I am not promising that I will do it, but I will listen to what you have to say. That is all I can do.

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): Is it not strange that the spokesman for Her Majesty's Opposition, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), should call on the hon. Member to withdraw in connection with the names that he has mentioned, when the hon. Gentleman himself named the members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary? It is all right naming an RUC member, but one cannot name an IRA man. It seems that the hon. Gentleman is more concerned to defend IRA men than to defend members of the RUC and the security forces.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Let us get back to Magherafelt council.

Mr. Mallon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your direction in relation to this. I want it to be clearly understood that whether the hon. Gentleman withdraws or does not withdraw the remarks he made about me is of no interest and little relevance to me. But would it be your instruction that, if the hon. Gentleman were to accuse someone else of having set someone up for murder, that would be very unparliamentary indeed and you would require it to be clarified?

Mr. Speaker: As I understand it, the term "setting up" has a special relevance in Northern Ireland. It has not, I think, been considered an unparliamentary phrase previously in the Chamber. I am sure that the whole House will agree that all of us recognise the danger in which, sadly, hon. Members in Ulster live. I hope that nothing that is said here will inflame the situation or put their lives in danger.

Rev. Ian Paisley: No doubt, Mr. Speaker, you will read carefully what has been said and will be in touch with me about it. I have already made my position clear.

Mr. Gow: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way.

Rev Ian Paisley: I hope that the hon. Gentleman knows that, if he keeps speaking until 7 o'clock and I am still on my feet, I shall be called first the next time.

Mr. Gow: I wanted to raise a difference point when I asked the hon. Gentleman to give way to me. Since it was the hon. Gentleman who, with the assent of the whole House, wanted the debate to take place on another day, does he realise that he must sit down just before 7 o'clock? If he would like to sit down now, that might be of help to him, and indeed to the House.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I am sitting down at the moment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It might be helpful to the hon. Gentleman if I underline what the hon. Member for Eastbourne has just said. If the hon. Gentleman is on his feet at 7 o'clock, he will put in jeopardy the adjournment of the debate.

Rev. Ian Paisley: It is 6.57, Sir, and I think that I can finish what I have to say before the dread hour. I must tell the House that there was a move by Sinn Fein IRA gunmen, in that council, to remove Queen Elizabeth's name from the parks, and that they were backed unanimously by the SDLP. Every one of them voted in favour, including a justice of the peace. That is what is happening in Northern Ireland and that is what I wanted to say before 7 o'clock. I understand that if I sit down at 7 o'clock I shall be called first next time. [SEVERAL HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Then I will sit down, Mr. Speaker.

Debate adjourned.—[Mr. Wakeham.]

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

Orders of the Day

Hampshire (Lyndhurst Bypass) Bill
[Lords] (By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

6.59 pm

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I am indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson)——

Mr. Speaker: If I may interrupt the hon. Gentleman for one moment, I failed to say that I have not selected the Instruction on the Order Paper, but he may make reference to it in his speech.

Mr. Mans: I am indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest for raising no objection to this private Bill. I am also delighted that my hon. Friend will be taking part in the debate as his knowledge of the New Forest is much greater than my own. We both welcome the debate in the interests of all concerned, and as a way of bringing a long drawn-out saga of a bypass through the village of Lyndhurst nearer a conclusion.

I hope that my past involvement in the matter over a number of years as a New Forest district councillor will be of assistance to hon. Members in deciding their views. The discussion about a bypass for the village of Lyndhurst is not new. There are references to a bypass being proposed as long ago as 1914. In that year it was suggested as a way of reducing unemployment in the village. The estimated cost was £320, and at least part of the route was similar to the route proposed today. It was estimated that the road would be completed in four weeks and that it would take 27 men to do the task.

Things have changed a lot since then. Indeed, 50 years ago work actually started on a bypass, along a similar route to the one now proposed. The road was mentioned in the Baker report of 1949 which led to the New Forest Act 1949 which gave the verderers, the guardians of the New Forest, their present powers.

Since then, a number of routes have been proposed. There have been two public inquiries and numerous public consultations. However, before explaining those routes, and more specifically the new route proposed by the county council and why it decided to puruse that route by way of a private Bill, I should like to explain why a bypass for the village of Lyndhurst is needed.

Lyndhurst is a small village with a population of below 3,000. However, for many years it has been considered to be the capital of the New Forest, largely because it is a route centre—six roads converge upon Lyndhurst. A bypass is needed because of the traffic going into the New Forest which recently has progressively become a very important recreational area. I understand that last year 11 million people visited the New Forest, and forest traffic has increased each year. At the last census 61,000 vehicles passed in or out of the village during August, and 46,000 vehicles in or out of the village during October. Traffic congestion is enormous. For many summer weekends queues of four miles are not uncommon and the noise is horrifying.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Can the hon. Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) tell us whether those who were going in or out of the village were asked whether their destination was Lyndhurst and features within the village such as Bolton's Bench? How many were trying to get through the village? My evidence is that a large amount of the traffic comprised people trying to get to the village, not trying to get through it. Those people would not be using the bypass.

Mr. Mans: My evidence shows that a great many people would be using the bypass, as they wish to pass Lyndhurst and get to the New Forest. It is clear from those figures that almost everyone wants a bypass. My hon. Friend the Member for the New Forest is one of those people. The verderers, the guardians of the New Forest, want a bypass. To my knowledge, no environmental group has publicly come out against the principle of a bypass.

However, it is one thing to agree a principle, it is quite another to find a route. Over the years two routes have been canvassed, at least initially. The outer route has the support of the county council, the New Forest district council, the parish council of Lyndhurst and indeed the residents' association. That is a good route for traffic, but it intrudes into the forest. For that reason the verderers have opposed it. That route was tested by public inquiry in the 1970s. It is not surprising that the verderers should oppose such a route as they have a statutory duty to protect the forest. Although verderers protect the forest, they do not protect the whole environment and there are plenty of beauty spots and open areas outside the statutory duty of the verderers but within the geographical area of the New Forest.

I shall call the other route the village route because it is a relief road and not a proper bypass. That has the support of the verderers because it intrudes on the New Forest to only a small degree. Latterly, it has had the support of other environmental groups. However, the councils have opposed that route as have the people of Lyndhurst. That is not surprising because it cuts off part of the village. It cuts off the village green called Bolton's Bench, the cricket ground and 15 per cent. of the housing of the village from the remainder of the village and passes through a preservation area. Indeed, it will not get rid of much of the noise and air pollution which the villagers already suffer because of the lack of a proper bypass. In addition, it passes through paddock land and areas of ecological importance.

Both routes are equally damaging to the environment, but in different ways. That is why there has been no agreement about which route should be selected, and why in the mid-1980s the county council decided upon a compromise and proposed a new route which this Bill seeks to promote. This route is closer to the village, it keeps the village intact, it does not pass through the preservation area or cut off the village green. It is less intrusive into the New Forest. It is not an ideal route for the villagers of Lyndhurst but they have agreed to it to the extent that more than half the population have signed a petition agreeing to that route. It has the support of the county council, the parish council and the residents' association. Indeed, it has the unanimous support of the Conservative and the Labour groups on the county council. That shows, if nothing else, that this is not a partisan matter and it has the support of different parties locally in Hampshire.

[Mr. Mans]

That route and other routes were the subject of a second public inquiry, which was part of the more general inquiry on the forecast endowments village plan. That inquiry said that the village route was not the best, for the reasons I have given. It said that of the two outer routes, the compromise route was just better and that a further variation on the village route should be examined using the same criteria as were used for the village route. That was done by the county council. Unfortunately, the verderers were not prepared to go along with the compromise route.

Planning permission was then obtained for the compromise route. The decision on planning permission was not called in by the Minister, so the planning processes have been exhausted. There is no doubt that the Bill does not intend to bypass those processes; it is in addition to those processes and is necessary because of the special nature of the New Forest.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I am advised that there has been no public inquiry under the town and country planning legislation within a reasonable period. If that is the case, it would seem to qualify the point made by the hon. Gentleman about public consultation.

Mr. Mans: There was a public inquiry into the forest and village towns local plan which started in 1983, because of the importance of the bypass around Lyndhurst. The inquiry was in two parts. The first related to the forest and the second related to the various routes which were considered for the bypass, so the planning procedures have been exhausted.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mans: I have made the point, and I must go on as I have quite a lot to say.

What was the council to do next? Our suggestion was that it should go to the verderers and ask them again whether they would be prepared to go along with the compromise route.

Section 17 of the New Forest Act 1949 relates to unfenced roads. The council took legal advice and was told that the section related only to unfenced roads. That view was supported by Lord Denning in another place, when he made it perfectly clear that the section could not be used by the county council or any other authority to ask permission for a road of the sort necessary to be built, because a bypass around Lyndhurst would have to be fenced in the same way as the roads to which it would join in the north and the south are fenced. The best legal advice was that the council could not proceed in that direction.

It could well be argued that if the council had gone to the verderers and the arbitration procedures had been used, the verderers, even if they gave permission, could have been considered to have been acting outside their authority. If they had done that, the plan may have had to be tested in the courts. Notwithstanding that, it would have been necessary for a private Bill to provide for the road to be fenced.

There are other good reasons for a private Bill. The decision taken on the bypass would be in the public domain and it would be open for all parties — environmental groups, residents' associations and others — to put their point of view. A private arrangement under section 17 of the New Forest Act between the county council and the verderers would not have allowed for the public consultation which has taken place. We have already had a Select Committee report from the other place, where the various route options have been considered in detail.

The New Forest Act 1949 allows for financial compensation only if land is used for roads. It makes no allowance for compensation for an exchange of land. The verderers have said on many occasions that they would prefer an exchange of land to financial compensation. If the road is built, it will take 10·6 acres of forest land, but the county council has already purchased 18·8 acres to give back to the forest, so if the Bill goes through and the council is allowed to build a road, the New Forest will become bigger, not smaller.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the hon. Gentleman tell us where the compensation land is and whether he is satisfied that the general public will have access to the compensation land and animals will be able to get to the compensation land as freely as they can to some of the land that will be lost?

Mr. Mans: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying. The compensation land is at Minstead and is in two portions. Part of the land is already owned by the council and the other land will be purchased from the manor of Minstead. The cattle and other animals will have access to that land.

There are other reasons why a private Bill is a good procedure. It will allow people who will have to give up land for compulsory purchase to be dealt with in the same way as owners of forest land are dealt with by the Ministry of Agriculture. It is fair to all land owners, compared with the procedure under the New Forest Act 1949, where the owners of private land would not have had the same rights.

For many reasons it is not surprising that the legal advice given to the county council was to proceed by way of a private Bill, not by way of the New Forest Act. As the matter has come out into the public domain, it has been considered closely. I cannot see how anybody could suggest that the planning procedures are being circumvented, as the issue has been dealt with at great length. The bypass is only 1·7 miles long. There cannot be many other roads of that size that have been the subject of such detailed scrutiny as that road.

Another argument put forward against the Bill is that it would create a precedent. I am not clear what the precedent is. Organisations have been bringing private Bills before the House and the other place for decades, if not centuries. The county council is not a commercial organisation that wants to do something for profit; it is an elected body. Support for the measure runs right across party lines at county and district levels.

Mr. W. Benyon (Milton Keynes): It worries many of us that the House may create a precedent in laying down the law on the New Forest. My hon. Friend is trying to change the law with a private Bill, which is what we find difficult to take. He has to face this matter carefully. For me, and I believe for many of my hon. Friends, the New Forest is in exactly the same position as a national park, but under different legislation.

Mr. Mans: My hon. Friend is right to say that the New Forest is a very special place. I acknowledge that, as I did when I was a district councillor. Indeed, the district and county councils have a tremendous record in protecting the forest.

It is significant that very recently the Council for the Protection of Rural England wrote a letter congratulating the county council on the way it was dealing with the roads policy in relation to all the other roads in the forest. That shows that the county council would never have taken this line if it thought that the route would damage the interests of the forest; indeed, quite the reverse.

On the specific point about the private Bill, I do not see how it can be used as a precedent. The county council has made it quite clear that the Bill should not be regarded as a precedent for other interests to promote private Bills, such as commercial interests that might damage the New Forest.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): Would I not be correct in saying that there has been a complete impasse on this issue for over 12 years, with the verderers and Hampshire county council unable to agree on any route? Six routes have been proposed. If this particular log jam had been allowed to continue, it was fairly obvious that, after 50 years of discussion, Lyndhurst district council would still not have come to an agreement with the verderers and Hampshire county council on the route. The only course left for Hampshire county council was to bring forward a private Bill.

Mr. Mans: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. He is absolutely right. Indeed, I can answer the point about precedent that was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon). I have here a statement by the county council, which says:

"If this Bill becomes an Act, it would not be regarded by the County Council as a precedent whereby private legislation was used to construct bypasses elsewhere in the Forest without the consent of the verderers."

This is a very special case. The road is needed, and has been needed, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) says, for more than 50 years. I cannot think of another case in the forest that comes anywhere near it. Everybody, including the verderers, understands the need for some sort of relief road.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. He will know that I and many of my hon. Friends are concerned about over development in the south of England. With the provision of bypasses around towns, especially historic and pleasant ones like Lyndhurst, we have seen that where a bypass goes very wide of a town that is an invitation, if not a demand, that the land between the bypass and the town shall be developed. It is very difficult in practice, however resolute one may be at the beginning, to resist the demand of developers. Can my hon. Friend comment on that?

Mr. Mans: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention, as I had missed out that point. Those of us who know about the forest and downlands village plan will understand how detailed it is. Indeed, only 26 more homes will be built in the four villages within the New Forest — Lyndhurst, Bramshaw, Brockenhurst and Burley — between now and 1997. I have here a letter dated 23 February from the principal planning officer of New Forest district council. He refers to several matters, and in the context of the matter I have just raised, he says:

"The idea of any development taking place between the proposed bypass and the village has little credibility."

We are talking about single plots of land, not a development encompassing the area between the proposed bypass route and the existing settlement.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) rose—

Mr. Mans: I will give way in a moment.

If one looks closely at the map one sees that there is a far greater chance of more infill if the proposed verderers' route is adopted. In that case, a small amount of land would lie between the relief road and the settlement. This bypass will protect the land, if anything, between the road and the settlement.

Mr. Boswell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. He has anticipated what I was about to say. There is a real danger, as I have seen for myself, that there will be infilling if a narrow slit is left, but where a wider sweep is taken there is less chance of infilling over the whole area.

Mr. Mans: Yes. I would add that my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) took the trouble to come down and see for himself the problems associated with the village route and the proposed bypass, and how the latter route is better. Indeed, that invitation was open to every hon. Member. The county council is convinced that those who go to see for themselves what is at stake, without exception so far as I know, have all seen the sense of the county route and the problems associated with the verderers' preferred relief road through the village.

The need for a bypass is manifest to everyone. The route proposed in the Bill is designed to minimise damage to the environment while bringing relief from traffic congestion in Lyndhurst, and at the same time keeping the village intact. A private Bill procedure would have been necessary for any route. I emphasise that it does not matter which route is selected, even the route selected by the verderers. Sooner or later, if the principle of a bypass is accepted, private legislation will be needed to achieve it.

The arbitration procedure in section 17 of the New Forest Act could not be used simply because it relates only to unfenced roads. I ask that the Bill should be allowed to proceed to a Select Committee. I ask that those opposing the Bill allow their reasons for so doing to be examined by that Select Committee, as that is the fairest way of proceeding. Indeed, if there is an opportunity between this debate and the first Select Committee sitting, I hope that those in favour of the county council's route will get together with those groups who are worried about the route. I sincerely hope that will happen.

In addition, to allay the fears of some hon. Members, the Select Committee will be able to analyse whether the method chosen by the county council in promoting the Bill is right. The Committee will be able to scrutinise the routes once again, as did the Select Committee in the other place, to assess whether the county council has the answer.

I hope that the verderers and the county council will get together once again during the Select Committee proceedings to look for a further compromise, if that is possible within the terms of the Bill. Hon. Members should be in no doubt that if a bypass, relief road or any other scheme for getting traffic around Lyndhurst is to be built, the House must agree it by the method of a private Bill. Therefore, I urge all hon. Members to allow the measure to go forward to a Select Committee.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson (New Forest): I have taken careful note of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans). The House will not have failed to notice that the Bill has not been sponsored by an hon. Member representing a Hampshire constituency, and is being brought forward for a Second Reading against the stated advice of the chief executive of the promoting authority with supporting advice of parliamentary agents and counsel. I shall give details of that later.

However persuasive the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre, he does not have the unique responsibility that I have as the Member of Parliament representing the New Forest. Road schemes are, of course, very important to all of us, but the New Forest is unique and has been afforded special protection over many years by public Acts which have enabled us to beat off challenges of many sorts. My hon. Friends the Members for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon) and for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) have already pointed out that developers are currently looking for new territory, and to strip away such protection at this time would be a fatal mistake.

It has been argued that the Bill represents the only way in which the road can be built. I hope to demonstrate that that is complete nonsense and that all the powers that are required exist in the New Forest Act 1949. It is clear from the outset that this is no ordinary works Bill. It raises matters of the most important principle that are relevant to every hon. Member. Those principles are important in deciding not merely where the road should go, but the route that should be taken by those who build it to ensure that, as near as possible, we stick to the agreed procedures that exist.

The origins of the Bill do not lie in success, but in failure. There has been a failure to consult. As Member of Parliament for the area I was never consulted, but merely told that the Bill was to be published. There has been a failure to negotiate and a failure to agree. However, what is more worrying is that the county council has failed to recognise that it has a duty, as the responsible local authority, to protect the New Forest rather than tear that protection away by the Bill.

People from the oil and gas industries are already looking enviously at the forest land. Indeed, in 1983 I had the opportunity to draw the Government's attention to the provisions of the New Forest Act 1877 which prevented Shell International Petroleum from drilling for oil in the Denny Inclosure. There was a public inquiry. I should mention, with great respect to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary who was not in office at that time, that the Government refused to recognise the validity of that Act. Of course, in the end, they had to, but a strange solution was reached—Shell's application was declared invalid after the inquiry had sat for nearly six months.

The Bill represents a clumsy, ham-fisted, maladroit way in which to attempt to sweep away legislation that benefits us all, especially those who know and love the forest.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wyre has said that the county council has claimed that there is no alternative way in which the necessary powers can be granted. Shortly, I shall take him through some parts of the 1949 Act with which he may not be familiar. Indeed, should any Select Committee be formed, I doubt whether it would be altogether familiar with those parts of the Act.

I wish to draw attention to the advice that was given to the county council as recently as 25 January at a special meeting of the policy and resources committee held at the castle in Winchester. That committee had been asked, specifically, to look at the future of the Lyndhurst bypass Bill. I shall quote from the minutes of that meeting, which illustrate the views of the chief executive of the county council and others. The chief executive said:

"We therefore feel that the Bill has no chance if it is submitted to decision at the present time — a view supported by all the local Members. Withdrawal of the Bill is in our opinion a much preferred alternative to submitting it to the test of debate on Second Reading in the House of Commons, unless the present forlorn prospects of its being passed by the House are altered. This is because withdrawal preserves at least the untarnished record of the Bill in Parliament, which its rejection on Second Reading in the Commons would undermine . . . We feel that the County Council should preserve untarnished the possible option of early introduction of the Bill if in the next say, two years those procedural doubts could be set at rest and Member support in the House of Commons established."

That was first-class advice from the chief executive. Indeed, that advice was supported by both the parliamentary agents and the parliamentary counsel. Yet here we are today discussing the Bill on Second Reading.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): The debate involves a discussion of the merits of democracy in the decision-making process. Will my hon. Friend confirm that, when that advice was given to the policy and resources committee and the motion was proposed, the motion, on being put to the vote, was lost? The democratically elected councillors rejected that advice.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: I would not cavil about that—the vote was 16-11. I was seeking to illustrate the advice given by the chief executive on that occasion rather than what the members felt.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) is my next door neighbour in our part of Hampshire. On 29 December 1987 he wrote a letter to the Southern Evening Echo:

"I have been asked to sponsor the Hampshire Lyndhurst Bypass Bill in the House of Commons by the Hampshire County Council, but have declined to do so for the following reasons.

Firstly I believe that the Private Bill procedure being adopted by the County Council would establish an unwelcome precedent that would endanger the New Forest . . . I may not be brilliant at picking winners but I do know a loser when I see one, and this Bill is it."

My hon. Friend seized on the point that I wish to establish, which is that the Bill could be of material danger to the New Forest and other parts of the country.

Last month, at the annual meeting of the parish council of Brockenhurst, a nearby village, the chief executive of the New Forest district council—my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre has already said that that council is in favour of the Bill—was asked to comment on the Bill. The Lymington Times of Saturday 6 February 1988, reported:

"'We are now pressing on with the Second Reading in the Commons. How far we get remains to be seen,' said Mr. Bassett, saying that if it received insufficient support, the Bill would be talked out by filibustering."

Clearly the chief executive does not realise that filibustering is not a parliamentary term. The report went on:

"'We will take it head on' adding that there was always the fall-back of arbitration."

That fall back is set out in clause 17. Therefore, we are to go through the expenditure of ratepayers' money—this unhappy charade today—against the professional advice of those who told the county council what they believe to be the interests of that council and presumably the interests of the ratepayers of the county and the residents of Lyndhurst.

Mr. Mans: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct that there are people who believe that the advice given to the county council is correct. However, I am sure that my hon. Friend would agree that a county council must take the legal advice given to it and then assess it. Although I have the greatest respect for the chief executive of the New Forest district council, the fact is that other, more learned people such as Lord Denning think differently. Other legal information suggests that the course adopted by the county council is the correct one. Lord Denning is just one person who believes that to be the case.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: The noble Lord has been referred to a number of times and I shall come to his remarks later. My hon. Friend is not correct in thinking that the chief executive of an important district council—one of the largest in the country—does not understand the legal niceties of the matter. He ended:

"We have got to test ourselves about the future of the New Forest, and how we hand it on to the next generation".

That is precisely the issue we are discussing—whether to allow the New Forest's protective powers to be bulldozed out of the way in Westminster, and to allow the private Bill procedure to be used instead of a public, general Act of Parliament. That lies at the heart of much of the dispute.

The New Forest is central to our discussion. As hon. Members know, it is as old as the Palace of Westminster. It was laid down by William the Conqueror in 1079, and those of us who know the Palace well will recall that Westminster hall was built by William the Conqueror's son, who subsequently met his end in the New Forest when a stray arrow killed him. He was buried at Winchester. The New Forest is the largest area of natural vegetation in lowland Britain and one of the largest in Europe. It is a place of enormous ecological significance, and it is under increasing pressure from the various bodies that I mentioned earlier. At one stage the Army cast its eye lovingly over it. It clearly requires careful management.

I want to establish my credentials for discussing the Bill. I explained at the outset that I represent the New Forest, and I am no stranger to it. My family have lived in and around Lyndhurst for many years; my father is buried in its cemetery. I learnt to ride in Lyndhurst in 1937, which dates me a bit. I know the village well. At one time or another we have lived on three of the four roads that are likely to be linked by the road scheme. I live on one of them now—the Lyndhurst to Beaulieu road. So I have some detailed knowledge of the traffic problems that occur in the village. If hon. Members went to Lyndhurst tomorrow they would find no traffic problem and would wonder what all the fuss is about. However, it is in the summer months when large numbers of visitors come—8 million in 1985—that the problem increases. I want to make it crystal clear that I have never opposed the idea of a bypass for Lyndhurst. Neither, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre pointed out, have the court of verderers or any of the other bodies concerned. The issue is how to go about it.

Lyndhurst is not only a pretty village; it is also the administrative centre of the New Forest. It contains the headquarters of the Forestry Commission, the Verderers hall, where the court does its business, the headquarters of the New Forest district council and the Nature Conservancy Council—a statutory body—and it is where the parish council and the residents operate. It is therefore a village of real local significance.

For simplicity's sake I shall say that the Forestry Commission looks after the trees and the verderers look after the common land. I am describing the management system in shorthand and obviously there are overlapping areas. Hon. Members can see that the administration and management of the forest are thus divided neatly into two separate sections.

The management structure is supported by legislation. The Forestry Commission, being a statutory body, has a great deal of legislation to enable it to carry out its functions. The verderers rely on public Acts of Parliament which have, over the years, given them considerable power and authority. I mentioned the 1877 Act, but the idea of the protection for common land goes back to the 17th century. All the legislation charged the verderers with the responsibility for protecting this unique part of Britain. That unique shield against bricks and concrete has not sprung up without careful consideration. It has been built, brick on brick, to produce the legal basis on which the forest has been able to rely over the years, and on which I hope that it will be able to continue to rely in the future.

It is interesting to note that the private Bill procedure was praised by my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre as being the ideal one to deal with the problem. However, I draw his attention to the evidence given to the Joint Select Committee on Private Bill Procedure, of which I have the honour to be chairman, by my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Aberdare, who is the Lord Chairman of Committees. In his evidence on 2 November 1987, he said about Lyndhurst:

"An example is provided by the Hampshire (Lyndhurst Bypass) Bill at present before Parliament. That is a Bill which authorises the making of a bypass around Lyndhurst by the local highway authority."

This is the important point to which I draw the House's attention:

"In general, the necessary powers already exist for that purpose"

—that contradicts what my hon. Friend said. My right hon. and noble Friend went on to say—this is material to what I shall say later—

"but certain aspects of the scheme (fencing the road and the acquisition and exchange of certain land) could not be achieved without specific legislation."

I shall challenge that point in a moment and explain—with the greatest respect—that my right hon. and noble Friend has misunderstood one of the clauses of the 1949 Act. He added:

"A Bill was accordingly necessary and the opportunity has been taken to seek authority by Bill for the whole scheme.

It can, of course, be argued that the practice that has developed in this regard is wrong in principle and that in cases of this kind it should only be permissible to seek authority by Bill for what cannot be effected without a Bill, leaving the rest of the scheme to be effected through the ordinary Public General Act procedures."

—that is precisely my point.

"To the argument of principle there may be added the point that the effect of the practice can be to allow a small tail to wag a large dog and there may even be a temptation . . . for a Promoter to search for a tail for this purpose, if he is keen to avoid the Public General Act procedures."

[Mr. McNair-Wilson]

I hope that hon. Members will note those words—they are directly relevant.

Mr. Mans: Does my hon. Friend accept that, although the noble Lord said that the Select Committee of the House of Lords, in coming to its decision to allow the Bill to go through to Third Reading in another place, took another view and accepted that the county council was correct in bringing the fencing and the road together in one Bill?

Mr. McNair-Wilson: My hon. Friend raises an interesting point. I shall return to that matter in a moment.

At present, there is legislation in place, which should be tested against the requirements of the scheme that the county council is so anxious to pursue. I draw the attention of the House to an important letter that was written by my noble Friend, the Official Verderer, Lord Manners, in The Times on 28 November 1987. He said:

"Since 1877 Parliament has been concerned to protect the beauty of the New Forest. The New Forest Act 1949 made provision for roads to be built over the open forest, but only with the consent of the verderers, with a provision that the matter be referred to arbitration in the event of the verderers withholding their consent unreasonably."

The important point is:

"If Parliament considers that the protection of the open forest is no longer of importance, then it should declare this as its policy by way of public Act, amending the existing legislation affecting the New Forest, and not let the matter be dealt with on a piecemeal basis by private Acts."

I cannot quarrel with that; it is a first-class statement of the position.

Mr. David Martin (Portsmouth, South): If that happened, it would make matters much worse for places such as national parks and for the New Forest, which is being taken as a national park. By the private Bill method, one has an opportunity to examine each specific proposal in detail rather than give a general right in law. Therefore, surely that gives greater protection to the rights that I understand my hon. Friend wishes to protect.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: I would entirely accept what my hon. Friend has said were it not for the fact that—as I hope to show—the powers necessary for the scheme are already available. My hon. Friend makes a valid point, but the powers are already available.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wyre mentioned the Select Committee report from the House of Lords after the Select Committee hearing of the Bill. That was not a complete departure from normal practice, but it showed that the other place considered that the Bill warranted serious consideration. I have looked at that report, but it is sadly deficient in a number of matters. It talks about —this point has been made on a number of occasions— one of the paragraphs in "Erskine May", which, as hon. Members will know, is a good guide to parliamentary procedure. Paragraph 22 says that the Committee noted "however, that Erskine May states at page 907 that 'No rule has been established which precludes the promoters of a private bill from seeking the repeal or amendment of public Acts.'"

That is quite true and absolutely right. That is the point that my noble Friend, Lord Manners, made in his letter to The Times.

Were we being asked to consider amendment or repeal of the 1944 Act, Parliament would be in a position to express a view; but it is not being so asked. If hon. Members look at the Bill to see how many times the Act is mentioned, they will discover that it is mentioned only once in order to point out a relevant clause, which says: "'the New Forest' means lands within the Forest as defined . . . under section 12 of the New Forest Act 1949."

This is not a Bill to amend or repeal the New Forest Act 1949. It is a Bill to get round, to circumvent, to push to one side and to carry on as if the 1949 Act did not exist.

I explained earlier that verderers are part of a delicately balanced management structure. They are a democratically elected body, the powers of which are enshrined in public Acts. They are responsible for common rights and their powers have been amended over the years. The 1877 Act was particularly important in that regard.

Mr. Hill: My hon. Friend obviously has great local knowledge. Will he describe how those democratic verderers are elected, for what period of time, how many of them there are, what qualifications they must have and where their end responsibility lies?

Mr. McNair-Wilson: There are five elected verderers and four appointed verderers. They are appointed, in one case, by the Ministry of Agriculture, and that will become significant later in my remarks. They are elected by those who hold common rights. Common rights in the forest go with the land. The commoner—the person whom they are protecting—is responsible for their election. It is a fair and reasonable method of election.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has often talked of the problems of the small farmer. I do not want to discuss the considerable problems of the commoner, but I should tell hon. Members that the verderers are elected by those whom they must serve and protect. That is why it is so important that we leave them with the necessary power to carry out that protection.

Mr. Key: I have already mentioned the matter of democracy. Is it not the case that the verderers, split 50-50 between appointees and those who are elected, will always come down in favour of the non-elected because of the casting vote of the chairman? That is precisely how they were defined and described during the debates on the 1949 Act. Furthermore, will my hon. Friend agree that there is now only one family who, technically, are commoners and that all the beasts in the New Forest, apart from 10 who graze under commoners' rights, are grazing under licence and do not belong to those who, technically, have the 1 acre of land necessary to make them a commoner, which gives them the right to vote for the verderers?

Mr. McNair-Wilson: I do not want to upset my hon. Friend, but I must tell him that I am a commoner and that I have run animals on the forest. I know of many people who are far without the description that my hon. Friend has given. Commoning is still a lively way in which some individuals with small farming interests continue to live. It is not becoming any easier, but commoning is not, as my hon. Friend tried to suggest, some sort of business enterprise done on licence. If he were to visit the forest I should be only too happy to introduce him to some commoners. He would then have an opportunity to discuss the matter with them.

Mr. Key: I live only 300 yd from the forest.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: Perhaps my hon. Friend will be kind enough to ask me to visit his house.

I want to consider how the 1949 Act came into being. It has already been referred to in great detail and it is the cornerstone of the protection that the forest enjoys. As the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) knows, the Act flows from the decision of the post-war Labour Government of 1946 to set up a committee of inquiry under Mr. Baker to look, with others, at the conditions of the New Forest and,

"having due regard to the existing rights and interests, to recommend such measures as are necessary for adjusting to modern requirements."

I do not often pay lavish tribute to the Labour party, but on that occasion it was right. That body reported in 1947 and its report has become known in shorthand as the Baker report. It went into great detail about the problems that would be likely to face the forest in the post-war years and ensured that the verderers' powers were modernised and brought up to date. The court was reconstituted as I described and the Official Verderer, the chairman of the court, is appointed by Her Majesty — by the Government of the day—and is the person ultimately responsible to the Crown.

The court sits in open session every other month and allows any member of the community, be he commoner or otherwise, to make presentments that can be listened to and acted upon. That open court, which I regard as very democratic, is of great importance and significance to the area. The Lord Chancellor can indicate four members of the court to sit on an extension of the court—the court of Swainmote—which is a disciplinary court that has powers with which I shall not worry the House.

The 1949 Act, which sprang out of the Baker report of 1947, is very specific, as is all legislation governing the New Forest, including, as I said, the 1877 Act. Let me draw the attention of the House to the two sections central to our debate. Section 17 has been referred to. I note from the Order Paper that my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre has tabled an Instruction to the Committee to pay particular regard to the 1949 Act. I am only sorry that it has been such a long time coming. Why was an Instruction not tabled on Second Reading in another place? The 1949 Act had not been mentioned before; it had been brushed aside as being of no significance. The Instruction has been put here to keep this stuttering flame alive. If one is prepared to table an Instruction to the Committee to look at the 1949 Act, one might as well use the arbitration procedures under that Act.

Mr. Mans: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Instruction was rejected because it was felt to be superfluous as it was already in the instructions of the Select Committee of both Houses to look at this point?

Mr. McNair-Wilson: I thank my hon. Friend.

Section 17 is lengthy, and I shall not read the whole of it to the House, but a number of its provisions are material to our debate. Subsection (1) says:

"Where a highway authority, other than the Secretary of State for Transport, require any land in the Forest for the purposes of any of their functions as a highway authority, they may apply to the verderers for their agreement to the transfer of the land to the highway authority."

The clause then describes that process. Clause 17(8) says:

"The verderers shall not unreasonably withhold their agreement on any application under this section by a highway authority; and if any dispute arises as to whether their agreement has been unreasonably withheld the matter shall be referred to a single arbitrator agreed between the verderers and the authority or, failing agreement, appointed by the President of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors on an application made either by the verderers or by the authority after giving notice in writing to the other of them."

Here we have a clear-cut arbitration machinery already established in a public Act. Why have we not used it? We have heard something of the promoters' case tonight. Apparently, they feel that the Act does not cover all the requirements. I shall come to fencing and the exchange of land in a moment. What the promoters hear is the word "reasonableness". If my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre is correct that the route being promoted by the county council is environmentally superior to that proposed by the verderers' court, why are the promoters not prepared to test that reasonableness? Do the promoters believe that because of the verderers' special responsibilities they would not win at arbitration, even though, as I pointed out, the chief executive to the New Forest district council suggested that "there was always the fallback of arbitration"?

The machinery is there. It should have been used.

Mr. Mans: I fully agree with my hon. Friend that this goes to the heart of the matter. It really comes down to what one means by "reasonable". Does my hon. Friend not agree that the verderers are responsible for the forest and the forest alone and therefore cannot possibly be considered to be acting unreasonably if they are trying to protect the forest and not the whole environment? Does he agree that the routes are environmentally equally good and, if anything, the inner route may be slightly better? However, the fact remains that the verderers are not responsible for the environment along which the inner—the village—route would go.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: I understand what my hon. Friend says. He now questions what it would be considered reasonable for the verderers to concede. He will, of course, know that the building of the A31 across the north of the forest used a vast amount of forest land and yet the verderers did not withhold their permission. They were reasonable. I assure my hon. Friend that my noble Friend the Official Verderer is a reasonable man, as are the other members of his court. Therefore, why will the county council not allow the matter to be tested under what my hon. Friend acknowledges is arbitration machinery?

My hon. Friend questioned whether other powers were available under the 1949 Act to cover fencing and land exchange. Much has been said about that. We have been told repeatedly that without a private Bill fencing and land exchange cannot be completed. I believe that that is complete fiction.

Mr. Benyon: Am I not right in thinking that Hampshire county council has a representative on the court of verderers and is it not a fact that he opposes this way of proceeding?

Mr. McNair-Wilson: He does, indeed. As my hon. Friend pointed out, the elected member of Hampshire county council appointed to the court of verderers was kept away from the meeting to which hon. Members were invited to be shown the route. Hon. Members were only allowed to hear one point of view, and the Hampshire county council representative who was a verderer was prevented from attending. [HON. MEMBERS: "Disgraceful."] It is absolutely true.

I shall return to the Select Committee report, published after the Committee stage in the other place. Some hon.

[Mr. McNair-Wilson]

Members may not be familiar with that report. Under the heading "Exchange of Land" in paragraphs 24 and 25, it says:

"Under the provisions of the Bill the Promoters will transfer lands to the Verderers in exchange for the land taken from the open forest for the construction of a bypass."

The report discusses the criticism of the quality of the land and so on. What it does not do is to make any mention or take any note of section 19 of the New Forest Act 1949. We have heard much about section 17, but section 19 has never caught the public imagination. I shall bring it out of hiding so that hon. Members can see for themselves that it contains precisely the power that we are told can be provided only by private Act of Parliament.

Section 19 is headed,

"Exchanges of land in the Forest."

and states:

"The Minister may with the agreement of the verderers direct that any unenclosed land in the Forest which is vested in the Minister shall be held by him on behalf of the Crown in severalty and free from all rights of the commoners, and that in exchange for that land any land invested in the Minister and surrounded by or abutting on the Forest, but not forming part thereof, shall become part of the Forest and subject to the like rights of common."

Therefore, one can extinguish those rights, change the land and give it to somebody else. My noble Friend, the Official Verderer, wrote to me on 15 February this year referring specifically to section 19, stating:

"Once the Minister has acquired land, receiving land in exchange, he can transfer it to the highway authority who would then be entitled to fence it."

There is the provision of land exchange and fencing. He went on to state:

"As the County Council are offering exchange land I can see no difficulty."

Mr. Key rose——

Mr. McNair-Wilson: My hon. Friend seems unhappy, so before he intervenes, let me say that the Official Verderer also stated:

"Incidentally the provisions of Section 19 are used fairly extensively when Forest land is required for various purposes."

Therefore, that route is already well trodden. However, if one reads the Select Committee report, one will not find a mention anywhere of section 19.

Mr. Boswell: Will my hon. Friend tell the House whether the arbitration procedures that are applied in section 17 and bear on matters of fencing are also available in the event of a dispute between a potential or an actual highway authority and the verderers in respect of section 19 and the exchange of lands to which he has just referred?

Mr. McNair-Wilson: My hon. Friend makes an important point, but section 17 deals with all land that would be affected by a plan by a highway authority to build a road, other than the Minister of Transport, who has special powers. Therefore, in this case, the two are separate issues.

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend anticipated that I would rise on this point. I apologise for interrupting him yet again, but my constituency is contiguous with my hon. Friend's. The question of fencing is crucial because, as my hon. Friend will agree, a large and growing number of animals are killed on the roads each year in that area. The matter of fencing is not in dispute in relation to enclosed land. However, we must be absolutely clear on the question of fencing because it seems to me that section 17 is not accurate when it comes to the fencing of roads. Indeed, in the Second Reading debate of the New Forest Bill on 18 October 1949, the then Joint Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, a certain Mr. George Brown, stated:

"Clause 17 relates to other public roads in the Forest for which the highway authority is not the Ministry but the Southampton County Council. They may need to be improved or widened from time to time, although the intention is, as I have said, that the main flow of through traffic should use the trunk road. This Clause contains no provision for fencing.—[Official Report, 18 October 1949; Vol. 468, c. 497.]

Mr. McNair-Wilson: That is quite true—section 17 does not contain such provisions and I never suggested that it did. All that I am saying is that, when the land is exchanged and no longer has upon it common rights, it is without the responsibility of the verderers and can be fenced by the body which then has it in its possession.

Mr. Mans: On the point of specific exchange of land, I think that my hon. Friend will agree that section 17 is a specific section dealing with land exchange for roads. Section 19, to which he has referred, is a general section. It is a well-known legal precedent that one cannot override a specific section which does not mention a specific thing by a general section of an Act that does so. Therefore, despite the fact that section 19 mentions exchange of land, it cannot be used in the case of section 17.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: It is, of course, a question of the test of the reasonableness of the case. I have made that clear; inevitably, that is what it is about. In fact, arbitration machinery exists to test whether the case is reasonable. It is that test to which I very much hope that the county council will eventually agree.

I do not want to go on too much about the Select Committee report from the other place, save to draw the House's attention to its last paragraph, on page 9, section 47, which states:

"The Committee conclude by drawing attention to the fact that in allowing the Bill to proceed, they have done so in the knowledge that the County Council, in promoting a private bill, have adopted an unusual procedure for the construction of a highway and one which avoids the veto of the Verderers which Parliament in 1949 regarded as an important safeguard for the New Forest."

I repeat that the Select Committee said that it was "an unusual procedure".

I want to deal briefly with whether this is the best procedure, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre suggested. Much reference has been made by him and by others in the past to wanting the Bill to be referred to a Select Committee, as if some mysterious coven of Members of Parliament would be able to make sense of nonsense. That is totally far-fetched. I call in aid the evidence given to the Joint Select Committee on Private Bill Procedure, to which I have already referred, by the Parliamentary Bar in evidence dated 23 April 1987 which states in general about Committee procedure:

"The procedures under which the private bill committees operates are in some respects old fashioned, ill defined and unsophisticated. There is abundant scope for reforms".

We are not dealing with some carefully honed body of people who can bring a sensitive eye to these problems because, as hon. Members who know Standing Orders will appreciate, one can serve on one of those Select Committees only if one does not have an interest in the matter that is being discussed.

Indeed, the evidence goes further. Section (ii) states:

"It has become apparent in recent years that Members of the House of Commons find it increasingly difficult to take part continuously in the quasi-judicial work of the Committees; and thus there is a widening gulf in the quality of the decision making process between the two Houses."

Those who now suggest that the Bill—[Interruption.] This is serious criticism. The Bill is now to be committed to such a Committee. I shall question in a moment whether that is the best body to consider a matter that is so important to this part of England.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the promoters, and those who are petitioning against, have been looking at fitting in the time for such Committee proceedings? There is some discussion that three weeks might be needed in Committee. How many hon. Members now present in the Chamber could cross out of their diary at least three days a week for three weeks to sit in Committee to listen to the arguments? It is a major imposition on hon. Members if they are expected to find that sort of time.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: The hon. Gentleman makes an important and valid point. A similar point was raised during the discussions on the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill. Indeed, when the Select Committee was constituted, at least one hon. Member, who was not aware of the length of the proceedings, had to absent herself from the Committee. When that happened, the Committee was without a quorum and therefore had to cease its proceedings. Corridors in this building were full of silks, counsel, petitioners and people who had travelled a long way, wasting money, but who were unable to get the satisfaction which my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre seems to feel can be derived only through the private Bill procedure. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. The Committee on Private Bill procedure is concerned about being able to keep those quasi-judicial bodies in being because of the inconvenience, the cost and the time involved if they are without a quorum. It is an important matter. They are like a jury in a court. However, the difference between a jury in a court and a Select Committee is that the jury has the benefit of guidance from the judge, whereas the Select Committee, with the greatest respect to all those who chair them, may not have the same expert knowledge of some of the controversial matters being discussed.

I referred earlier to remarks in the public evidence given by Lord Aberdare. In conclusion he said:

"Indeed, where works are at all extensive or controversial I can see force in the argument that Parliament is not the most suitable forum for determining whether they should be carried out. If, therefore, there is one area more than another in the Private Bill field where an alternative to Private Bill procedure could usually be explored it seems to me to be that covered by works provisions."

He is absolutely right.

The idea that somehow here in Parliament we shall satisfactorily resolve the problems of Lyndhurst's roads is fanciful. With great respect to all hon. Members, they cannot have the detailed knowledge that is necessary. In the end, the only way in which the matter will be resolved is by a joint committee of the verderers court and the highway authority. That is the way that we have to proceed if we want to protect the New Forest. Those who do not want to do that can come here and bring in amending legislation, but they should not attempt to get round the existing Act in the way that the Bill attempts to do.

None of us can tell what will happen to the Bill, but we must ask ourselves — what of the future? One must recognise that, as the chief executive of the county council pointed out in the advice to which I referred earlier, if it is possible to overcome the procedural problems that lie at the heart of our debate, it will be far better than being saddled with this type of Act which may in time lead to the establishment of a dangerous precedent.

I heard what my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre said about the assurances given by the Hampshire county council about road building. But he did not read out a letter from the chairman of Shell, Esso, Clyde Petroleum or British Gas. The chief executive of Hampshire county council cannot tie his successors hand and foot by any assurance. Therefore, one must treat that with the reservation that is expected.

We know that Lyndhurst has a road problem. We know that the bodies concerned have no objection to the bypass. We also know that, even if the Bill were to go through all its stages as quickly as possible, the bypass would not be built this year, next year or the year after. The works described in the Bill are for the 1990s programme of Hampshire county council. What will happen to the villagers of Lyndhurst this summer?

The Hampshire county council has an important statutory responsibility as a highway authority to look seriously at the alternative signposting of the routes that avoid Lyndhurst, and there are plenty. I know them, because I drive on them. I spend my working life at weekends travelling on those roads. I have a home on the Lyndhurst-Beaulieu road and a constituency office at Cadnam. It could be said that one has to go through Lyndhurst to get there, but I do not. Four roads lead to Beaulieu, Brockenhurst and Lymington but they are not signposted as alternatives. Therefore, I appeal to Hampshire county council to produce sensible alternative signposting. The Totton west bypass, which my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) knows so well, is almost complete and has already altered the area's traffic flow, relieving much of the pressure.

I object to the Bill, but I would be happy to act as an honest broker to bring the various bodies together. If it is impossible for the court of verderers and the highway authority to sit down together, I shall be happy to find some way of bringing them together and help in the establishment of what I hope will be much better relations. Indeed, my noble Friend Lord Manners has already begun that job himself.

Therefore, I give this admonition to the court of verderers. Whatever happens to the Bill tonight is not the end of the story. Lyndhurst still has problems which must be resolved, but they need to be resolved in their interests while recognising the importance of the forest.

Recently, the Forestry Commission established the important New Forest review body, whose report has been published. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have had letters about model aeroplane flying on Beaulieu aerodrome, so some are already aware that such a body exists. That review body included representatives of the Forestry Commission, Hampshire county council, the Countryside Commission, the New Forest district council, verderers, the Nature Conservancy Council, and so on.

[Mr. McNair-Wilson]

The review body said in the concluding recommendations of its report published on 6 October 1987:

"During the course of the Review we have come increasingly to realise that more than ever before the authorities responsible in their various ways for the New Forest, the authorities indeed who we represent, are the trustees for the nation."

That is the spirit in which we should go forward.

I have had many letters from local authorities complaining about the Department of the Environment inspectors overriding local planning decisions and allowing development where the planning authority has objected. The county council is at the moment preparing a great case against the establishment of a coal-fired power station at the mouth of Southampton water, Fawley B, and the establishment of a coal importing terminal. However, we shall not go into that. More ratepayers' money is to be spent on all that. I do not object, but surely it is bewildering, confused and confusing thinking for the county council to act in one way about the power station while in the same breath stripping away the protection from the New Forest. The county council must have a clear strategy on its desire to protect the environment.

There is no problem here that cannot be resolved. If we work together we can genuinely recognise the changes that are necessary—as was hinted at in the Baker report in 1947—to take account of the requirements of a modern and different world. Provided we work together, we can make those changes our friends and allies rather than what we have here—a hostile and unwelcome intruder. I do not like the Bill.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): In defending the New Forest, about which the hon. Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson) spoke with such feeling, he made a powerful case based on his deep personal knowledge of the New Forest and the area surrounding Lyndhurst. I cannot pretend to have anything like his knowledge of the area or his qualifications for intervening in the debate, but, as he knows, I am a regular visitor to the New Forest and I have spent summer or Easter in each of the last eight years in the northern part of the forest.

I owe a deeply personal debt to the New Forest because I have spent periods of great happiness and peace there. Anyone who is caught on the heath in the rain knows that it can be a rugged and bleak place, but those changing moods and scenery make the forest a living thing and give it its fascination. Nowhere else in lowland Britain can one find such an extensive tract of public land and, perhaps with the exception of Dartmoor, nowhere else does one find such an extensive tract where there is open access. It is one of the last places left to us where we can walk at will across a natural landscape. The sense of wonder that it inspires is due to the fact that it has remained largely unchanged. One can walk across a landscape that has remained since mediaeval times and still shares the same type of livestock and wildlife that roamed there in those times.

The New Forest is one of the treasures of Britain. It is every bit as much our heritage as the mediaeval cathedral in the constituency of the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), through which he would not dream of driving even a modest two-track bypass.

I concede that I do not live in the New Forest and I must qualify my right to express a view. I neither reside nor work in the forest, and I can fully understand the impatience of those who live in the forest, particularly the residents of Lyndhurst who support the bypass, about the fact that the decision on the bypass should be taken by people who neither live nor work in their village.

Mr. Hill: The hon. Gentleman has got quite the wrong impression about what I am trying to say. No doubt he travels to the New Forest several times a year with his family and perhaps a caravan. However, he should be talking on behalf of the visitors who wish to go to the forest, to caravan parks and car parks, and then walk into the forest to see all its beauty.

Mr. Cook: I travel to the New Forest by car and I will comment on the traffic congestion in Lyndhurst, which I have seen as I have driven through the town.

I wish to make a couple of points in defence of my right, as a visitor, to intervene in the debate. First, I do not seek to become involved in the decision. It was the decision of the county council to submit the matter to Parliament and to resolve the matter by private Bill. If the county council takes the view that this is the proper way of proceeding, it can hardly object to Members of Parliament exercising their judgment on the matter over which they are asked to preside.

Secondly, those people who visit the forest are not entitled to have the same weight attached to their views as those who reside there. Nevertheless, our views are entitled to some weight. After all, there are 8 million of us, which is a population equivalent to that of Greater London. Moreover, we make an important contribution to the economy of the forest. Lyndhurst shows some ambivalence towards us. That is revealed in the comments on local plans, where Lyndhurst is described as the capital of the forest, and its tourist centre. That is a fair description of Lyndhurst. It has nine tea rooms and restaurants in the main street alone and it is studded with and ringed by hotels.

There is a certain tension between the promotion of Lyndhurst as a tourist centre and the description of Lyndhurst as the capital of the forest and a tourist centre. It becomes even worse if that traffic problem is resolved at the expense of the very forest which attracts tourists to Lyndhurst in the first place.

I wish to refer to a comment made by Lord Montagu of Beaulieu in the other place, when this matter was debated. He described the ground over which the bypass will travel as unexceptional forest scrub, yet he makes a tidy sum out of the tourist industry there and out of that unexceptional forest scrub. In purely commercial terms, it would be wise for him to place a higher value on that scrub.

As someone who is not a local Member of Parliament or resident, I do not apologise for expressing a view on this Bill. I do not criticise the hon. Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) for promoting this Bill, although he represents a constituency in Lancashire, as I am well aware of his strong local connections. The hon. Gentleman is not present at the moment, but I was surprised and sorry to see, in the Blackpool Gazette of 10 February, that the hon. Gentleman was quoted as saying:

"the main reason for supporting the bill was to learn the parliamentary ropes in preparing to press the case for the Fylde Coast Easterly Bypass."

I have no objection to the Fylde coast easterly bypass. It may be a perfectly acceptable proposal—I see that the hon. Gentleman has returned to the Chamber—but the New Forest deserves something better than being used as a dummy run for a bypass at the far end of England. If that comment is accurate, it casts a rather jaundiced light on the hon. Gentleman's comment that he does not regard the bypass as any sort of precedent, when plainly he does.

Mr. Mans: I was trying to explain that, as a new Member of the House, this would be a good opportunity to learn a little more about roads in general. The hon. Gentleman no doubt realises that one should not believe all that one reads in the newspapers.

Mr. Cook: I am happy that the hon. Gentleman has placed that correction on the record. All hon. Members are welcome to learn the ropes as best they can. Regrettably, I require no more learning processes on how to oppose business, as I have been doing that for the past eight years and will continue to do so for another three years. I oppose the Bill because I do not like it, not because of a learning curve.

In considering the Bill, we must address three questions. First, is a bypass necessary? Secondly, does it have to be this bypass? Thirdly, is this the correct procedure by which to obtain authority for it? The first point need not detain us long. I have sat in a stationary car, marooned in a tail-back, five miles outside Lyndhurst, often enough to appreciate the case for road works there. The case has changed over the years. Originally, the case was for a bypass for east-west traffic, which was removed by the M27 and the A31. The case is now transferred to the need for a north-south bypass. Over the years, some of the pressure may again be changed by the creation of the Totton bypass.

It is also possible to question the figures quoted by the hon. Member for Wyre when he presented the case. In its survey, the council discovered that 80 per cent. of the traffic approaching Lyndhurst was through traffic, but that 80 per cent. was defined by asking them their starting point and their destination, thus elminating those who were stopping in Lyndhurst for a meal, to purchase a postcard, or to visit the verderers court. Many of those 80 per cent. would wish to stop for that purpose and would not wish to be carried around the town by a bypass. Presumably, that is also the reason why some traders oppose the bypass. It would discourage people passing through the town from stopping and making their contribution to the local economy.

Nevertheless, I accept that there is a case for a bypass, but that does not oblige us to accept this bypass. There are alternatives. The county council's presentation to hon. Members freely admitted that seven different routes have been examined over the past 10 years. Those seven routes fall broadly into two categories—the outer routes and the inner routes. In the outer routes, the southern section swings out into the forest over the passage between the Southampton road and the Beaulieu road. The hon. Member for Wyre described that proposal as a compromise, with the outer route originally proposed as route No. 1.

Route No. 2 differs from route No. 1 in the northern section. It does not differ at all from route No. 1 in the southern section where it goes out into the forest to precisely the same extent as the original route. In that section, there is no compromise.

Mr. Mans: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the only reason it does not differ from the original route is that it is so close to the settlement pattern of Lyndhurst in the first place?

Mr. Cook: I shall come to the gap which will remain between it and the settlement pattern of Lyndhurst in a moment. In the meantime I point out to the hon. Gentleman that there are 85 acres between it and the settlement of Lyndhurst. If he says that those 85 acres bring the road so close to the settlement pattern of Lyndhurst, I am afraid that he will underline the fear of many petitioners. If we enclose the 85 acres which are considered as being so close to the settlement pattern of Lyndhurst, those 85 acres may become settled upon.

The other five routes are all variants of the inner route which travels to the west of Bolton's Bench. They go through the gap between the historic village and the modern suburb of Queen's Crescent. In his opening address, the hon. Member for Wyre attempted to pray in aid the report of the local inquiry into the forest and downlands villages local plan. What the inspector said in his report was:

"This sector of routes 1 and 5A"— that is, the southern sector to which I have just referred—

"in summary involves a fragmentation of open forest which should be avoided if a cost-effective route having an acceptable impact on the built up area can be devised on the west of Bolton's Bench."

It is plain that, having considered all the different routes available to it at the time and having considered the debate on the outer and inner routes, the preference of the inspector was for an inner route. It is not possible for the promoters of the Bill to pray in aid the outcome of that planning inquiry, the only planning inquiry at which the route was ever presented.

It is hardly surprising that those who identify their interests with the forest want to see as little intrusion as possible into the forest. Nor is it surprising that those who identify their interest with the village wish to shove the bypass as far out of the forest as they can get away with. The weight of representations against the outer route from those who are concerned with the forest is impressive.

That opposition falls into three categories. First, there are those who are concerned with the management of the forest. It is interesting that every body charged with the management of the forest is opposed to this route. It includes the verderers, the commoners and the New Forest Association. It also includes the Forestry Commission which, as a public body, has not felt it right to petition against the Bill and did not do so in the other place.

However, when the matter was debated on Second Reading, the then Minister stated fairly the objections of the Forestry Commission to the route. I hope that when the Minister intervenes in the debate he will repeat to this House the same objections of the Forestry Commission on the grounds of noise and intrusion which such a route would bring to the forest. Those of us who are not locals can take heart from the fact that there is strong local opposition to the proposal.

The second category of those who object covers the statutory bodies which are there to advise the Government on the environment. There are two, the Countryside Commission, which advises the Government on recreational and leisure use of the countryside, and the Nature Conservancy Council, which advises the Government on the scientific importance of the environment and threat to the environment. Both bodies are appointed by the Government to advise the Government and Parliament on how we should treat proposals for the countryside. This is the first time that those two bodies have petitioned against a private Bill. The fact that they have chosen this Bill to make their own precedent of petitioning against a private Bill demonstrates their strength of feeling and their concern about the unique character of the New Forest.

The last category of those opposed to the Bill is composed of the voluntary bodies whom one might describe as representing the consumer interest, the people who use and appreciate the countryside, the Council for the Protection of Rural England, the Ramblers Association and the Open Spaces Society. It is, in short, striking that the Bill has united against it the whole countryside lobby. One need not look far for the reason why it has achieved that unanimity of view among groups concerned with the countryside and the environment. It is because of the special character of the New Forest.

Here I want to return to the description by Lord Montagu of this tract of land as unexceptional forest scrub. I take his point openly. The stretch of land is no more and no less unexceptional than much of the rest of the New Forest. The strength of the New Forest and its unique character is precisely because it is an extensive tract of heath, very much similar throughout its area. I should like to quote to the House the evidence submitted by the Nature Conservancy Council in another place. This is the only lengthy quotation which I propose to read to the House; I hope the House will bear with me.

The Nature Conservancy Council brought out the importance of the extensive nature of the heath very well:

"It is the scale and totality of The Forest which is so important, rather than the value which may be placed on individual localities within it. We do not know the precise requirements, e.g. of most insects, which inhabit The Forest, but the evidence strongly suggests that The Forest's rich insect fauna is associated with its scale, continuity and diversity. To dismember it or fragment it, in however limited a fashion, is to diminish its total value to science and to people."

Mr. Key: Does not the hon. Member agree that the weakness of the petition of the Nature Conservancy Council to the House is that alone among the petitioners it makes no acknowledgement, unlike himself, of the need for a bypass? It takes no notice of the views of local people and it does not even mention the problem.

Mr. Cook: The Nature Conservancy Council very properly confined itself to those matters for which it has statutory responsibility, which is to advise on the scientific importance of the site and the threat to the environment of a proposal.

Mr. Key: What about the Countryside Commission?

Mr. Cook: The Countryside Commission has a wider remit. Its remit is to advise on the use of the countryside by people. That naturally involves it in commenting on traffic movements as well. I invite the hon. Gentleman to read not simply the petition submitted to the House by the Nature Conservancy Council but the full text of its evidence in the other place. He will find that it conceded that there was a demand for a bypass at Lyndhurst, although it did not take a view on whether there was a need for a bypass.

The hon. Gentleman has raised an important issue. I think it is also fair to say that the Nature Conservancy Council, as with the other petitioners, has made it clear that it would not petition against an inner route. I shall return to that point later. It is interesting that the promoters submit to the House a route which has united all the countryside interests, all of whom have said clearly that they would not oppose an inner route, were it chosen.

Mr. Hill: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We have left a bare hour and 12 minutes. I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) will take a few minutes. Will it be possible for local Members to participate in the debate? The debate seems to be widening to include every hon. Member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing attention to the fact that time is getting short. Many hon. Members still wish to speak.

Mr. Cook: I am much obliged, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall try to restrain myself from giving way again.

My concern is not merely with the 10 acres which are to be tarmacked for the road but with the 85 acres which are to be enclosed between the bypass and the town. There is an odd dichotomy in the representations of the supporters of the Bill. When the road swings out into the forest it is represented as a simple, two-track road which is not intrusive and will not fragment the forest. Indeed, the county surveyor in his evidence in the other place said:

"People will barely notice the bypass as they walk over it."

Yet when an identical road of identical dimensions is shifted to the inner route, we suddenly discover that it will split the village and will deny access from residents on one side over this immense barrier to the recreational facilities at Bolton's Bench.

The supporters of the route cannot have it both ways. If a road of such dimensions would split the village as an inner route, it will undeniably fragment the forest if it is an outer route. I have considerable sympathy with the petitioners' fears that, over a period, the 85 acres that will effectively be enclosed by the outer route would cease to have the character of open heath, and would become an urban park.

There are two considerations. The first is that the animals are likely to graze less frequently on the inside of the bypass, because their only access to that tract of land will be by a single underpass. The commoners maintain that the animals are unlikely to use the underpass to the same extent as they would wander over an open heath. That is why the commoners oppose the Bill. If the animals do not graze those 85 acres, there will be a substantial effect on the vegetation and plant life of that tract.

However, there is a more important reason for anxiety about the future of those 85 acres. If they were enclosed by the bypass, they would become regarded as part of the village and its amenities, rather than as a continuous tract of open forest with a division formed by a busy road fenced along its length with only two crossing points.

I find the attitude of the promoters to Bolton's Bench constructive. They object to the inner route on the grounds that it would be visually intrusive from Bolton's Bench. It is undeniable that all inner routes would be in proximity to Bolton's Bench; equally, however, all inner routes would be on the town side of Bolton's Bench.

Civic pride is a great thing, but I find it a curious assumption that all the townspeople who climb Bolton's

Bench, and, more particularly, all the visitors, do so to look back at Lyndhurst. The most obvious thing that they will see, in the immediate future, will be the fire station.

Some people who go up Bolton's Bench, particularly visitors, go not to see Lyndhurst and the fire station, but to look out on the forest. An outer route, if constructed along the lines suggested in the Bill, would be clearly visible. Across this section, half a mile of it will be an embankment, and one of the two crossings which are to be supplied will be an overhead bridge.

It is plain that, psychologically, the villagers regard Bolton's Bench as part of their village, rather than as part of the forest. My anxiety is that, if the outer route is chosen, all those 85 acres will come to be regarded as part of the purlieu of the village rather than the forest, and there will be pressure to prettify and develop it.

If the proposed route is objectionable, are the alternatives feasible? Certainly, an inner route is feasible, although I am not suggesting that it is necessarily ideal: it is difficult to find a proposed new road to which there are no objections. The promoters do not attempt to deny that, which is hardly surprising, as their own county bypass panel in 1983 concluded that the inner route would be more cost-effective and better value for money. This is what the panel said about the route that we are considering in the Bill:

"The panel here therefore looked at the possible alternate route put forward by the local members. It does however suffer from the same traffic and economic disadvantage as route 1"—

the original outer route—

"and is unlikely to be good value for money."

The reason that the panel concluded that an inner route would be better value for money is that it would be much shorter. The outer route is not only longer than the inner route, but much longer than the present route through the town, which would continue to be used by much through traffic unless measures were taken to close the high street. That would be inconvenient to residents and probably unpopular with traders.

The objections to the inner route, as advanced by the promoters, effectively come down to the view that the inner route is not acceptable to residents of Lyndhurst. Let me refer to the report of the Select Committee in the other place, which concluded:

"If route 5A is not proceeded with"— that is the route in the Bill—

"it is likely that the opposition of the residents of Lyndhurst to a route such as 6A as an inner route would mean that Lyndhurst would have no bypass for the foreseeable future."

With the greatest respect to the noble Lords, I am bound to say that there is a strong element of tautology in that statement. If the residents of Lyndhurst want a bypass, they can have an inner route. Such a Bill would pass through the House almost on the nod, without any petitioners objecting. If they choose not to accept an inner route, they have a perfect right to do so: the choice is theirs. It is wholly unreasonable, however, for the promoters to produce local opposition to the inner route as though it were an obstacle to progress which those of us who oppose the outer route had somehow dreamt up.

The third consideration is whether this is the correct way to seek authority for the construction of the road. Is it a prudent use of county council funds? I understand that the total cost of promoting this private Bill will be some £300,000, which, if we put it into perspective, is three times the entire footpaths budget of Hampshire county council.

The promoters have said that it is necessary to have a private Bill because it is necessary to secure permission to fence the road. There is a reference in clause 4(2) to fencing the road. The remaining 24 clauses have nothing to do with fencing. In truth, no one seriously imagines that the Bill is presented in this form because of the requirement to fence the road. The real reason is to get around the opposition of the court of verderers. I find it surprising that the county should choose to resort to such a device without even going to the arbitration provided for in the 1949 Act.

In fairness to the county, I will say that it is engagingly frank about why it has not proceeded to arbitration. As was stated candidly and with refreshing honesty by the hon. Member for Wyre, the reason is that the county admits that it is likely to lose if it goes to arbitration, and that any arbitrator is likely to uphold the opposition of the verderers as entirely reasonable.

It is possible to criticise the constitution of the verderers, as did the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) in an earlier intervention. Some of the criticism is overstated. The verderers are not a feudal organisation; their current constitution dates from 1949. They are, if anything, rather more representative and diverse in their origins than most quangos, in that they are appointed not by one body but by several bodies representing the various interests in the New Forest. However, their constitution is certainly idiosyncratic, and one could argue for a change.

An obvious change would be to make the New Forest a national park, and that was considered at the time that the national parks were designated. At that time, it was resolved not to designate the New Forest as a national park precisely because of the unique character of the verderers' court and the protection that they provided for the New Forest.

Possibly, that decision was wrong. Possibly, the verderers should have been swept aside, and a national parks authority put in their place. I understand that at least one member of the Countryside Commission at that time now takes the view that an error was made. But Parliament chose not to designate the New Forest a national park because it was going to rely on the verderers. Parliament, therefore, cannot now readily lend itself to brushing aside the objections of the people that it charged with the task of protecting the New Forest. It has to give the full weight to the opinion of the verderers that it would attach to the view of a national parks authority if it was resisting a road going through its area.

Mr. David Martin: The duties of the verderers are quite specific, and they are much narrower than the kinds of considerations now before Parliament. The duties that were given to them were essentially to protect the interests of the commoners. Nobody is suggesting that they would not be acting reasonably in rejecting this bypass, but the whole point is whether that should be the end of the matter.

Let us suppose that they had gone to arbitration and, as they no doubt expected, had lost, and had spent a lot of money doing that, what would they then do? Would the hon. Gentleman then back their coming to the House and saying, "The county council has wider considerations; let us have the bypass"?

Mr. Cook: I find it rather curious that the hon. Gentleman should suggest that, if the county council had proceeded to arbitration and then lost, that should somehow commend this proposal to the House. The point that I was making is that arbitration has not even been advanced, and it has made it quite clear that it has not advanced arbitration, because it does not have any confidence that it would win.

The hon. Gentleman did make a very important point about the narrow nature of the interest and the remit of the verderers. That in a sense goes to the heart of the point that I was developing, that possibly the remit of the verderers is too narrowly drawn. Perhaps they are not adequate as guardians of the full development and the full protection of the New Forest. Perhaps some other kind of constitutional mechanism — a national parks authority readily suggests itself as an obvious substitute — is required.

The fact is that hitherto we have not chosen that course. Hitherto we have chosen to rely on the verderers for the protection of the New Forest. We cannot now breach those powers without taking on board the need to take the 1949 Act, dust it down and consider what we are going to replace it with. There is no point in pretending that, once we pass this Bill, if we choose to do so tonight, the powers of the verderers will somehow remain intact; that tonight we shall suspend them for the purposes of this Bill, but tomorrow we shall replace them for any future development.

We cannot pretend that in passing this Bill we are not creating a precedent. One may wish to defend the precedent, but one cannot duck the fact that this would be a precedent. There are, as the hon. Member for New Forest said, other organisations, some of them commercial, which are watching the progress of this Bill and might be quite likely to attempt to follow this precedent. I made this point to the representative of Dyson Bell, who kindly called for a civilised exchange about this Bill last week. He demurred, and I then asked him if this meant that Dyson Bell would decline to act for any other promoter who chose to come before us to take advantage of this precedent. This was greeted with a very eloquent silence. The truth, of course, as we all know, is that if we create this precedent other people will choose to take advantage of it. They will find people who are willing to put forward their Bill and they will certainly find a willing parliamentary agent.

In conclusion, my attitude to the Bill turns on the primacy I attach to preserving the integrity of the forest. I believe that that consideration should also be the most important consideration for the House.

Here I have to say that I found the report of the Lords Select Committee most disappointing — indeed, even disturbing. The report admitted that the outer route would inevitably affect the open forest. It then went on to say that the Committee had reached its decision on the basis of what it regarded as being the most important evidence — namely, the immediate environmental benefits of route 5A to the village of Lyndhurst.

That observation and conclusion is perfectly clear. The Lords Committee chose, quite deliberately and openly, to subordinate the interests of the forest to the environmental advantage of the village. That is the complete reverse of the conclusion of the inquiry into the local plan, which concluded that the environmental advantage to the village of the bypass was incidental, and that the first consideration should be the protection of the forest. That, of course, was a bald line inspector; it was a bald line, but I believe that it was the right line.

The New Forest is a unique asset. If we chip away at it, we shall never be able to recreate it, any more than we would be capable of rebuilding those mediaeval cathedrals that date from the same time. The mass use of the motor car dates from only the last half-century. That is a small interval in the history of the New Forest, which was there centuries before the motor car.

Our first duty should be to make sure that the New Forest is still there when the era of the internal combustion engine has faded, and that when that time comes the heath, the woodlands, the forest, will survive to give future generations the same joy in the open freedom of the forest, the same wonder at the beauty and the balance of the natural landscape. I believe that we would be failing in that duty if we allowed this Bill a Second Reading tonight.

9.4 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): It may be helpful if, at this point, I intervene briefly to restate the Government's view on the Bill. I am repeating what was said in another place.

It is traditional on a private Bill that the Government take a neutral stance. It is for the promoters to persuade Parliament that the powers they are seeking are necessary and justified. The Government do not wish to take sides on this issue.

Controversy has reigned for more than 50 years on the construction of a bypass for Lyndhurst. The need for a bypass is generally accepted. The route it should take has been the subject of considerable argument over many years. Alternative bypass routes have been canvassed. There have been two public inquiries and several other local consultations.

The route now adopted, known as route 5A for which parliamentary authority is sought by Hampshire council in the Bill, is a compromise. It is the subject of controversy.

It is right that any encroachment on the forest of the kind being debated this evening should be carefully considered. The Select Committee in the other place considered all the issues and allowed the Bill, endorsing route 5A, to proceed. In passing the Bill, that House accepted its Select Committee's view.

The Government appreciate the strong feelings held by the promoters, the residents of Lyndhurst and those hon. Members who petitioned against the Bill about the proposed route 5A. There is detailed argument to be heard.

9.5 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I shall follow the Minister by making it quite clear from the Front Bench where the Opposition stand. The Opposition are not constrained to remain neutral.

I should like to congratulate the hon. Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson) on two things. Last week, for the first time since I was too young to remember, I had the pleasure of being in the New Forest. I thought that it was important to see Lyndhurst, and indeed the New Forest. The hon. Gentleman's constituency is among the most beautiful in the country. I also congratulate him on his powerful speech this evening, which went a considerable way towards resolving some of my doubts about the Bill.

The issue is not simple. Inevitably there are competing and conflicting demands between the different interest groups. My hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) asked whether it was appropriate for hon. Members who do not live in the New Forest to take part in the debate. The debate has come to Parliament and it would be irresponsible for hon. Members who do not live in the New Forest to remain silent. However, I must point out that a relatively select and limited number of hon. Members are listening and taking part in the debate tonight. I shall embellish that point later. It is a problem of parliamentary procedure.

The Bill is of general and national interest. It is a question of how the national interest is to remain secure. While hon. Members are entitled to talk about the needs of local communities in 1988, 1992, or 1995, there is a need to maintain the New Forest and to keep it intact, not only for five or 10 years, but for generations that lie ahead. Tonight we are entrusted with a difficult balance.

My natural reaction would be that the New Forest should be maintained as intact as possible. That is a basic reflex response, but I recognise that the community of Lyndhurst has specific traffic problems. The difficulty of the debate centres around how to resolve those problems and, if it is possible, to satisfy all interest groups. It is impossible to find a definitive solution that would resolve all those issues. It would be churlish to say that the question is who should be disadvantaged in the most convenient way. The whole process of bringing a private Bill to Parliament inevitably creates a precedent.

It would be foolish for anyone to argue that no precedent would be created. The New Forest Act 1949 dictates the future of the New Forest. If the private Bill were to deviate from that legislation, it would create a precedent and allow potential developers to look with considerable interest at the area. For those reasons, I am encouraged in my initial reaction.

Mr. Mans: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that private Bills have sought to fence roads under the auspices of the New Forest Act 1949, so precedents are occurring all the time? This precedent should not concern hon. Members, because it does not relate to commercial interests.

Mr. Lloyd: I cannot accept that as a logical position, because the former Bills were confined to fencing roads. In this case we are talking about a different operation. We are talking not simply about fencing existing land but about the creation of an entirely new road on land which is part of the forest. To that extent it is qualitatively different.

The argument, from which hon. Members may draw different conclusions, can be put that breaching forest land would create a precedent for developers, as it is recognised that a greedy eye has been cast on the New Forest by would-be developers of oil and gas deposits. No doubt Parliament would consider whether such a Bill should be accepted, but if we are to set a precedent we must consider whether the matter is sufficiently special to warrant it.

I was interested in the view of the hon. Member for New Forest on how the process could have worked. There is a fundamental breach in the argument put forward in favour of the Bill. If an alternative exists—I have heard nothing to persuade me that that is not the case—that damages that argument, because, if we create a precedent in the New Forest, it must be under special circumstances, and those must include there being no other possibility of achieving the same objective. If the hon. Member for New Forest is accurate in his contention, I find it difficult to accept the Bill for those reasons.

This week, another private Bill was before the House, the Dartford-Thurrock Crossing Bill, which had been before a Select Committee. I do not invite the Minister to re-run the difficulties of three nights ago. When the Select Committee had sat for a considerable period, it came to certain conclusions which were not matters of party political disagreement. There was considerable agreement on those conclusions, because there is a principle that it is not up to Select Committees to reject arguments outright, but to examine the locus standi of the petitioners. The principle gives Select Committees a limited role, and it is then up to the promoters of the Bill to accept or reject the recommendations of the Committee. On Report on the Dartford-Thurrock Crossing Bill, the recommendations of the Select Committee could have been given no significance. That is equally likely in relation to this Bill.

The argument that the most thorough examination of petitioners' cases will be in a Select Committee is at best minimal. Hon. Members are becoming increasingly suspicious of the Select Committee process. Not long ago the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill was considered by a Select Committee, a procedure which caused much consternation on both sides of the House, although there might have been some different views. Certainly the Minister thought that it was a worthwhile exercise; but he would have to feel that was the case.

The only time when I have enjoyed hearing about the spectacle of the private Bill process was when the hon. Member for New Forest described learned QCs lining the corridors of the House looking for something to do. That brought some satisfaction, as it would be perhaps the first time that members of the public struck back against the lawyers.

The private Bill procedure is not satisfactory, as it does not command the full attention of the House. Debates are not well attended and we do not see real interest from all hon. Members. At the time of the debate on the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill, the Government put pressure on Conservative Back Benchers, rightly or wrongly, to support a closure motion. The truth is that hon. Members were present that night not because they felt passionately about Felixstowe but because they felt passionately about the interests of their political party and their own role in Government, and supported the Government in forcing through the Bill.

Mr. Key: That is nonsense.

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) says that is nonsense, but for all I know he may have been one of those hon. Members who were drinking champagne that night.

Mr. Key: I am not interested in the hon. Gentleman going on for 10 minutes about the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill when many hon. Members and members of the public outside the Chamber are more interested in the Hampshire (Lyndhurst Bypass) Bill.

Mr. Lloyd: In saying that, the hon. Gentleman misses the point at issue, which is whether a Select Committee is the right way to discuss the matter. It is not a trivial point, or a matter to be cast aside. If the hon. Member for

[Mr. Lloyd]

Salisbury cared about his own region he would do it far more service by making sure that matters concerning the New Forest are adequately discussed and that cases are taken on their merits, rather than leave them to be discussed in the House, where private Bills are handled very badly. The hon. Gentleman may debate that point, but I do not think that he can deny its validity in relation to the Bill.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The point that is regularly and properly made is that here is an opportunity, if the verderers' route was considered, to hold a public inquiry to which the people of Hampshire can contribute, and it is primarily their concern. The alternative procedure is for Parliament to amend the primary legislation, which allows the House to debate the future of the New Forest as one of this country's natural assets.

Consideration of those two alternatives would be far more satisfactory than looking at just part of an issue here, where many of the people who are affected by the issue cannot take part, and when many who do participate do not understand and appreciate the full effects of the issues in any event.

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) has anticipated my thoughts. It will cause some satisfaction to the hon. Member for Salisbury that I intend to leave the private Bill process, although I insist that those remarks are relevant to whether the issue is best dealt with through a private Bill because of the way in which objections are taken.

I have listened carefully to the submission of Hampshire county council and submissions put to me by other interested parties. One of the matters that weighed heavily with me was the contention of the county council that the matter had been adequately dealt with through a public inquiry process locally. The hon. Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) referred to the public inquiry into the local plan and said that at least part of that was devoted specifically to a roads inquiry. I think that the hon. Gentleman would accept that the inquiry was not properly constituted to consider the line of route of the Lyndhurst bypass. From documents made available to me I understand that, at the time of the inquiry, the inspector considering the forest and downlands villages local plan said of the present proposed route:

"I consider Route 5A to be marginally less damaging overall than the route rejected in 1976".

Therefore, the limited inquiry that has taken place has cast a considerble doubt upon the proposed route rather than justified it. I believe that a local public inquiry is the appropriate way to proceed.

Mr. Mans: Following the inquiry, planning permission was given and the Minister concerned decided not to call in that planning permission for further public inquiry. The planning procedures were followed to the letter and it has been made clear that the route with which we are concerned was examined by a Select Committee in the other place.

Mr. Lloyd: The fact that the Minister in another place took a certain view does not necessarily bind the House or the county council. Most of us have considerable experience of Ministers getting things wrong—no doubt Ministers consider that such mistakes occur less often than we believe. However, on this occasion there is a considerable body of opinion that says that the Minister got it wrong. I will not delay the House by listing all the organisations that support that view and to which my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston referred.

Mr. Robin Cook: The Secretary of State's failure to call in the original proposal is important. However, it should be noted that the Minister in the other place, who spoke rather more fully about the subject than the Minister tonight, made it clear that the fact that the Secretary of State chose not to call in the route for public inquiry did not imply approval of that route. He neither approved nor disapproved.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Perhaps it would help if I confirmed that nothing that I have said in any way contradicts what the Minister said in another place. The reason I was rather brief is that the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) was rather lengthy.

Mr. Lloyd: I am sure that hon. Members found both those interventions informative.

I took the opportunity to visit Lyndhurst. I certainly would not claim that the dozen people to whom I spoke represented the unanimous view of the population. Certainly, some of them were strongly in favour of the road. The hon. Member for Wyre has sought to persuade me, with eloquence and vehemence, that the bypass is necessary to the community. However, other village residents have put forward the opposite view. They consider, for reasons already outlined, that it would be bad for the community and for the economy.

I am aware that a petition exists and it is claimed that it represents the views of more than half of the population, but it certainly does not represent the unanimous view of the community.

I have found it difficult to understand the traffic problems in the area. I asked local people how bad those problems were and the estimates of the worst traffic conditions varied considerably. Some people suggested that, at worst, the traffic delays lasted for 15 minutes. I find that difficult to comprehend as a major problem. I am sure that hon. Members will appreciate that I have an urban outlook and a delay of 15 minutes to cross my home city of Manchester would not be considered unreasonable. However, I accept that such delays may be a different matter in such a small community as Lyndhurst. Indeed, a 15-minute delay is not far off the estimate given by the county council and therefore it is important to take it into consideration. In fairness, I should say that another person told me that there were—at their worst—traffic delays of up to two hours, which was perhaps an extreme viewpoint. I merely report it as a matter of anecdote. It is precisely because such conflicts of opinion exist that the idea of a local inquiry into the route has considerable merit and is to be preferred to arguing anecdotally across the Chamber. It is far better that the issues should be put to a local inspector who could examine up-to-date traffic forecasts in detail.

Unfortunately, the detailed figures given by the county council are nine years old, dating from 1979. The more up-to-date figures refer only to a percentage increase, which makes it difficult to understand their validity. The right way to examine these traffic matters would be through a proper public inquiry.

People also mentioned the impact of the bypass on the village of Brockenhurst. I understand that the county council has no plans to introduce a bypass there, but some people are concerned that bringing a bypass to Lyndhurst will throw local traffic further down the road. I notice that the hon. Member for Wyre does not accept that—I raise it only because it was raised with me. It could have been adequately sorted out in the public inquiry. I am persuaded by the hon. Member for New Forest that, subject to information being made available by others, and given that the fallback of arbitration exists even now, the process could have been better handled in an alternative way. Local issues are far better dealt with locally and not in this House.

As far as my recommendation has any sway with my hon. Friends and the House in general, I say that the Bill does not have sufficient merit and is not exceptional enough to warrant a Second Reading at this stage.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): In the short time that is available to us I shall endeavour to uncover some fresh perspectives on the problem. I have no pleasure in opposing my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson), who is a close neighbour, politically and literally. I admire him greatly and have learnt much from him in the short time that I have represented Salisbury — compared with the long time that he has represented New Forest. There are always gainers and losers and if I had been the hon. Member for New Forest I might, in the circumstances, have chosen the path of my hon. Friend. He must ensure that every inch, every centimetre of the forest is protected, but I hope that he will not misunderstand me if I take a contrary view on this occasion.

Lyndhurst must be seen from a national and international perspective. There is a fundamental issue of political approach here, too. To what extent will the market come to an acceptable solution? Should we engineer a solution in human terms by placing restrictions on car ownership? Can planning solve the problem? I recall that, in the 1960s, when I was still at school, Professor Buchanan produced his Norwich planning survey, which was going to solve Norwich's problems. A few weeks ago, I was in Norwich and it took 40 minutes to get out of the station in a bus, let alone go round the city.

We must think ahead about Lyndhurst and the forest. Whatever we do, traffic will increase and so will congestion, pollution and environmental damage — the problems will only get worse if we delay.

The environmental problems that all hon. Members experience in their constituencies are encapsulated in Lyndhurst. Typically, we find that demand for access to the countryside is increasing on all sides, from local people as well as from visitors. Demands from the military for training are also increasing. Demands for new houses are great in the rural areas—particularly from young people and those who cannot afford the sort of executive houses that are the only houses that can be built when land prices are high. Demands for light industry are growing; demands for out-of-town retailing facilities—which are great and controversial—are growing; demands on road transport are growing from private road users, who are becoming increasingly prosperous, and from heavy commercial traffic. At the same time, demands for the protection of our countryside have never been greater.

All hon. Members have problems with bypasses in their constituencies. Bypasses are demanded and then the routes are fought over. I shall not be pro-bypass for my constituents in Salisbury but anti-bypass for the people of Lyndhurst.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on his bypass plans. There has never been a period in our history when there have been more plans for bypasses or more bypasses being completed. They have given much relief, particularly to the small rural communities.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that the issue is not whether there should be a bypass, but where it should go? There is no dispute that, in due time, Lyndhurst should have a bypass. The dispute is about where it should go and whether it should prejudice the entity of the New Forest.

Mr. Key: Who decides where it should go? I shall address that question later.

Most hon. Members are deeply committed to conservation. It is very unusual to find someone who is not. In my constituency, we experience enormous pressures on conservation. The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) is well aware of them and we enjoy sharing Salisbury with him. The pressure on the south of England in particular is intense.

I have problems in my constituency that make those in Lyndhurst pale into insignificance. We have problems with Stonehenge, the Army, archaeology, road works, river plunderers, city excavation, treasure troves, the river Avon, water meadows, pollution, fish farms and canoeists. At the same time, the Nature Conservancy Council maintains Parsonage down, which is one of our most precious reserves, the Forestry Commission conserves Bentley wood, and I have the headquarters of the Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas in my constituency. Yet Lyndhurst is only six miles away from the edge of my constituency.

We must face one or two facts whenever we consider these issues. First, there are those who believe that the New Forest should be a museum. As a friend of museums, I suggest that there is a revolution in museum theory and practice that believes in opening up history to the younger generation, improving access and encouraging mobility. In that regard, one has only to look at the Museum of London or the Salisbury and South Wiltshire museum to see that that is the case.

If one believes that the New Forest is not a museum but is living and evolving, and if one does not believe that our countryside and rural communities are museums that are kept for the weekend enjoyment of townsfolk, how can we condemn Lyndhurst to a future locked into the inadequacies of a road system that strangles, suffocates and poisons residents and visitors alike?

That was recognised in Government policy in the latest circular issued in January which said:

> "Concentrating on conservation without concern for the rural economy would result in the death of communities and in dormitory settlements whose inhabitants had no involvement in the evolution of their rural setting."

We must take care to balance our arguments along those lines.

The constitutional position has been well explored by other hon. Members. I shall concentrate only on one or two aspects of it. There is no doubt that we are all fighting for the New Forest and for our environment. But who are we fighting for? Where are the vested interests? Are they the villages, the verderers, the tourists, the pressure groups, the public at large or the national, European or international public interests?

When the Whips are docile, as they are tonight, we must use our judgment as well as our powers of advocacy. I have listened to the evidence that has been presented and I believe that, given the fact that the objection of the verderers is so central to the debate, it is crucial to be clear who those honourable people are and who they represent. I believe that King John would have turned in his grave and that the ghosts would have walked the Rufus Stone if they had seen the way in which the verderers were treated in 1949, the way in which their court was decimated and their influence diluted. I believe that on this occasion the verderers have been sent naked into battle.

The predecessor of my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, Colonel Crosthwaite-Eyre, said much about the court of verderers. He said that the court of verderers

"stood impartially as an interpreter as to how far the Crown prerogative should go, but far more important as a local and immediate court, to which any local resident could come and appeal if he thought that the Crown had gone too far . . . That was the situation of the verderers in the time of William the Conqueror."—[Official Report; 1 November 1949; Vol. 469, c. 218.]

The body fell into disuse from Queen Elizabeth's time until Pitt and the 1877 Act.

Who wants the bypass? The county council, the district council, the parish council, the residents association, my noble Friend Lord Congleton, who piloted the Bill through another place and who lived in the Lyndhurst area for most of his life until he became a constituent of mine, all want it. Lord Denning, Lord Montagu, Lord Boyd-Carpenter and 3,000 residents who love the forest all want the bypass.

Who opposes the bypass? It is crucial to consider the verderers among them. Lord Manners, who was appointed by the Crown, and the Countryside Commission, the Forestry Commission, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, a county councillor and five elected verderers oppose it. The verderers are elected by the commoners, who own at least 1 acre of land and get their living from the forest. Incidentally, until 1949, commoners had to own 75 acres of land or be entitled to a parliamentary vote. On paper, there are 877 commoners out of a population in the New Forest of about 140,000. None of the verderers lives in Lyndhurst. There is only one family of people who are technically real commoners and only 10 of the commoners graze beasts to support their livelihood. My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest suggested that I had my figures wrong. I can only say that I got them from the assistant solicitor of Hampshire county council and I have no reason to doubt the truth of what he told me.

Mr. David Martin: Apparently, the verderers have no salary, emolument or perk besides a fee buck and the fee doe annually, so they get little for their pains.

Mr. Key: Indeed, the situation is wholly changed. All the other cattle and ponies in the New Forest belong to owners who do not have commoners' rights but are licensed by the agister.

In their petition, the verderers accept the need for a bypass and crave leave to demonstrate that other schemes should be planned. That is an important point.

I shall now discuss the petition of the Council for the Protection of Rural England and the Ramblers Association. As a supporter of many environmental groups in my county, I was disturbed by some of the evidence presented to hon. Members on which we are supposed to base our judgment. The Council for the Protection of Rural England got its history wrong. It gave no consideration to the people of Lyndhurst and blatantly misrepresented in print the position of Hampshire county council. In its colourful and emotional leaflet the CPRE included a photograph not of the route but of an attractive woodland scene in the forest. The CPRE did not illustrate on its map the route that it advocated, which rather detracted from its argument. It claimed that the Bill avoided a public inquiry when, as we have heard, there have been two. In any case, what could be more public than a debate in Parliament? The CPRE says that it has proposed a viable alternative scheme. It has not. It does not even accept the need for a bypass in the material that it presented to the House, although I accept what the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) said about the other place.

The promoters of the Bill are not blameless. I believe that they have misled us to some extent. On page 2 of their statement they say that the petitions of the Nature Conservancy Council and the Council for the Protection of Rural England and other bodies make no acknowledgement of the need for the bypass and complain of its alleged damaging effect. That is simply not true. When listening to the views of vested interests and pressure groups outside Parliament, we must be careful to use our own judgment, on the basis of personal experience.

One could hardly imagine a more reputable body than the Countryside Commisson. In its petition it accepts the need to find a balance and says that the forest cannot be sacrosanct. That is a very realistic approach.

However, one should not put one's trust in the Countryside Commission, because when there was a planning application in an area of outstanding natural beauty in my constituency, which involved the building of a factory farm and piggery, the Countryside Commission refused to oppose the planning application and to come to the aid of myself, the village and the district council. However, the Countryside Commission was wrong and lost, and the factory farm was not built in that area of outstanding natural beauty. We should not necessarily always assume that such bodies are right.

I say again that problems can sometimes rebound. Only a quarter of a mile from the New Forest, a constituent of mine is suffering. A family has, for generations, been grazing its animals outside the forest in winter and inside the forest in summer. The Nature Conservancy Council has said that it will turn that family's patch of grazing into a site of special scientific interest and that the family must stop using it for grazing land because it is not "according to nature". I suggest that that is absolute nonsense and that it is double standards in the Nature Conservancy Council.

I make those long points because I believe that we must be careful about listening to outside interests. We must rely on our judgment in such affairs. Environmental pressure groups will proliferate enormously. Sometimes they do not appear to know who their friends are or they think that we are extremely naive. In coming years we must resist the temptation of seeing our role as advocates of particular pressure groups. If we do that, Parliament's role in deciding such issues will be enhanced. Far from tonight's situation — we have heard Opposition Members eloquently describe the Chamber being half empty and few people having sufficient time to devote three weeks to Committee discussions — we could enter a new era in which the judgment of Members of Parliament would become much more important on these issues.

In coping with decisions such as the Lyndhurst question, what we need more than anything else is sound judgment and common sense. In that spirit, I shall vote for the Second Reading.

9.41 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The issues that arise from our debate on this Bill echo back to the past because during the previous Parliament, as the House will remember, we had debates on the Okehampton bypass. The principal issue then was whether it was right, by a Bill, to cut into a national park. The main issue that the hon. Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson), who has the principal interest in tonight's debate, has made—many subsidiary issues have been raised—is that we as a House must decide whether we want to eat into the New Forest when it is not necessary to do so. That question would be much more difficult if nobody had worked out the problem and planned an alternative bypass route.

However, even if that were the case, a procedure has been laid down. We are risking a trespass into the change of the presumptions that the legislation in the 1940s provided for specifically. It is a valid and important point because Parliament debated a Bill and enacted it specifically to safeguard one of the most important natural areas of our country and our heritage. That issue is no less important now—and arguably it is more important.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), who has just spoken, appeared to misunderstand the nature of a pressure group and of a statutory body. The Nature Conservancy Council has a duty to advise Parliament and other statutory bodies about the impact of changes in important habitat, such as the New Forest, which contains many rare species of birds such as the Dartford warbler and the hobby, which are on schedule 1; sites of special scientific interest; flowers, moths, plants and mosses, which are extremely important and delicate parts of our habitat and must be protected. As an alternative route for the bypass could be considered, the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission are absolutely right to put forward their points of view. They are not just pressure groups; they are doing their duty and doing it well.

Mr. Hughes: I am not a Hampshire Member. I have two interests. I have often been to the New Forest. I have relatives there and I have stayed there as a child and subsequently. I have good friends in Brockenhurst and Lyndhurst. I am a summer visitor, but I also have a concern, like anybody in this country, for our environment, and in that context the New Forest is particularly important. It is not for hon. Members but for those who are accountable to Parliament to alert us to what is at stake, and they have made it their particular responsibility to tell the House and the country that we are taking too great a risk if we have a bypass on this route around this small village in the New Forest. The loss would be too great and the bypass should be resisted.

Mr. Mans: I am glad to hear about the hon. Gentleman's interest in the New Forest, but did he take the opportunity that was open to all hon. Members to visit the New Forest two weeks ago to see for himself exactly what the different routes would do to the environment and village?

Mr. Hughes: On that day I was not available. I have been down within the past three weeks and I was down before Christmas. I have been there sufficiently often to be aware of the issues. I also have friends who are there all the time, to whom I have talked. Clearly, I do not have the hon. Gentleman's historic interest as a locally elected councillor in that area. But since he makes a potential complaint against people such as me, who do not pretend to speak as Hampshire men, I must make a complaint in turn.

The 1949 legislation established a system which, although antiquated, has historic traditions. The Court of Verderers was set up to allow people to make representations to it under a constitutional procedure. One can validly criticise the chief protagonists—I include the hon. Gentleman and his family, who clearly argued strongly in Hampshire for the bypass — for never availing themselves of the opportunity to go to the Court of Verderers to make a presentment, the technical word for their case.

Since the 1940s, that court has clearly accepted arguments for roads in the area and other potential environmental disadvantages after such cases have been put to them. It is wrong constitutionally for people to come to the House to argue for short-circuiting that procedure when they have not properly tested the one that has been shown to work.

Somebody reading or listening to this debate might think that the Court of Verderers was 300 or 400 years old, but the court, with its old name and tradition, was reconstituted in 1949 and given a role that was acceptable at a time when the country was legislating for national parks and the protection of the environment. Parliament did that conscientiously. It has never been challenged since.

In a recent letter to the newspapers, the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) accepted that we should not bypass the proper public inquiry. Writing in relation to the Falmouth estuary a few weeks ago he said:

> "Just to give some background, this private bill would have the effect of short-circuiting the normal planning process by way of public inquiry. Objectors are effectively deprived of making their voices heard".

The same point of what is the right procedure arises. The hon. Gentleman was speaking perfectly properly as a Hampshire Member.

That is a perfectly proper point and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that it is right that, when a constitutional procedure is laid down and so far not been found wanting, it should be tested. The hon. Gentleman, and those sharing his views on the issue—his father on the county council and others—should have gone to the Court of Verderers and made their case. If that had not succeeded, their case would have had some credibility. It is notable that the county council representative on that court, elected to represent the people of Hampshire, opposes the Bill. There is an important environmental point. There is also an important procedural point. We should use the accepted procedure which clearly has worked.

Mr. Hill: The hon. Gentleman is giving a picture of the verderers' court as an amiable group to which the odd person in Lyndhurst goes to have a chat and put a case. The matter has been discussed for the past 12 years. I have said, in letters to people who have written to me, that the best solution would be to knock together the heads of people in Hampshire county council and the verderers' court so that they come up with a solution, rather than having to bring a private Bill to the House. The Bill is before the House tonight because those people have not been able to get it together. There has been no movement and this is the last possible way for the county council to obtain a decision on the bypass.

Mr. Hughes: I understand that point, but the hon. Gentleman is well aware of the recent events that have led to the presentation of the Bill. Only about a month ago, it appeared that the county council was going to vote the other way. The chief executive, the officers and their parliamentary agent all said that this was not the appropriate way because it would be a long drawn-out procedure, unlikely to achieve the reasonable solution that the hon. Gentleman would have preferred.

I understand why any community may want a bypass, but I am advised that the earliest date by which the bypass could be built, even if the Bill were passed, is 1992. There is no evidence that it would take longer by the other route, given that a public inquiry is immediately available. We must seek to redress the grievance of those people who suffer as a result of the traffic problems in Lyndhurst and the New Forest.

However, the evidence is not sufficiently persuasive that this route is the better route and it was marginal whether the county council would take that route, albeit out of frustration and mystification, rather than through any belief that it was the right route.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: The hon. Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson) made a firm promise earlier that he was willing to act as an honest broker to bring the parties together. That would be a far better way rather than to try and push through the Bill, in view of the hon. Gentleman's opposition to it.

Mr. Hughes: That is quite right. We all try to respect each other's constitutional position. The hon. Member for New Forest is in an ideal position to do that. He has the constitutional responsibility in this place for that part of our country.

If we take the conventional route, laid down by parliamentary statute, the verderers' court can enable things to happen. That has been shown by, for example, the widening of the A31 and by the fact that it has allowed 1,000 acres of development in the New Forest.

Mr. Mans: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: I shall give way in a moment.

In 1986, the verderers' court opposed an attempt to put a gas pipeline under the forest, but it then produced a better solution and the pipeline was still laid. The court appears to have done a sensible job. One of the things that troubles us all is that a body that works well is never criticised until somebody finds that it does not work to his advantage. Then it is thought to be unsuitable and outdated. When tested, the verderers have not been found wanting, whatever people may have presumed in the past.

Mr. Mans: The hon. Gentleman makes a point about the A31 dual carriageway. Does he agree that that road was built not by using the New Forest Act 1949 but by using a new public act, the New Forest Act 1964? Therefore, no verderers were involved. The verderers did not put forward any views on that under their statutory duty in the 1949 Act.

Mr. Hughes: I accept that there was a different procedure. I do not accept that the verderers had no role to play because I think that they still have the general role of guardianship of the New Forest. Therefore, they have a locus. But I accept that there was a technical and statutory difference.

On the timetable point, I understand that a public inquiry could be held. I am happy to be challenged if I am wrong about this, but I want to put it on the record. It is important that we do not allow ourselves to be bamboozled by wrong information. A public inquiry could test the information. I understand that a public inquiry could be held under the Highways Act 1980 to confirm classified road and side road orders. I understand that such orders would have been necessary but for the Bill and that Hampshire county council could revoke its planning permission, as it is allowed to do in exceptional circumstances, under section 45 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971. Lastly, the Secretary of State could call in the application for planning permission under section 35 of the Town and Country Planning Act and precipitate an earlier decision. So I hope there is no strong argument that cannot be rebutted that the normal procedure could produce a solution as quickly as the procedure that the promoters of the Bill wish for in this place.

The national environmental issue is important. The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) has addressed the alternative route. We have the procedural issues. We have to address also our duty as a House. I am conscious that the present allocation of time is limited. I have no idea whether the promoter will allow us to have further time. I ask him to do so. I do not wish to keep Hampshire Members from speaking. Clearly, their voice should be heard. But we have to ask ourselves what our role is. It seems to me that it is to test whether as individual Members, not whipped by party, we believe that it is right that we should take to ourselves this process which, as the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) and others have pointed out, we do not carry out with great conviction, when alternatives are readily available with which the people of Hampshire would be just as happy.

Mr. Hardy: Do we not have another responsibility? The Government have said that they are neutral on the issue. So that they can maintain a feeble and suspect form of neutrality, they have disregarded the fact that the public agencies which are charged with the duty of giving advice to the Government and Parliament are ignored.

Mr. Hughes: That is true. The hon. Gentleman, whose commitment to the environment is well known, reminds us that the Countryside Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council have the responsibility to make sure that Parliament is alerted to matters of concern. The question has been raised whether some of the information produced in the context of the debate is accurate. That is exactly the sort of argument that should be tested at a public inquiry. If the Nature Conservancy Council or the Countryside Commission is not accurately representing a view, it is the inspector's duty to check on that. No doubt all of us have taken part in public inquiries——

Mr. Mans rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question accordingly agreed to.
Bill read a Second time and committed.

Mr. Hardy: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Just before 10 o'clock you may have heard me say that the Government were exhibiting a very strange form of neutrality. The Minister assured the House that the Government were distinctly neutral with regard to the Hampshire (Lyndhurst Bypass) Bill. I noticed that the Secretary of State for the Environment, the Minister to whom the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission report — those bodies are appointed by him—disregarded their advice and voted in the Aye Lobby with several other Ministers. It seems that vote has not followed voice.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member knows full well that the way in which hon. Members and Ministers vote in the House has nothing whatsoever to do with the Chair.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Will you give the House a ruling tonight? I did not know that it was customary for an hon. Member not representing a particular constituency to move a private Bill relating to a constituency other than his own. Tonight that has happened. I wonder whether it will be in order from now on for any hon. Member to move a private Bill relating to any other hon. Member's constituency, regardless of what his or her constituency interests may be.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is not for me to give a ruling on the matter, but I can tell the hon. Member that that is a frequent occurrence in the House.

Criminal Injuries (Compensation) (Northern Ireland)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That the draft Criminal Injuries (Compensation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 1st February, be approved.—[Mr. Stanley.]

10.24 pm

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): May I say, after what has gone on earlier today, that on this occasion I am giving two and a half cheers to the Government.

The Opposition welcome the fact that the Government, through the order, have taken the opportunity to update the provisions for the compensation of victims of criminal injury.

We share the commitment expressed by the Secretary of State to the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights about the provision of proper compensation to victims, and to support schemes that provide advice, assistance and emotional support to those who have suffered. The Secretary of State's reported promise to provide public funds in Northern Ireland to stimulate the development of victim support schemes is to be welcomed.

On the specific changes to the 1977 order, we are pleased to see several changes, including the fact that the Government intend to provide for a standard bereavement award of £3,500 under articles 3(3) and 9(5). We welcome the extension of the definition of "relative" in article 2 to include common law spouses. We welcome, too, the provision in article 5(2) to allow compensation in certain circumstances to the victims of domestic violence. Society has for far too long looked with indifference on domestic violence generally. Just as we are of the view that those who assault should be prosecuted, whether it happens outside or inside the home, so it follows that victims of assault should receive compensation, whether the assaults occur inside or outside the home.

We support the changes that will result in more equal treatment of the widows and widowers. The provision under article 9 of compensation of up to £5,000 for rape victims who, as a result, give birth to a child is welcome. However, there are some changes in the order with which we are far from happy and for which we seek further explanation.

In some ways this may be regarded as a mean-minded piece of legislation that seems to have been designed to minimise the cost to the Exchequer of the compensation of victims of crime. While the maxima for discretionary payments to a spouse or a child under article 10(3) remain at the levels set out in the 1977 order—£10,000 and £1,000 respectively—the limit on claims under article 5(12) has been raised from £250 to £400. In addition, the proportion of income regarded as having been devoted to personal expenditure by a deceased victim is arbitrarily increased in article 7(3) from 20 per cent. to 25 per cent. of total income. Are we to assume, therefore, that the Government believe that breadwinners have become more selfish than they used to be and now spend more of their earnings down at the pub, the racecourse or playing canasta and that, somehow or other, they have increased their personal expenditure by 5 per cent. in the past 11 years?

The net effect of the provisions will be a reduction, in real terms, of the level of compensation available to victims and, in many cases, to the dependants to an extent greater than the £3,500 provided in the bereavement grant. As well as reducing the level of payments in that way the Government propose to exclude from compensation a number of classes of victims in what may well be, in practice, an arbitrary and unfair fashion.

Under article 5(15) police officers injured while attempting to arrest suspects and members of the public injured while performing their duty to assist the police will be excluded from compensation unless the risk they have taken is judged by the Secretary of State to have been an exceptional one. That provision would seem stupid anywhere, but in the context of Northern Ireland it smacks of lunacy.

Why on earth are the Government seeking to discourage people from assisting in the apprehension of suspects? If the argument is that other forms of compensation may apply, at least in the case of police officers, why does the legislation not simply require that they be taken into account when assessing the level of compensation? The order, having punished people for doing their duty, then provides in article 6(1) for the potential recipient's "character and way of life" to be taken into account in assessing whether and what amount of compensation should be paid.

If a hit-and-run driver breaks the legs of a pedestrian, and that pedestrian is a Minister of State, will he receive more than his PPS in similar circumstances? Will that mean that a secretary will receive more compensation than a tramp in the street? Should differences in lifestyle affect the decision that is made? Are payments to be based on moral judgments rather than objective criteria, such as the nature of the injury and the pain and suffering caused?

Article 5(9) provides that no compensation shall be paid to any person who has, at any time, been a member of an unlawful association or engaged in acts of terrorism. Those who, in common with us, abhor all acts of violence in Northern Ireland may feel that there is justice in denying compensation to those who mete out death and destruction when they themselves become its victims. I do not expect anyone to disagree with that general proposition. However, what happens to a man or woman who was dragged into trouble some 15 years ago when feelings were first aroused? If someone was convicted in 1971 of membership of Saor Eire, but has nothing further to do with it—that organisation no longer exists—and, as a family man aged 34, is killed by a mugger on the streets of Belfast, will his wife and children be denied compensation? The same could be said of someone who was a young member of the Red Hand commandos.

What about the statute of limitations? In such cases, should relatives have to rely on the whim of the Secretary of State's discretion, exercised under article 10(2)? We have further reservations about article 6(7) that provides for deductions for time spent in hospital, and article 5(12) which deals with mental impairment. In addition, we note the detailed and careful comments of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights regarding the legislation. We endorse many of the points that it has made, including its objection to the unequal treatment, in relation to appeals, of appellants and the Secretary of State.

We note that on some issues, the Government have made changes in line with the commission's comments, but on many others they have not done so. We would welcome confirmation that the Secretary of State does intend that the statistical information on the operation of the order will be made available later this year.

I have already made it clear that we have some reservations about the detail of the order. As we welcome the updating of the legislation that it offers and part of the broadening of its scope that it contains, we shall not divide the House on it, and I understand that my colleagues in the Social Democratic and Labour party accept the main points that I have made and will not seek to detain the House by making further comments.

10.30 pm

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): The explanatory notes on page 27 of the order tell us that "The principal amendments are . . . to restrict the cases in which compensation is awarded for nervous shock".

Article 5(2)(b) states:

"no person who is responsible for causing the injury will benefit from the compensation if it is paid."

Will the Minister clarify for us the matter of compensation that is paid to a family for nervous shock when it is found that the father of the home was a willing participant in an act of terrorism?

Take, for example, a family which claims that it had been held at gunpoint. The father claims that IRA bombers came to him—a security man—and told him that they were holding his family at gunpoint, so that he would have to admit them with their bomb to carry out their wilful destruction and murder. Under the order, will the Government pay compensation for nervous shock to that family, if it is discovered that the father was part of the original plan to commit murder and bring destruction to other families, the UDR, members of the security forces, or innocent civilians?

I have been informed of a serious case in which a person claimed to have been forced to admit IRA bombers to Castlecourt in Belfast. He alleged that his family was held at gunpoint at Turf Lodge. A short time ago he was tried, and acquitted on a technicality, for the La Mon murders. It would be a disgrace if a security man for the city of Belfast was suspected of having—indeed known to have —connections with IRA terrorism, and his family could get compensation from Her Majesty's Government and run laughing all the way to the bank.

I hope that the Minister will look into the murder of two UDR men last night. The person in question was from Turf Lodge and was the man who was tried and acquitted on a technicality for the brutal murders of La Mon. He is called Brophy. Will the Minister look into this information, and confirm or deny its truth?

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. John Stanley): I want to answer some of the points made by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara). I shall write to him about those that I did not pick up quickly enough.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the importance of victim support schemes. I entirely endorse that sentiment. We are conscious of the needs of victims—particularly of elderly victims, whose needs are not wholly met by financial compensation and who need other forms of support. They need practical support in the home, and moral support at what is often a traumatic time.

I have been much impressed by the victim support work that is being done in the Province, but I also know that it lags somewhat behind the development of such schemes in England and Wales. We are in the process of rectifying that. I have already announced an additional allocation of £47,000 for grants to local schemes in Northern Ireland in the coming financial year. That brings the total for such provision to £70,000. That is a substantial percentage uplift and I am confident that the significant increase in funding will produce a material boost to victim support scheme activity in the Province. It is somewhat overdue, and I am sure the House will be glad to know that it is in hand.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North referred to the decisions that we have made in relation to discretionary payments. In article 10 of the order we have made some small but important changes in the provisions for making discretionary payments to a widow and her children. We have removed an anomaly that prevented a discretionary payment being made to a widower. We have increased the discretionary payment limit for a child from £1,000 to £1,300 to keep it broadly in line with inflation. Although no change has been made in the adult limit, we have ensured—this is the important point for the hon. Gentleman — by the introduction of a bereavement award of £3,500, that the total sum paid to a widow or widower as an expression of public sympathy has been restored, in real terms, to the value of the adult discretionary limit when it was last raised in 1982.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the level of personal upkeep deduction. I am glad to tell him that the original proposal—the one that he mentioned in his speech—is one that, subsequently, we have decided not to pursue. Article 7(3) provides that where the victim has died, one fifth of his income shall be assumed to have been spent on his personal upkeep and will be deducted when calculating compensation. It had been proposed to increase that deduction to one quarter, but following representations, particularly from the Police Federation, we decided to retain the current deduction figure at one fifth.

As to accidental injuries, the hon. Gentleman was right to refer to article 5(15), which eliminates from the scheme accidental injury sustained in the course of law enforcement unless the applicant can show that when the injury occurred he was taking a risk that was, for him, exceptional.

Accidental injuries do not normally form part of a criminal injuries compensation scheme, but the 1977 order provides for compensation to be paid for injuries accidentally sustained when trying to uphold the law. Over recent years, however, case law has extended the interpretation of this provision so that now even a tenuous link between the injury and the act of arresting a criminal is enough to establish an entitlement to compensation. This new exceptional risk requirement had been a feature of the Great Britain scheme since 1979, when for the same reason it had become necessary to restore the original intention of the scheme. Although it is true that the restriction will mostly affect police officers, the number of such cases will undoubtedly be comparatively few, and those officers will be no worse off financiallly than any other policeman injured during the normal course of duty. In addition, as the hon. Gentleman has said, there are other benefits to which a police officer may be entitled, such as paid sick leave and industrial injuries benefit, and he can take civil action if necessary if another party has been negligent. In an extreme case, when an officer has had to retire early, there are the enhanced pension entitlements and gratuity entitlements which can be paid by the police authority.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North asked whether the introduction of the exceptional risk provision might deter ordinary citizens from helping the police to deal with a crime that they see being committed. We do not consider that that will be the case. The relevant provision of article 5(15) refers to a risk that was exceptional for a person to take at the time of his injury. Helping the police to arrest a criminal or to prevent a crime would not be a normal activity for a member of the public. In those circumstances, the risk taken would be regarded as exceptional in probably all cases, and compensation would be paid.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the question of better statistical information in relation to the operation of this order. That is a matter on which I have focused. I think that there is a requirement for improved statistical information. That will be much aided when we have additional computer facilities, which will be made available to the Department. I share the hon. Gentleman's wish for improved statistical reporting on the operation of the criminal compensation scheme. We shall try to make progress with that as soon as the necessary computerisation of the records permits.

In answer to the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea), paragraph 12 of article 5 makes two amendments to the provisions governing compensation for mental impairment. The first requires the injury to be a serious and disabling mental disorder. The medical reports will indicate whether an injury falls into that category and the courts will, in due course, define in case law the forms of mental impairment that will qualify for compensation. I stress that the 1977 order sought to achieve the same effect by imposing a minimum threshold of £1,000 for mental impairment. In practice, that measure alone did not stop compensation being awarded for relatively minor or transient psychiatric conditions. In this order, we seek to restore the original intention of the previous legislation. I assure the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster that I shall examine the case to which he referred and I shall write to him on how the provisions in this order will affect that case.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): At Question Time, the Prime Minister told me that there would be an investigation into the great tragedy in the centre of Belfast. Will the Minister ensure that the people making the inquiries inquire into the case described by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea) because there is serious concern in Belfast that the security gates involved in the incident were manned by a person of Mr. Brophy's character and pedigree?

Mr. Stanley: I have noted what the hon. Gentleman said and I shall take account of his comments.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Criminal Injuries (Compensation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 1st February, be approved.

PETITION

National Health Service

10.42 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I seek leave to present a petition from patients, relatives, health care workers and friends of Guy's hospital in my constituency of Southwark and Bermondsey. The petition was brought here by nurses representing all the nurses' unions: the Royal College of Nursing — in a slightly different category—the Confederation of Health Service Employees and the National Union of Public Employees. The 1,250 signatures have been collected over the past week. The petition is aimed at influencing the Government to be more supportive of the Health Service at this time of crisis. It ends with this prayer, which those who signed it feel strongly should be taken into account by the Government in the coming days and weeks:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House will do everything in its power to urge the Government to show its support for the proper provision of health care in this country by taking action to maintain the standard of provision of service by and to improve the level of staffing in the National Health Service.

I hope that that will meet with a welcoming response from Ministers and that the concern expressed by my petitioners and many like them will be met by the Government sooner rather than later.

To lie upon the Table.

Government Data Network

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

10.43 pm

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise the question of the Government data network. I begin by declaring an interest, as a consultant to the Electronic Engineering Association. It was through my work with that body that I became aware of the existence of the project, although I should add that I have no connection with any of the companies bidding for the contract. Indeed, I am sure that the EEA is strictly neutral and simply takes a benevolent interest in the project as a whole.

Having become aware of the project, I was surprised to find that the reaction to it in certain parts of the House and the media was rather negative. When I understood the concept, it struck me as having exciting rather than frightening potential. It also appeared to be an example of how a Government decision could be directly beneficial to British industry.

I take this opportunity to look at the matter in a more positive light. Obviously, I should like to examine with my right hon. Friend the Minister the doubts that have been expressed and to probe the Government's commitment to the project.

I had better confess that I am not a technical expert, far less a computer wizard. I can only try to explain in lay language what I understand the Government's data network to be — that is, a new and advanced communications medium. I understand that one should try to imagine a system of pipework, perhaps reminiscent of some examples of modern architecture, through which information invisibly flows.

Secondly, it is a medium that several Government Departments can share. I understand that the initial thinking is that four Departments would be involved— the Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise, the Home Office and the Department of Health and Social Security. But the network would have the potential for others to be incorporated in due course.

The third feature of the GDN is that it would be supplied and serviced by an independent contractor. Discussion and examination of the project has advanced to the point where there are three contenders. In no particular order, they are the Computer Sciences Company working with British Telecom, Racal-Scicon Ltd. and Cable and Wireless working with ICL.

In simple broad terms, that is what GDN is all about. It is not somehow the apparatus of a police state, of which we should beware. It is plainly and simply an up-to-date means of conveying information. Nor is it an arrangement that poses an inherently greater threat to privacy, about which, naturally, we should have some regard. It is just as easy to pass a manilla file of information at the moment, and no greater ease is provided by going for a sophisticated electronic network of this kind.

There are a number of important advantages in the Government contemplating this step. The first is that the GDN implies a large network with a considerable capacity. It could probably support, in the early stages, as many as 100,000 terminals. Such an installation would enable the Government to cater for their communications needs for some long way ahead.

By the very nature of things, demand will inevitably rise. The GDN will give the Government the basics of a system capable of almost limitless expansion and with considerable built-in versatility. In the future, one simple connection point could serve all the communications needs of voice, computers, telex, facsimile machines and video conferencing. All the things which today require separate and therefore more costly and less flexible circuits will be linked to just one all-purpose communications medium.

The second advantage of GDN is adaptability. The Government have already made a commitment to an international standard known as open systems interconnection, which offers the means of connecting a whole host of information technology equipment from different suppliers on to one single communications system. Therefore, GDN offers a unique opportunity to put this commitment into action.

Thirdly, GDN offers the Government the prospect of considerable cost savings. The Government would be avoiding a huge capital outlay by utilising private sector investment in the implementation and operation of the network. They would be equipping themselves with a service which is expected to be cheaper to use.

The Government are already heavily involved in using publicly available services for transfer of information. My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General will probably be able to confirm that the costs to Government have been rising remorselessly as the volume of transactions has increased. It is probably difficult for an exact cost figure to be estimated at the present time, but I noticed that a figure of £300 million over 10 years was mentioned in a discussion on the "World at One" programme on BBC Radio 4 on Monday.

It is not really fair to apply that figure to the Government data network. I believe that the figure originates from a guesstimate by the Treasury's Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency of what it might cost the four Departments that could be linked in a GDN, if they were to go about making their own individual provision. The essential point to remember in trying to understand the scale of cost is that the Government would be procuring a service rather than a system.

The fourth advantage for the Government to proceed down that road is that there would be a saving in the problem of attracting skilled personnel into the Government service. The Government service would find it difficult to compete on salary scales with the private sector. The approach of a privately implemented GDN overcomes the significant skill shortage in Government, especially in telecommunications design and network management. Equally, I understand that the adoption of a GDN would not pose any significant threat to existing jobs in the Government service.

Fifthly, there is a positive attraction to the Government in having private sector input. A major advantage, therefore, would be the fulfilment of one of the Government's prime objectives — to encourage private sector investment in public service. There would also be a competitive element, and not only now when the project is at the tendering stage; if it comes into being, there would still be a competitive element in operation because Government Departments would not be forced to use the service, if it did not yield a cost advantage over already publicly available alternatives.

A less direct but none the less important benefit to flow from the Government's adoption of a GDN is that it would give a tremendous boost to the information technology industry in this country. We have some very good companies which would claim to have a leading edge in technology at the present time. We have some fine technical minds working in the information technology industry in this country, and it would be a great opportunity to exploit that fact at the present time. Therefore, it would be a significant uplift to the industry if the project were to go ahead.

Allied to that would be the importance for export potential. I am given to understand that there is vast export potential for such technology. If the Government were to show their confidence in the system, that would be a demonstration to the rest of the world that Britain can make innovative use of advanced technology and much good could flow from that.

Finally, in a more prosaic manner, it could be shown that the GDN would allow an all-round improved service. It means quicker access to information for those who operate the systems and are entitled to that information. If hon. Members took up a constituency case with the Department of Health and Social Security, they would not be told that there was a delay because the file would not be found as it travels between Newcastle upon Tyne or Blackpool and the Department in London. Such information could be retrieved much more quickly. Perhaps it is not too much to hope that the system would evolve to become even more customer-friendly by providing a better service in the delivery of benefits to members of the public.

I referred to the fact that disadvantages have been perceived by some people in their examination of the project. There is a worry that what it really means is the transfer of data between Departments. This seems to be an abiding fear of the National Council for Civil Liberties. As I understand it, the information of each Department involved in the GDN would travel separately in the system, with electronic protection built in. I believe that the jargon is that each Department would be a closed user group. Nevertheless, it is inevitable that there should be worries about privacy. I hope that my hon. Friend can offer assurances about the relationship of the Data Protection Act 1984 to GDN and also say whether the Data Protection Registrar is satisfied that the GDN creates no new loopholes.

As I have already mentioned, if there is a deliberate intention in some part of the Government service to transfer information, almost no method of data storage and transfer is proof against it. But taking information out of GDN in an unauthorised manner or passing a document would arguably be more difficult than anything else one could think of. Banks use data communication systems, and they have great regard for privacy.

Security is the allied problem. It raises the wider question of whether people outside the Government service could tap into information. I believe that that risk can be countered by messages being scrambled within the system. However, I imagine that security forms a major part of the specification that the Government would insist that tenderers should meet before taking the project further.

Then there is the question of a strike threat to the system. Again, I understand that, once the network has been created, it is difficult to pull the plug, so to speak. In any case, as the network does not hold information but is a means of transferring it, there would still be other ways of communication if for any reason something went wrong with the GDN.

Looking at the balance of advantages and disadvantages, I believe that the Government should go ahead with the GDN when they are satisfied that adequate safeguards are in place. Generally speaking, the Government should take advantage of modern technology where they can, especially if they can back a significant portion of British industry at the same time. My impression of Government Departments over the years has been that they are often reluctant to embrace new technology and that they trail behind others in taking it on, when Government ought to be in the van, setting an example.

The GDN seems to present a golden opportunity for the Government to place their internal data communications on an advanced footing. I am encouraged by the news that invitations to tender have been issued today, I understand. I hope that my hon. Friend will confirm the Government's commitment and enthusiasm for the development of the project and promise an early decision when the tenders have been returned and examined. I believe that this is an opportunity which we should not throw away.

The Paymaster General (Mr. Peter Brooke): My hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) has done the House a service in raising the subject of the Government data network tonight, and I am grateful to him for the opportunity to discuss what I shall henceforth call the GDN. It is a major and innovative project. If it goes ahead, it will bring widespread benefits both within Government and, I believe, in the private sector.

Yet, regrettably, there has been a great deal of misunderstanding and misrepresentation of the project in the press and elsewhere. My hon. Friend is very well informed on the technical and policy aspects of the project and has given me the opportunity both to explain the project to the House and to set the record straight — a process to which he has made his own contribution.

The GDN is an exciting project, and my hon. Friend's speech was a bullish one, full of enthusiasm. I share that enthusiasm, but it is also the lot of a Treasury Minister to point out hard realities. So, before we all get carried away with euphoria, I must make it absolutely clear that at this stage the GDN is a proposal, and no more.

There is a clear need for data communications within Government, and I shall say more about this shortly. The GDN looks to be a good way of meeting this need. We now know that it is a technically feasible route. The four Departments—Customs and Excise, the Department of Health and Social Security, the Home Office and the Inland Revenue — and the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency have recently signed memoranda of agreement with the three potential suppliers, identified by my hon. Friend: Computer Sciences Company with British Telecom, Cable and Wireless with International Computers Ltd. and Racal-Scicon Ltd. This is basically an agreement that each supplier's offering meets at least the minimum requirements set out by the Government.

But the acid test is financial. The Government have clearly stated that the final decision on whether the GDN goes ahead will be made on the basis of whether if offers better value for money, over the life of the project, than the alternatives. As my hon. Friend said, invitations have been issued to the three potential suppliers to tender for the GDN. All are well aware that if they are to succeed they must produce bids which are keenly priced, and which take full advantage of the growth potential of the GDN. They are also quite clear about the risks involved in bidding for a project that has yet to be approved. It is now up to them to ensure that the GDN moves from being an attractive technical proposition to being a commercial reality.

Why do we need a GDN at all? To answer that question we need to look at what the future holds. Information technology is now being used to support a much wider range of tasks, and that will increase in the future. In 1987, the number of terminals in Departments was about 65,000. Their plans indicate a figure of 155,000 by 1992, with a likely growth to 240,000 by 1995. By the turn of the century, possibly 350,000 terminals could be in use on desks in Government Departments. This huge and sustained investment is directed to one purpose: improving the quality and efficiency of Government business.

However, effective data communication is an essential part of achieving this progress. It provides the bridge between geographically dispersed offices—for example, in the Inland Revenue—and central processing sites. It also provides the means of communicating between the many different computer systems within each Department. Often, to do a job effectively, an individual will require access to data from a variety of different systems within the Department. Data communication makes it possible for that individual to access those systems from a single terminal on his or her desk, rather than having to peregrinate using a multitude of different pieces of hardware. That objective is clearly reflected in the IT strategies of Departments, particularly those, such as the DHSS, with large dispersed organisations dealing with members of the public.

A GDN is one way of providing that data communications infrastructure. Its attractions are that, first, it makes the best use of scarce technical skills within Government; secondly, it shares circuits and switches to minimise capital costs and to make the best use of capacity; and, thirdly, by placing the implementation and operation of the network within a private sector supplier, it avoids distracting Departments from their mainstream objectives to the provision of services which, though essential, are incidental to the work of Government.

The role of Government so far has been to set out their requirements, and to encourage suppliers to come forward to meet those requirements. I know that all three potential suppliers believe that the GDN makes sound business and commercial sense for Government. I think that they also have an eye to the wider commercial opportunities, both in this country and abroad, that successful implementation of a GDN would open up for them. That is why they have all invested so much time and effort in preparing to bid for the project. It is now up to them to translate the potential advantages of a GDN into bids that make convincing economic sense for Government.

I mentioned a few moments ago the advantages of sharing circuits and switches. That brings me to an area that has caused much confusion and misunderstanding—that of security and privacy. My hon. Friend rightly spent much of his time on this, and invited me to deal with it in my reply. I am happy to do so.

Let me make one point absolutely clear at the outset. The GDN project provides for the sharing of circuits and switches because this makes economic sense. It does not provide some huge computing facility for the whole of Government; and it does not provide open access by Departments to each other's data. I will return to this later.

The importance of security for GDN was recognised at an early stage of the project. Consultations took place with the relevant bodies, such as the Data Protection Registrar, and with computer security experts within Government and from the IT industry. The security policy for the network, together with the implementation plan, has been established using specialist advice.

Security of data transmitted over a network is basically concerned with three things: first, data must arrive where it is intended to arrive, and nowhere else; secondly, it must arrive as it was sent, and not be corrupted in transmission; and, thirdly, it must not be accessed in transit by unauthorised people.

No system can be completely secure; absolute security would be both prohibitively expensive and impractical to use. The security planned to be built into the GDN is designed to provide adequate protection for the applications likely to use the network, but it is not designed to handle nationally classified data.

The responsibility for determining whether security is adequate for any particular application rests with the owner of the data in the Department concerned. If a Department considers that the GDN does not offer sufficient security for a particularly sensitive application, it must consider additional security measures, such as encryption. Conversely, any Department connecting to the network must have in place adequate security measures of its own to ensure both the integrity of its own data and that it will not put at risk the data of other users. There will be clear guidelines about the level of security required of departmental systems before they are allowed to connect to the GDN. It will be a central responsibility to ensure that these are respected.

Privacy is a related issue. It is about avoiding unauthorised access to data. This can occur through unauthorised access—commonly known as hacking—into the network and the systems using it; but it can also occur as a result of access to data by authorised users of the network who are, however, not entitled to have access to those particular data. The owners of data must ensure that all access to their data is properly authorised.

As I have said, a GDN does not involve sharing of data between Departments. Nor does it affect the srrangements for controlling and authorising access laid down by statute or regulation or in the form of undertakings given to Parliament. In fact, it strengthens those arrangements in two ways.

First, it will require Departments to write down clear rules on what authorisations may be given, who is empowered to give them, and the audit trails to record access to any particular data. One recent example, which my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary announced to the House in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. Mackay) on 27 October last year, was the compilation of access rules for the Inland Revenue's new computer system to modernise and improve tax collection, known as the BROCS project.

Secondly, it will provide information on connections and traffic volumes and maintain control over who is allowed to connect to which computer. These two factors apply whether the access is to data within a Department or to that held by another Department.

I can understand fears of the "big brother" syndrome, though I do not agree with them. For this syndrome to occur, there would have to be a wilful disregard of parliamentary control by users of the network, which I, my Government colleagues and, I believe, the civil servants who work in Departments would not be prepared to tolerate for one instant. This is true whether we have a GDN or not, or indeed whether we use computers or not.

In designing the arrangements for security and privacy for the GDN project, we have drawn on the most appropriate technical expertise available in both Government and the private sector. We have also fully involved the Data Protection Registrar. I met him personally last year to discuss these issues, and have ensured that he is kept fully in touch with our plans, and is content with them. In this field, I believe that the GDN project is setting standards for other networks that we can be proud of.

As my hon. Friend said, the GDN is an exciting project. I have been very impressed by the way in which the companies involved have come forward and addressed its technical and commercial challenges. On the technical side, the proof of this has been the signing of the memoranda of agreement on 11 January. The invitations to tender went to all three consortia today, as my hon. Friend said.

The ground is now set for a good commercial competition. I look forward to the outcome, and hope that the results allow the GDN to go ahead by showing that it provides value for money in meeting the Government's data communication needs.

Finally, I thank my hon. Friend for possibly having contributed to the creation of a parliamentary record by allowing me to speak. In the past three parliamentary days, all five Treasury Ministers have spoken from the Dispatch Box without taking part in a Committee and without answering oral questions as a Department. That might possibly be a record.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at ten minutes past Eleven o'clock.

Transplant Surgery

9.34 am

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): I beg to move,

That this House welcomes recent advances in transplant technology and in the availability of transplant operations through the National Health Service; especially welcomes the Government's commitment to secure further progress in this vital area; notes that the recently published Hoffenberg Report recommends steps to improve the supply of donor organs; recognises that it is the shortage of suitable organs satisfactory for donation that limits people's opportunities to enjoy a greatly enhanced quality of life; calls for action to be taken to achieve further improvements by more effective procedures which, whilst being sensitive to the needs of patients, relatives, the bereaved, doctors and other health professionals, effectively identify potential donors and increase the availability of donor organs.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to introduce a short debate on the very important subject of transplant notification procedures. I am pleased to see my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security in her place. I know that she had to reorganise her engagements to be here for this debate, and I regard that as typical of the generous and willing spirit in which she tries to assist all constructive debate on health. I am grateful to her.

If necessary, I shall declare my interest, although it is not in any way a pecuniary interest. I am privileged to be involved in the Kidney Research Unit Foundation for Wales, which, two years ago, invited me to become one of its vice-presidents. I was proud to accept that position and I am proud of KRUF's contribution to kidney treatment in Wales.

The figures clearly show that, since 1984, there has been a marked and welcome improvement in kidney treatment in Wales—even more marked than the improvement in England. That is the result of a new approach to kidney treatment at two units in Bangor and Carmarthen in which KRUF has played a significant part. In turn, the two new units have played a significant part in the Welsh figures — so much so that the new approach, if properly followed in Wales and elsewhere, could ultimately eliminate all the shortfall in dialysis treatment, probably without the need for extra machinery or staff.

Kidney transplantation is the ideal conclusion to dialysis treatment. I contend that not enough progress is being made in this vital treatment. We are not capitalising on the tremendous fund of good will among the public. The number of transplant operations is increasing and will continue to increase, but so, too, are the waiting lists for transplant operations. We are not making the best use of our resources, by which I mean donors, potential donors and the willingness of the public to facilitate transplantation.

Why do we not capitalise on the known good will of the public? It is perhaps useful to consider a recent survey carried out by Cambridge university of 1,500 adults' attitudes towards transplantation. On being asked, 80 per cent.—a very welcome proportion—gave their approval for the transplantation of any or all of their organs. However, on further questioning, it was discovered that only 23 per cent. of the sample had donor cards, in recognition of their willingness to become donors. Furthermore, only 14 per cent. carried those donor cards. We might rely on donor cards to indicate a person's wish to donate organs at the crucial time, but the survey clearly shows that the cards do not provide an adequate means of identifying potential donors. Donor cards should not be written off, but they are certainly not the complete success that we should like them to be or that they were perhaps envisaged when they were first introduced some 17 years ago.

Donor cards are not the only device to promote the needs and benefits of transplantation. There is another Welsh success, again involving KRUF. In 1986-87 KRUF carried out two associated operations. First, it set up Lifeline Wales — a computerised system. It leafleted every home in Wales exhorting Welsh people to register on Lifeline Wales' computer their willingness to donate their organs.

The Lifeline Wales computer could then be consulted by on line computers in intensive care units to ascertain donor wishes. KRUF also held symposiums in 1986 and 1987 and, as a result, it was able to involve the consultants and nurses of all the intensive care units and to expound the benefits and needs for transplantation. Such an achievement would not have been possible as a result of one symposium.

As a result of the increased awareness and publicity of the need and benefit of transplantation, there was a marked increase in the number of such operations carried out in Wales in 1987. Can such an improvement be continued? The achievements of the symposiums and Lifeline Wales cannot be easily repeated. The operations were carried out at no small effort or cost. Indeed, a novelty factor may have been involved that could be lost in repetition.

I am sure that the House will recall that I sought to introduce a ten-minute Bill, the Transplant Notification Bill, on 3 February. Ideally, I would prefer that, this morning, I was moving the Second Reading of that Bill. I know that that is not possible, but I believe that it is pertinent to try to put forward the arguments and objectives of my Bill. The Bill sought to introduce what can popularly be described as "required-request legislation". That legislation would ensure that the necessary questions to ascertain donors' wishes are asked at the right time. I believe that such questions are not asked often enough.

In essence my Bill was a response to the Hoffenberg report—the results of a working party from the medical royal colleges set up on the invitation of the Department of Health and Social Security under the chairmanship of Sir Raymond Hoffenberg. I am disappointed by the conclusions and recommendations of that report. I do not believe that there is likely to be an improvement in the progress of transplantation operations, for which we all wish, as a result of that report. I am especially disappointed that the report did not argue that we should grasp any significant nettle that may hold out hope for progress.

The report describes the shortfall in organs for donation — that was the essential reason for the establishment of the working party. It refers to the important criteria relating to brain-stem deaths — an essential part of the practicalities involved with organ removal. The brain-stem death test was first established in 1976 and has been reaffirmed in 1979, 1983 and 1986. The report defines when organs need to be removed. Hearts, livers, pancreases and lungs must be taken from a heart-beating donor—the heart is maintained only as a result of the patient being in intensive care. Kidneys need to be removed at the same time or immediately after death, whereas corneas can be removed up to 12 hours after death.

The report estimates the number of brain-stem deaths that usually occur each year. It also gives the transplant figures for 1986 and the first quarter of 1987. In its introduction, it makes a vital projection relating to kidney transplants. Kidney transplants are our greatest need and represent the greatest number of transplantation operations carried out. The report projects that our total need for kidney transplants could be fulfilled if a greater proportion of the usual number of brain-stem death cases were to become kidney donors.

The report lists eight reasons for the shortfall in organ donations. The first is doubt about the success of the transplantation programme. I agree with the report that that can no longer be considered a valid reason for the lack of organs for transplant. I believe that the public are now aware of the benefits of transplantation; that contributes largely to public goodwill towards such transplantation. The report also states that doubt about the criteria for brain death contributes to the organ shortfall. It refers to certain publicity that has led to worries about brain-stem death criteria. As a consequence, there has been a marked downturn in the number of organs coming through for donation. The report emphatically states that there can be no question that survival is in any way relegated to second place after the need for transplant organs. With equal emphasis, the report says there is no possibility that organs can or will be taken from a live patient.

The report also refers to lack of medical experience and knowledge contributing to the shortfall. The report says that most doctors do not have frequent experience of brain-stem death or transplantation. It believes that doctors will not even encounter such cases once a year. However, the report does not state whether it means most doctors, or most doctors in intensive care units — I believe that there is a significant difference between the two categories.

The report also says that transplantation operations may be affected by the pressure on intensive care beds. There are other priorities with which an intensive care unit must deal that might frustrate the opportunities for organ removal. The report makes the somewhat unusual comment that, if relatives request organs to be donated, the move into an intensive care bed "should be considered". I believe that such a "consideration" is an insubstantial approach to a most important matter.

The report also refers to the effect of limited time — several hours must be spent in making the arrangements for transplantation. However, I believe that our transplant teams are well versed in all that is involved and the crucial necessity to ensure that transplantation timings coincide. Indeed, we are all aware of a recent example on television when a donor heart and the recipient had to be brought by aircraft from different parts of the country to Papworth hospital. I believe that transplant teams are geared up for such operations and that there should be no fear about limited time. The report also mentioned the problems of limited theatre time; that relates to the pressure on intensive care beds and the other emergencies with which operating theatres must deal.

Another reason listed for the shortfall in transplants —a new area for consideration—is that of costs. There is an increasing and justified need for clinical budgeting and an awareness of cost within the Health Service that has implications for other treatments.

The final reason suggested by the report for the shortfall was medico-legal constraints, but it believes that such constraints do not represent a problem. I am struck by the thinness of some of the reasons for the shortfall and the omission of what I consider, in common with many others, to be the main problem with regard to transplantation — the need to ask the right questions. Are those questions being asked? If not, why not?

At the beginning of the report, it states that a questionnaire was sent to all intensive care units. However, that questionnaire and its results have not been published —we do not know what has been gained from it. Three oral evidence sessions were held by the Hoffenberg working party, and evidence taken from another 37 individuals, but that has not been published. If all such information had been made available, we would have a much thicker document than the present six pages. Given the importance of the subject, I believe that the report should be thicker.

Recently, another survey has been carried out for the BBC television programme "That's Life". That survey was sent to 200 intensive care units and asked consultants and senior nurses why the important questions are not asked. Three reasons were given. The first was a dislike for adding to distress. There is a natural desire not to increase the distress of relatives at a very emotional time. The second reason given was the lack of training in approaching relatives at that crucial time. The third reason was bad publicity about brain death and transplants. I am surprised at that third reason from consultants and nurses in intensive care units. I feel that that survey, and the one pursued by the Hoffenberg working party deserve to be pursued further to see what else we can learn.

I am even more concerned about a statement from the British Organ Donor Society. It makes the following comment:

> "We understand that there are some intensive care units where, as a matter of internal or personal policy, families will not be approached concerning organ donation."

The three reasons given in the survey are worthy of consideration. The statement from the British Organ Donor Society suggests a negative position that frustrates a purpose that we should all like to see pursued.

There are 14 numbered paragraphs of recommendations in the Hoffenberg report, which are largely in line with the reasons given for the shortage of organs. The report reaffirms the working party's conviction about the brain-stem death criteria. The working party report states that brain death means death. It recommends the important need for training of medical students and postgraduates in four sectors — the criteria for brain death, the success and demands of organ transplantation, communication with bereaved relatives — that is a particularly important matter — and training in procedures to arrange for transplantation.

The report recommends that clearly defined national and local criteria for the acceptance or rejection of organ donation should be established. It makes the specific point that paragraph 6 of the code of practice on organs for transplantation needs modifying.

In line with the recommendation for training for medical students and postgraduates, the report recommends that there should be similar training for nurses — in assisting with the determination of death, with the removal of organs and in communication with relatives.

The report recommends that theatre arrangements should be simplified. Reference is made to the Cambridge initiative, whereby a single team achieves multiple organ removal. That must be a simpler and better approach to organ removal.

The report recommends that district health authorities should be reimbursed for the cost of providing donor organs. That is an important matter, because it relates to at least three of the reasons that have been listed for the shortage of organs. The main reason given in the report is that entitled cost, and the needs with regard to clinical budgeting, the awareness of cost and the implications for other treatments. There are the further reasons of pressure on intensive care beds, the other priorities that must be considered and the limited theatre time, with the implications that that has for other emergencies.

The report recommends that corneal donation should always be encouraged. It says that there is a need to alter the wording on donor cards.

Running through the recommendations is an advocacy of the need for better information about transplants and their benefit. It says that better information should be provided on a continuing basis inside hospitals and outside hospitals for the general public. Essentially, it is an on-going public relations campaign to achieve improved transplantation.

On the fundamental matter of the asking of questions about a donor's wishes, the report is not brief, but it is still not as substantial or as positive as it might be. It talks about means that should be found to ensure that donor's wishes are better known. It uses the examples of the Lifeline Wales project and other similar projects throughout the country as possible ways of achieving that objective. It says that organ donation should always be considered. To my mind, that is a perfectly obvious statement.

The report comes down against an opting-out procedure. I would not wish to differ with that argument because with transplantation we should always maintain the important principle of the gift of life, which benefits the giver as well as the receiver, and which in turn comforts the relatives of the deceased.

The report comes down against the concept of required request, but it does not offer any evidence or argument as to why we should not pursue it. Instead, as a stop-gap, the report calls for an audit of the diagnoses of brain death, of the numbers of transplants and the reason for the shortfall. It expects that the senior doctor should make the first approach on all occasions to ascertain a donor's wishes. It recommends that each district health authority should develop a policy for transplantation.

With regard to the Hoffenberg report, I would say, "Fine so far, but not far enough." I have a vague feeling of superficiality about it. It has skimped the main problem of the questions that are not being asked often enough. Perhaps the survey would have told us more, but it has not been published. If it had been, we might be aware of another problem that has recently been highlighted by the heart transplant surgeon, Mr. John Wallwork. He sought to define the knock-on effect of the shortage of hearts for transplantation. He said that if hearts could only be transplanted earlier into a fitter patient, it would require less nursing and less caring than is being devoted at present to looking after a less fit transplant patient. That extra nursing and caring could be devoted to an increased number of transplants. I think that that is the most relevant point about that knock-on effect.

Equally relevant is the projection that Mr. Wallwork has made that one in five people on the waiting list for heart transplants may be expected to die before an operation can be carried out. That is an improvement, because until recently it was expected that one in four might die before a transplant could be carried out. We do not know whether any of those aspects were covered in the survey that the working party considered or in the evidence that it took.

The report abruptly comes down against required request, but we are no better informed about it. I suspect that lurking within the recommendations of the Hoffenberg report is the spurious argument that required request interferes with clincial freedom. That spurious argument has yet to be defined in a meaningful way. Clinical freedom concerns judgments about a patient's care. I cannot see how wishes for donation interfere with a patient's care. In that context, Mr. Ross Taylor of the Royal Victoria hospital in Newcastle upon Tyne said:

"By not legislating we are protecting non-existent rights of people in intensive care units in the form of doctors and nurses, disregarding very definite rights of donors and donor families who are not being asked."

I should add that we are disregarding the rights of people who are waiting for transplants. Mr. Taylor goes on to estimate that there is potential for increasing the number of transplants fivefold.

Professor Arthur Caplan of the university of Minnesota is even stronger in his defence of required-request legislation. He has good credentials because, besides being professor of medical ethics at the University of Minnesota, he has been involved with the setting up of required-request legislation in various states of America. That legislation is now in place in the majority — 33 — of the states. He argues that required-request has nothing to do with restriction or coercion; he says that it offers a choice. Already, thousands of people in the United States have benefited from the coming to pass of required-request legislation. He feels that that is the finest justification for its introduction.

Professor Caplan said that he would say to doctors:

"Take seriously your obligation as healers. Take seriously your duty to transform tragedy into something good. If it's not legislated, then by choice, I would hope that the British Medical Association would very quickly decide to put the policy in place on its own, and it could — there's nothing to stop them from doing it anyway."

[Mr. Gwilym Jones]

Although I have great reservations about the Hoffenberg report, I by no means totally condemn it. It contains much of great value. I look forward to finding out whether my hon. Friend the Minister can tell me about progress in implementing the important recommendations in the report. By "important considerations" I have in mind the recommendations that each district health authority should institute an operational policy for transplantation and the recommendation that training should be provided for medical students, postgraduates and nurses in all the various areas, not least in communicating with bereaved relatives. Importantly, cost is highlighted in the report. There is the recommendation that district health authorities should be reimbursed for the cost of organ removal.

None of us would want aspects of clinical budgeting or the awareness of costs to be the cause of frustrating further expansion in transplantation. Certainly, there are financial implications, not just in cost but in savings to the Health Service. For example, kidney transplants are the ideal conclusion of dialysis. It is estimated that dialysis costs an average of £15,000 a year for each patient. That expenditure would not have to be maintained and would be a saving that could be applied to further patient care in the NHS.

There is also the aspect that my hon. Friend the Minister recently and rightly observed. Each successful transplant means that an ill person becomes a fit person. There is a greatly improved quality of life and patients would probably resume their occupation or take up an occupation, in turn making a contribution to our economy, at the very least by paying tax. The recommendation about cost in the Hoffenberg report certainly needs to be pursued.

I should remind the House of the minor point about altering the wording on donor cards. The card refers to the removal of eyes. However, it is not eyes that are removed but corneas. The Hoffenberg report has drawn our attention to that possibly off-putting effect, which may worry some people.

We should go further than the Hoffenberg report. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to add lustre to her reputation and to be remembered for a long time as the Minister who seized the banner of required-request and achieved tremendous progress. I have referred to some statistics but it is not enough just to use bald statistics. We are dealing with human beings.

With that in mind, I refer to a recent tragedy that is relevant to the debate. It was written on the front page of the Fareham and Gosport Street Life of Thursday 18 February. It said:

"Genna Trapp died a month before her third birthday because doctors could not find a donor to replace her damaged liver . . . And they now say Genna should never have died. A change in Britain's transplant laws could have saved her, they say. Liver specialist at King's College Hospital in London, Doctor Roger Williams watched Genna die . . . He wants drastic changes to make more livers available. 'The law should be changed so that people are automatically asked about donating organs when a child dies', he said. 'It's a system that works in America and it is called Required Request. There are children like Genna dying and they will continue to do so unless this happens. It is a terrible waste.'"

My fear is that our waiting list for transplants could continue to increase beyond the level of potential donations. The current waiting list for kidneys is 3,485. Last year, 1,566 kidney transplant operations were carried out. However, our waiting list will not decline at the rate of 1,500 a year, because each year more patients are diagnosed as being in need of dialysis and, eventually transplant. It is likely that the waiting list, even with that level of operations being maintained, will grow by 1,000 per annum. The Hoffenberg report estimates that there are 4,000 brain-stem deaths each year. That means 8,000 kidneys. If our waiting list continues to increase by 1,000 per year, in what year will that waiting list be greater than the potential number of kidneys available for transplant?

There are grotesque alternatives that are being pursued. Attempts are being made to use pig valves and baboon hearts for transplant purposes. For instance, a baby was kept alive in 1984 for 20 days by the transplant of a baboon's heart. I learned this week of a $3 million grant project in the United States of America for the farming of chimpanzees so that their hearts and kidneys can be taken for transplantation. We know of the trade in India of purchasing kidneys from healthy poor people.

Occasionally, some of those techniques might be indispensable in adding to the sum of our medical knowledge, but in general I feel that we are going down dangerous roads. We are taking immoral and unethical avenues that we should not be pursuing. The detestable trade in India of selling kidneys and preying on the poor is but a short step from even more vile practices such as murder, body snatching and the involvement of organised crime. We may detest those practices, but we recognise that desperation for transplants is the essential motivation.

On balance, I acknowledge and praise the tremendous progress that has been made in transplantation and the continuing increase in transplants. It may be said that over 8,000 people are now alive and enjoying a greatly improved quality of life who might not be alive if it were not for the transplant programme. I acknowledge and praise our Government's commitment to wanting to achieve further progress. At the risk of repetition, it is only required-request that will make significant progress. Substantial authorities are in favour of required-request, as are various medical experts. It is already in operation in various states of America.

Arguably, there is overwhelming support for required-request. We can already show good will towards transplantation and a wish to see it expanded further. Closest to home, the chairman of the Kidney Research Unit Foundation for Wales, Mr. Wilkinson, has told me about discussions at the Elephant and Castle in which he participated, where the majority favoured the earliest move to required-request legislation.

Against that is the position set out in the Hoffenberg report, of essentially trying to continue to rely on the voluntary approach, when it must be staring us in the face that the voluntary approach is not succeeding and when the demand on the waiting list is likely to increase. So much has been done and continues to be done. However, I argue strongly that we should grasp the nettle of required-request.

10.8 am

Mr. Ray Whitney (Wycombe): I convey my warm congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) on the excellent contribution he has made to our debate and to his sustained leadership of a campaign on a crucial crusade which will, when he succeeds—I hope that it will be only a short time before he does so—enhance the quality of life of so many of our fellow citizens.

I also congratulate the health authorities in Wales which, in many areas, show a commendable initiative that could well be copied by other regional health authorities in the United Kingdom. For example, Heartbeat Wales is at least two or three years ahead of the rest of the United Kingdom. The results of Heartbeat Wales have been shown in the coronary heart disease statistics. That is another area in which we grievously need to make progress.

When I had the privilege of filling the post now so splendidly filled by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), it became clear to me that organ transplants were a technique that should be looked at positively. The more I examined it, the more I became convinced that it was the way to go. I therefore went to the United States two or three years ago and was deeply impressed by the progress that individual states of the Union had made. Their record since then amply justifies the optimism that most of the proponents of the required-request system then had. It was partly my own enthusiasm which led to the creation of the committee under Sir Raymond Hoffenberg. I share the disappointment of my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North at the failure of the Hoffenberg report to go any further.

Those of us who have examined the issue recognise the immense sensitivities and difficulties about the time of bereavement, and the great anxiety of the next of kin and of the doctors and nurses concerned with the case. We must also recognise that those of us who are not in the profession would offer views on the clinical and medical aspects only with the greatest timidity and sensitivity. That being said, I believe that, for all the reasons that my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North mentioned—I shall not weary the House by repeating them—we must re-examine what we should do.

Of all groups in the country, members of the medical profession are the most conservative. I am afraid that my hon. Friends at the DHSS cannot just sit back, accept the medical advice and leave it at that. There are clinicians who know of the immense advantages for quality of life and rapidity of treatment—not to mention economic savings in the Health Service—but the balance of medical opinion will always continue to push in the opposite direction. We need leadership from the Ministry and the Department—and from us, as legislators. It is for that leadership, positive encouragement and active promotion that we look to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

10.13 am

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): I hope the House will forgive me, but I almost completely lost my voice yesterday, and it has only partly returned this morning. I shall be brief and, I hope, to the point.

I warmly thank the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) for bringing the issue back to the House today and for the points that he made in support of his motion, with which I almost entirely agreed. He was right to say that there is agreement that more action is needed and that the situation is unsatisfactory. Advances in transplant medicine have meant that thousands of people, who would otherwise have died or been condemned to lead a miserable life, can live and enjoy an almost normal one. Many people, because of the shortage of transplant organs, cannot benefit from transplant surgery and must wait a long time in misery, or die while they are waiting. So there is general recognition that something more needs to be done, but there is no agreement about what.

Some would argue that organs should be taken unless the deceased's relatives veto that action. That approach has been adopted in some states in the USA. It dramatically reduces the waiting lists and increases the supply of organs available for transplant. However, some people fear that, however watertight we try to make the system for ensuring that a veto has not been exercised, some people's organs will be taken, despite profound objections on the part of relatives who did not find out in time.

The Hoffenberg report makes nine recommendations, which include further publicity and education but essentially leave the structure of the system unchanged. The Government should adopt all the proposals in the Hoffenberg report and implement them straight away. I also understand the concerns that the report's proposals do not go far enough, will not ensure that enough organs are available for transplant, and will not significantly reduce waiting lists. Required-request is a middle way between requiring people to opt out with a veto and leaving the position as it is now.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, North discussed the required-request system, distinguishing it from a voluntary one. I think that the required-request system remains a voluntary system because, after the request has been made, the organs are taken for transplant only if they are volunteered by the relatives. It would become an obligation for the doctor to consider whether an organ donation would be possible, and if the doctor thought that the organs were suitable for donation the obligation would be on him to ask the relatives whether the organs could be made available. Some have expressed concern that that would upset newly bereaved relatives, but I believe that if there were a statutory obligation it would help doctors. They would merely be carrying out a task that they were obliged to do. That would assist them in approaching relatives and making the request. Similarly, doctors ask someone for consent before an operation because there is a legal requirement to do so, and people understand why they are doing it. It does not necessarily mean that they think things will go wrong. It is a formal procedure that people understand doctors must go through.

If doctors explained to relatives that they were required to request the organs and that the decision was entirely up to the relatives, that would be a straightforward procedure which I would welcome. There is no risk in that approach that organs would be taken against the wishes of the relatives, because they would have to be asked. There would also be no risk of relatives, who might have wanted the organs to be donated, not being asked. We should be concerned about that, too.

This is not a substitute for a proper public information campaign about the importance of organ donation and the transplant programme. The required-request system should be accompanied by a public information campaign about the possible benefits for those who have transplants. I urge the Government to accept the approach recommended by the hon. Member for Cardiff, North, and to go further than that. They should do more to promote the development of bereavement counselling and to train hospital staff to deal with relatives who have recently been bereaved. At the same time as adopting the required-request approach, I want them to carry out research into the long-term effect on relatives who have allowed organs to be used for transplant. Often, recently bereaved people's feelings change. We might find that people feel a greater degree of gratitude if they have the opportunity to donate their deceased relatives' organs for transplantation.

We need a better understanding of the short-term effect on people. We also need a longer-term research programme to examine the effect on bereaved relatives, particularly parents, of making organs available for transplantation. I urge the Government to make sufficient finance available to district health authorities so that the cost of intensive care is not a deterrent to making organs available. The Government must also take action to ensure that there are enough nurses and medical staff so that the removal of organs can take place. Obviously, I should like to see an expansion and development of research into the matter. It is the responsibility of the Government of the day to provide the basis for medical advance and lay the groundwork for breakthroughs in future.

Transplantation is a difficult matter, surrounded as it is with fears about spare parts surgery. When I asked myself whether I would be prepared to have my organs used after my death, without any hesitation and difficulty I said yes. I have carried a donor card for years. I have absolutely no difficulty about that. My husband, who comes from a Catholic background, is certainly against the cremation of his body. He has a different approach, but he automatically said yes, he would be prepared for any of his organs to be used for transplantation after his death.

We asked ourselves whether, if one of our children suddenly died, we would be prepared to allow their organs to be used for transplantation. We paused and felt that sense of horror that parents obviously feel when they think about their child's organs being taken out of their dead body and donated. For a few seconds, we imagined ourselves in the shoes of the parents of a desperately ill child who needed a transplant. It is easy to understand why the required-request system must be introduced. Our answer to the request would be yes. We must always recognise that there is a sense of contradiction. We must be on the side of those who have the possibility of life, and we must make that possibility a reality by ensuring that organs are available.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, North has a great deal of support for his motion. He has the support of many hon. Members who are not able to be here today but have asked me to convey to him their support. They are concerned that the Government should take action. In particular, my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) is not able to be here, but I can say that he fully supports the points that were made by the hon. Member for Cardiff, North. I support the endeavours of the hon. Gentleman and hope that the Government will respond positively and take action where it is needed.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) on his good fortune in the ballot and on choosing the important matter of transplant notification procedures as the subject of debate. I am pleased to support his motion.

My interest in this subject arises from the fact that one of the country's principal centres of excellence in heart and heart-lung transplantation is Harefield hospital, which is situated in my constituency. As a result, I have a close, ongoing relationship with Professor Magdi Yacoub and his team, and take a close interest in the availability of donor organs and the advancement of transplant surgery generally. The only real limitation on the number of transplants that are carried out at Harefield is the availability of donor hearts. The clinical criteria for carrying out transplants are widening as the success of operations becomes more clearly demonstrated.

In 1987, 180 transplants were carried out at Harefield. A total of 550 transplants have been carried out there. The longest survivor is now eight and a half years on from a transplant operation. There is an 80 per cent. survival rate at two years, as against the possibility that all patients would have died within six months had no transplants been carried out. Of the 550 transplant operations, some 250 have been carried out during the past two years. Now, unlike other operations, there is almost complete certainty that patients would have died had no donor hearts been available.

In the current year, Harefield has about £3·1 million to carry out 180 transplants under the National Health Service. That sum includes an additional £740,000, which has just been allocated by North West Thames regional health authority. I pay tribute to the North West Thames regional health authority for the wonderful support that it has always given the transplantation programme at Harefield. The regional health authority and the Hillingdon district health authority have ensured that it is now one of the premier centres of excellence. As evidence of that, the expansion of the National Health Service and the improvement in patient care, only last Thursday Her Royal Highness the Duchess of York opened the new intensive therapy unit at Harefield, which is now providing excellent care for transplantees. The unit cost about £1·4 million. It is yet another example of new NHS facilities being opened and of the way in which the taxpayer is receiving better health care.

The unit looks after adult cardiac and thoracic surgical patients and adult patients who are recovering from heart or heart-lung transplants. It contains a range of highly sophisticated monitoring and life support systems. Alongside it is the new Eric Morecambe department of cardiology, named after the comedian whom we all knew and loved so well and who benefited from cardiac surgery. The building costs were paid by the generous support of the Sportsman's Aid Society, and the furniture and fitting were paid for by the hospital league of friends. I pay tribute to their generosity. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North will not mind referring to those matters in passing.

All the facilities and the substantial available funds can be deployed to maximum effect only if more donor hearts are available. The Hoffenburg report attempts to discuss the present position of organ donation and the reasons for the shortfall in donations. It makes a valuable contribution to a better understanding of the main problems facing doctors and the problems of relatives of deceased persons whose organs are needed for transplants.

The report sets out to reassure the public about the criteria to be adopted before organs are removed. It is clear, reassuring and helpful on brain stem death.

As my hon. Friends, the Members for Cardiff, North and for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) and the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) pointed out, the report rejects the concept of legally required request—a concept that has now been adopted in 30 states of the United States of America — whereby a hospital administrator or his assignee should ask a deceased person's relatives for the gift of organs.

As my hon. Friend has said, the option of an effective audit is, in the opinion of the working party, preferable to the legally required-request procedure. My hon. Friend has pointed to all the difficulties that that would present in the future and he is not optimistic that it would lead to an increase in the supply of donor organs. I must agree with him. I am sure it will mean a continuing shortage of donor organs and a continuing waiting list for those patients for whom a transplant is the only hope of life.

I think that I can understand why the report reached that conclusion. No doubt, among the many other matters that they considered, the members of the working party had in mind the distress to relatives of those who have suffered sudden death. However, I wonder whether they took account of the feelings that relatives expressed in "That's Life." They made it clear that if they had been asked to agree to the donation of the organs of their deceased relatives, they would have done so, and that today they would have felt a great sense of comfort that the organs of their loved ones were making it possible for another person to live a normal, happy and healthy life.

The hon. Member for Peckham made what I thought was a good suggestion; namely, that research should be initiated by the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), and her Department into the attitudes of bereaved relatives. We need to know more on that subject. We need to know the views of those people who have suffered bereavement.

If the concept of required-request is not to be adopted, what is the alternative? Indeed, is there a reasonable alternative that would lead to an increase in the supply of donor organs? I believe that there is only one realistic alternative and only one other way forward: to secure the support of the public, and especially of young people, for carrying donor cards or, even better, some other form of a much more permanent indication of their willingness, or otherwise, to donate their organs.

Yesterday two young women work-shadowed me in the House of Commons. They came from Bishopshalt and Swakeleys schools in my constituency. Last night we discussed this debate and I asked them about their attitudes towards the donation of organs. I was proud to find that both those young women carried donor cards. One of them had obtained her card from a chemist and the other one had seen the cards in a doctor's surgery and collected her card from there. The only realistic way forward is to ensure that the vast majority of people are persuaded to carry a donor card, especially young people.

One nasty aspect of this whole business is that often in serious accidents the donor card is separated from the individual who has suffered the accident, and it is not found until too much time has elapsed to remove an organ. We need to find other ways to signify an individual's agreement to donate organs. The report talks about the possibility of agreement, or otherwise, being shown on a driving licence. Another possibility would be that each individual who holds a driving licence should be entitled to notify the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre of their wishes and that that information should be kept on the DVLC computer. Another way of handling this matter might be to encourage the wearing of what in world war 2 were called "dog tags"; in other words, a simple and elegant chain around the neck, perhaps with a small plate bearing one's name and an indication of one's wishes.

In addition to those identification procedures, I believe that there is another way of tackling the problem. I urge my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to discuss with her right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science the carrying out of a sustained education programme in our schools.

Public opinion on this matter is most likely to change if people make the decision themselves. Young people are far less apprehensive about such matters than their parents. They have grown up in an era when heart and heart-lung transplantation is almost an every-day occurrence. They believe in it and are proud of it and in many cases want to support it. That presents an alternative way forward to required-request. We should secure the voluntary support of the public, and especially of young people.

I welcome the motion most warmly. It is important. It could well be that in the next year many people who receive heart or heart and lung transplants will have cause to be grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North for drawing attention to these matters. He may have succeeded in taking a major step forward in encouraging many people to indicate their wishes now and thus make more organs available.

There is no doubt that in the years to come major advances will be made in cardiac surgery of every kind. It could well be that within a decade or more we shall no longer have to rely on the transplantation of human organs, and that it will be possible to substitute for them artificial organs of some kind. Although we have not yet reached that stage, I have no doubt that it will come. Until it does, I have no doubt that we need to secure the support of the population of this country to donate organs to make it possible for other people to live.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) for giving all of us who feel strongly about this subject the chance to join the debate. The part of the motion about which I wish to speak relates to identifying donors and obtaining organs. However, having heard the discussion about required request, I am prompted into saying something further about that.

The reason I want to join the debate is that I can speak from direct personal experience. It is important that those of us with such experience join in, because far too often any discussion of these issues is either academic-led or medical-led. I believe that those of us who have been through the mill ought to speak up; we have something to contribute.

Six and a half years ago our daughter choked to death at school. She was taken to hospital and my wife and I rushed there. To this day, I can remember every awful detail of what followed. We were surrounded by enormous help and a huge amount of support so what I want to say implies no criticism of anybody. However, no use was made of any part of Sarah's body. No thought was given to it by us, and it was not mentioned to us by anybody else.

Six and a half years later the dust has settled a bit and it is possible to think positively and constructively about what we went through. Sharing that sort of experience may well help people to come to some sort of conclusion of their own, and it may help us to nudge people towards thinking about it for themselves. Indeed, it may nudge the medical profession into plucking up the courage to ask more often. I use the word "nudge" and will talk about "encourage" deliberately, because I am against compulsion. I am against legislation trying to force anything in this sensitive area.

That experience taught me and my wife three things. Our first conclusion was that a great deal more could be done to encourage people to think about these nasty issues when there is no crisis. We had long since carried kidney donor cards, but if only, when there was no crisis, somebody had encouraged us to think about the unthinkable—our children's possible death—we could have done something then. We would have mocked and said, "Of course we do not need to think about our children's death", but in our case circumstances proved otherwise.

Our second conclusion is that some thought needs to be given to what happens when people have been encouraged to do something for themselves. I have a feeling that no one in the NHS or anywhere else knows that I carry a kidney donor card. The chances are that if I turn up when someone is interested in knowing whether I have a card I shall be in no position to tell that person, and there is a good chance that I shall turn up without my wallet. If someone said to me, "Here is a computer-based register. Would you like to put your name on it?" I should be the first to volunteer.

The third conclusion that I reached was that ways must be found of asking distraught relatives whether they are willing to help. Much has been said about required request. My experience teaches me several things. Any suggestion of the right to remove must be resisted at all costs. Any suggestion that distraught relatives have to go through some sort of system of opting out must be resisted. Compulsory asking is far too insensitive a way to deal with an issue that is complex and needs to be handled in a different way. I realise that what I am saying means that there will probably be fewer organs available than if we went down the road of compulsion. My experience taught me. Although I regret that I was not asked, I cannot bring myself to accept that compulsion in that circumstance would help.

The problem is that someone must do something and it has to be done at the worst possible time. It is in the moments after an unexpected bereavement that the question must be asked. Time is of the essence and, sadly, accident victims are often the best source of organs. If progress is to be made, the asking process must be made natural and normal. Whatever we decide to do, we must all accept that there will always be a risk of hurting people when one asks. Sometimes, one will even outrage people, but, looking back, I wish that someone had asked me.

How should we get the question asked? Perhaps training could be given — this has been mentioned several times in the debate — to all hospital staff in how to decide for themselves whether the bereaved people with whom they are dealing are the sort whom they should ask, and training could also be given in how to ask. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will consider whether district health authorities and family practitioner committees could be encouraged to develop local guidelines on how to set up some sort of system for getting the question asked more often.

Perhaps people such as myself who have been through this mill and know, although we are laymen, exactly what we are talking about, could somehow be encouraged to volunteer and the hospitals be asked to keep a list or register of those whom they could telephone asking them urgently to come and talk to people going through what others had been through before. I stress that it must be encouraged request, not required request.

If we are to make progress, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North wishes, it will come from identifying donors and obtaining organs rather than from anything else. Looking back on what happened to me, I believe that we must encourage people to think the unthinkable. We must persuade them to offer parts of their own bodies and, when they are least able to think about these matters, to agree that parts of their relatives' bodies can be made available as well.

If my personal experience teaches me anything, and if that experience is of any help to other people, I sum it up like this: I wish that I had been asked and, as I said earlier, I mean no criticism of anyone that I was not, because I could always have said no. Because I was incapable of thinking clearly at the time and because no one asked me, no part of my dear daughter's body has ever been able to help anyone.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) on his success in the ballot and on again giving us an opportunity to debate this important subject. His speech was not only interesting and extremely well researched but a major contribution to the debates and thinking on these topics.

I thank also my hon. Friends the Members for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney), for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) and for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) and the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) for their speeches. I was deeply moved by the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne. I was going to read out some letters from parents whose children had died and who had been unable to make a donation of that kind, but my hon. Friend's comments have made that unnecessary. I hope that his words will move the nation as they have moved me.

As part of my research for this debate, I read through some old Hansards on the subject. It was a fascinating exercise for anyone interested in how attitudes have changed in this tricky subject, and I recommend it. If one goes back to 20 December 1960 and the debate on the Second Reading of the Human Tissue Bill, we find Mr. Kenneth Robinson, then the Opposition spokesman on health, telling the House:

"About ten years ago I was approached by certain members of the medical profession about the difficulties of getting sufficient corneas for grafting. I spoke to the then Minister of Health and asked whether there was anything I could do by way of publicity and Parliamentary Questions. The right hon. Gentleman went away and, having seen his advisers, came back and said to me, 'For heaven's sake do not raise this matter. Corneal grafting is going on, but the moment we give it any publicity there will be religious objections and the whole matter may come to an end. So please leave it alone.'" — [Official Report, 20 December 1960; Vol. 632, c. 1235.]

The thought that these days anyone would have strong religious objections to corneal transplants probably seems preposterous to us, and the thought that these days any Minister of Health might want to discourage progress is, I hope, also preposterous.

The Human Tissue Bill was not the first legislation on this subject, for it replaced and augmented the Corneal Grafting Act 1952 which, in turn, augmented the Anatomy Act 1832, which was the first legislation on this subject, and parts of which are still extant. To look back on all that was an interesting exercise. There were ten-minute Bills, one after the other, in the 1960s and 1970s, many at the instigation of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). There was the statement in the House 20 years ago, almost to the week, again by Mr. Kenneth Robinson following Britain's first heart transplant.

The House, in the shape of its Back-Bench Members, has an outstanding record in raising this important issue, but some features have struck me forcefully. First, there has always been much public support for the transplant programme. The British public has always been interested in the subject and very supportive. Outright opposition has always been confined to relatively few people among the lay public. Secondly, one of the key necessary changes has had to come in attitudes to death. I noted with interest the words of Norman St. John-Stevas, now Lord St. John of Fawsley, in the debate in February 1969, in which he said firmly:

"death is the final and irreversible cessation of perceptible heartbeat and respiration."—[Official Report, 26 February 1969; Vol. 778, c. 1739.]

Twenty years on I think that it is now generally accepted that brain-stem death is the appropriate criterion. Legislation in other countries copies our codes on brain-stem death, which have been in operation here for some time.

The third feature which is obvious to anyone who looks back into this subject is that the surgery is technically much trickier than anyone expected. The first 100 or so kidney transplant patients all died and the first heart transplant patients never left hospital. For many years, the success of kidney transplantation was below 50 per cent. Only recently have many of the technical difficulties been overcome, with increased attention to the removal of the organ, so that it is not damaged, and to the insertion in the patient requiring the transplant and with the advent of cyclosporin and other drugs, which have been an immense help in preventing rejection. This is now one of our most, rather than least, successful forms of surgery.

The fourth thing that struck me was that there were never enough organs. There never have been enough organs and I suspect that there may never be enough organs. When Lord Ennals stood at the Dispatch Box and some 700 kidney transplants a year were being done, the waiting list was 1,200. We could now cover that in about eight months in any particular year. However, I suspect that our waiting list now, to which attention has been drawn, suggests that there is possibly no natural limit to what could be done in this area.

Far more people are now on dialysis, and the advent of continuous ambulatory peritoneal dialysis, which is particularly helpful to diabetics and to the elderly, has shown that many people can be kept alive for longer and many more people can benefit. One might speculate that in future the transplantation of heart or kidney might be as commonplace as putting in a heart pacemaker. With the improvement in anaesthesics that is now occurring, it may well be done in future under a local anaesthetic. One can see that by the beginning of the next century, in other words another 20 years on, the debate may take much the same form about not enough organs as now.

Yet what has become apparent in all the years during which this has been discussed is that the operation is never commonplace and never can be. It is not commonplace for the recipient for in many cases we are talking about people who face death quickly or, if not death, many years of misery on dialysis. It is never commonplace for the donor, the family or the staff concerned. My experience goes back to the early 1980s when I was the chairman of the Central Birmingham health authority. I can well remember walking into the Queen Elizabeth hospital one day to find the place abuzz. When I asked what was going on, they looked at me and said, "If you find out, chairman, you will stop it." I had to promise that I would not interfere before they would tell me that Mr. McMasters was going to do a liver transplant that afternoon. Everybody knew about it and was excited and apprehensive.

It is worth bearing in mind that the staff are also affected by this. The lady concerned needed 42 pints of whole blood, the entire laboratory was up for many nights testing her every 15 minutes. The intensive therapy department was completely tied up looking after her and a large number of other operations had to be cancelled. Everyone was excited that it should happen and devastated when, despite the fact that the operation was successful, the patient died. We must bear in mind that all our staff, not just the doctors, are greatly affected by this event.

Our record on organ transplantation of all kinds is excellent and all those concerned can take pride in it. We have more patients with a functioning kidney graft than any other country in Europe — about 7,000 people. In 1986, the most recent year for which we have comparable figures, we were the leaders in Europe, together with the Federal Republic of Germany, in the total number of kidney transplants performed. We think that it managed two more than we did. For transplants using cadaveric donors, we were clearly in the lead with some 1,500 compared with about 1,200 in West Germany. No other country in Europe had over 1,000 in that year, although many are now increasing their transplantation programmes rapidly.

Our heart-lung and liver transplant programmes are probably the most successful in Europe, and have expanded year by year in the 1980s as the operation has become technically much more successful. I apologise to the hon. Member for Peckham. I mean absolutely no criticism of anyone before 1979, but the figures I have are only for the period under this Government. In 1979, we performed 842 cadaveric kidney transplantations in the United Kingdom; the provisional figure for last year is 1,479. That is a total increase of some 76 per cent. In 1979, we did three heart transplants; last year, we did 244. We did no heart-lung or liver transplants in 1979, but last year we did 72 heart-lungs and 170 liver transplantations. There are no longer any accurate statistics on corneal grafts because it is now routine, but we believe that between 1,500 and 2,000 such transplants take place every year.

The survival rate of the transplants is improving all the time. In 1982, only about 50 to 60 per cent. of patients with a heart transplant were surviving for a year; now it is about 80 per cent. From 1977 to 1983, about 40 per cent. of liver transplant patients survived for a year; by 1985, the proportion was about 70 per cent. and it is rising. In 1980, some 61 per cent. of patients with kidney transplants still had that kidney functioning after a year; in 1985, the figure was 77 per cent. This is encouraging, but it puts even more pressure on us to increase the number of organs available for transplantation. As all hon. Members have said today, large numbers of people still die in circumstances which could make them suitable donors but where donation is not even considered.

The operations are not only successful, but getting cheaper. I noted with interest a report from Dr. John Wallwork, the consultant cardiac surgeon at Papworth hospital in Cambridge, in The Daily Telegraph of 19 February 1988. The newspaper said of heart-lung operations:

"The operation, which takes between 2½ to six hours, used to cost £22,000, including hospital care for 12 months post-operatively. With advances in treatment which allow the patient to return home after three weeks — half the time initially allowed—the cost has dropped to £15,000."

Kidney transplants now cost us about £8,000 and about £2,500 in following years. If someone has a good job, they probably pay more than that in tax, and that point has been well made.

Mr. Shersby: My hon. Friend has said that the cost of a heart-lung transplant is about £15,000. Does she agree that the cost of a heart transplant is substantially less than that?

Mrs. Currie: My hon. Friend is ahead of me slightly. To finish the comparison for kidneys, a kidney transplant costs £8,000 haemodialysis varies between £12,000 and £15,000 and CAPD varies between £8,000 and £10,000. That is based on a 1982-83 study, but uprated to current prices. It shows how much a kidney graft is entirely cost-effective, especially considering the high success rate that I have mentioned.

A heart transplant costs £12,000 at current prices and a liver transplant £18,000 on current prices for an adult and £25,000 for a child. We must reflect that, since the alternative is almost certain death and in many cases these people can be returned to normal life — indeed, for children a lifetime of normal life — they are a bargain and value for money. On that basis alone, we should continue to pursue them.

I mentioned that our success on transplantation has been helped by a considerable measure of public support. The most recent survey that I have been able to lay hands on was that by the British Kidney Patient Association which commissioned a survey by Gallup, published in January 1987. It shows that 68 per cent. of all those questioned said that they would agree that their kidneys could be used after death for transplant purposes and 66 per cent. said that their hearts could be used. That was at a time of considerable controversy about this topic. Twenty years ago the figure was roughly the same, about 70 per cent.

Our approach to organ donation is that it should be voluntary, that the rights of individuals must be protected and that the education of the public is vital. That is the basis on which we have the most successful programme in Europe. Public education — I have heard many good ideas about it today — has been focused on repeated campaigns through poster displays and advertisements on television, in doctors' surgeries, in banks and many other places. These usually involve the distribution of our donor cards.

While I accept many of the criticisms that have been made about the donor card scheme, we emphasise that all those who carry a donor card should discuss their wishes with their families so that, even if the card is not found, the family of the potential organ donor will know what that person would have wanted. We must also get across the message that families do not have to wait to be asked. They can, should and do let the doctors know the wishes of their loved ones. We have co-operated with commercial organisations, sportsmen, entertainers and other well-known people, and at present British Telecom is helping us by including cards with telephone bills sent to customers in the London area. We are grateful for that help. At present some 5·5 million donor cards are in issue.

We are in no doubt that publicity has a direct effect on the number of donor organs becoming available, but it can go both ways. A "Panorama" programme in 1980 gave the public a bad impression of organ donation and the number of kidney transplants dropped by over 8 per cent. in the following year. In 1984, Esther Rantzen publicised the case of Ben Hardwick who needed a liver transplant, and when we renewed the donor campaign the number of kidney transplants increased by 26 per cent. Therefore, many other children owe their lives to Ben's circumstances.

In December 1986, a series of newspaper stories suggested that people diagnosed as brain-stem dead were not actually dead and was followed almost immediately by a fall in donated kidneys. That explains why the 1987 kidney transplant total is marginally down on the record 1986 figure. But I was able to take part in the "Gift of Life" programme on 10 January this year, and again the figures have turned upwards dramatically. I pay tribute to Esther Rantzen and the team from "That's Life" for the efforts that they have made. They do not know the figures that I am about to read out, which are a tribute to their work.

I examined the figures for the number of transplants reported to the United Kingdom transplant service in the four weeks following the "Gift of Life" programme and compared them with an exactly equivalent period at the beginning of 1987. At the beginning of 1987, we did 72 kidney transplants. At the beginning of 1988, we did 138, which is almost double. At the beginning of 1987 we did 83 cornea transplants. We think that we did 143 at the beginning of this year, although, as I said, the figures for corneas are a little uncertain and are almost certainly higher than that.

At the beginning of 1987, we did 12 heart transplants. This year, the figure was 21. We did no heart-lung transplants at the beginning of 1987. In the first four weeks of this year, we did 13. In 1987, we did nine liver transplants. This year, we did 17. In the four weeks from 10 January to 6 February 1987, the lives of 21 people were saved by heart, heart-lung and liver transplants. In the four weeks from 9 January to 5 February this year, 51 lives were saved. All those people will join me in expressing thanks to Esther Rantzen and her team. I met her recently at the Woman of the Year lunch held by Woman's Own magazine, and I was delighted that she was chosen Woman of the Year by the readers of that magazine. That was well deserved.

There is still much more to be done, but we believe that a considerable impact has been made in the education of the general public. We are less happy about the attempts to make professional staff in the Health Service more aware of the need for donation. It is clear that more cadaver organs would become available if more relatives of potential donors were approached about the possibility of donation. In that I agree completely with everything that my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North and other hon. Members have said. Although it can be distressing at a very sad time, it can also provide an opportunity for something good to come out of a tragedy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe said that he had visited the United States to see what had been done on required request. After his visit, we approached the medical royal colleges and asked them to recommend how we might proceed on the subject. They have told us that hospitals should have clearly defined procedures for identifying potential donors and for referring them to the appropriate transplant unit or co-ordinator.

We do not know how many organs there are that might be suitable for transplants, nor do we know why those organs are not made available. There are many possible reasons. Staff may be unaware of the need for organs. They may be unwilling to approach relatives at a difficult time. The relatives may be unwilling to agree, even though they know that the deceased person would have wanted his organs to be used. In many cases, doctors are unlikely, or feel unable, to proceed because of the distress that they or the relatives may feel.

There may be different problems. For example, if there is pressure on intensive care facilities, it will not always be possible to use them to maintain a donor in a suitable condition until organs can be removed if another patient's life could be saved by using the facilities. Because we do not know the relative importance of the possible reasons, we agree with Sir Raymond Hoffenberg's working party that there is a need for an audit of cases where organ donation is a possibility. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North asked how we are getting on with that. I have in front of me an outline of a draft circular that has not yet gone beyond the word processor stage. We intend to issue a draft circular soon to the health authorities. We shall then have the usual three-month consultation period, as we do on draft circulars, and we expect to issue the circular proper later this year.

Some district health authorities have already started to audit brain-stem deaths. I understand that audits are being conducted in Cambridge and Brighton, and there may be others. It is interesting to think about the headings that may be contained in such a draft circular. For example, as my hon. Friend said, we shall ask health authorities to ensure that hospitals in which potential organ donation is likely to arise have written procedures for the identification of potential organ donors and for notification of the appropriate transplant staff. We shall ask authorities to record all instances of brain-stem death, collecting information that will be set out clearly in the circular, and reporting the results to the Department.

I take seriously the points that have been made about training, and we shall give careful thought to the matter. We are after two things: first, consistent information, and, secondly, the creation of structures within health authorities and within each hospital involving all the staff concerned. By the very means of collecting the information, those structures will be set up. I am confident that that will have a beneficial effect. It will force every doctor to consider whether a person who has died offers the opportunity for donation. It will also force doctors to consider their attitudes to the matter and to record precisely what they propose to do. The information to be reported from the audit of each case of brain-stem death will show whether the transplant co-ordinator was notified and, if not, the reason—the age of the donor, infection, malignant disease, unstable circulation, relatives not approached, relatives refused and other items. We are giving serious and urgent thought to whether we should collect more information than that, although I am conscious that in the United States one aspect of the required request programme that produced complaints from medical staff was the number of forms that had to be filled in. That put some of them off.

We have taken seriously the work that has been done on required request in the United States, and my hon. Friend is not alone in believing that we should follow the American pattern and require hospital staff by law to ask relatives for permission to take organs. The medical royal colleges have advised against that, and I understand why. Apart from anything else, and despite the fact that we have had legislation for nearly 30 years, the United Kingdom programme has not been based as much on the law as it is in other countries, especially the United States, and we would not lightly change that.

I have gone into the matter in some detail and I put on record our thanks to the United States authorities, especially those in New York state, with whom we are in close touch. I have many documents from America, including some that were sent to us only a couple of weeks ago. During the past two years, 30 American states have passed laws requiring hospitals to request organs or to develop procedures for doing so when a clinically suitable patient dies. From 1 October 1987, a federal law took effect establishing a national system for organ sharing, which we already have, and stating that hospitals should not participate in Medicare or Medicaid unless they developed written protocols for the identification of organ donors. That is precisely what we intend to do following the Hoffenberg report.

As yet, there has been no reliable or even regular collection of data on the effect of the laws introduced in the United States. It is important to put on record the fact that there is only anecdotal feedback. Indeed, there is little on which we can draw. Few articles have been written. I have read all of them, and they have not yet convinced me to change my mind. An article by Tolle and others in the "Annals of internal Medicine 1987" pointed out that Stanford university medical centre had experienced a 38 per cent. increase in heart and heart-lung donations since implementation of the law in California. An article by Kayali in "Dialysis and Transplantation 1986" said that in New York donations had increased by 48 per cent. and corneal donations by 160 per cent. since the advent of required request laws. We have also received a communication from Oregon showing that corneal donations there have increased by 134 per cent. since the introduction of the laws.

I am going into this in some detail because this is my best opportunity to respond to my hon. Friend the

[Mrs. Currie]

Member for Cardiff, North and to say why our thinking does not entirely go along the lines that he advocated, although I do not disagree with him entirely, as he knows. The first interesting factor is that the number of transplants in the United States is increasing steadily anyway, and some of the change that has been attributed to required request legislation might have happened without it. For example, the number of liver transplantations since 1982 has been doubling every year. In 1981, there were 26 liver transplantations, and there were over 60 the following year, over 160 the year after, over 300 the year after that, and over 600 in 1985. Therefore, the rate of growth has been fast.

The rate of growth of the number of heart transplantations in the United States has also been doubling every year; there has been a substantial increase. The rate of growth of kidney donations went up by between 10 and 15 per cent. every year before the required request law.

When we look in detail at what is happening in New York—my most recent communication from New York was on 15 January this year — we find that, unfortunately, despite the fact that detailed figures on organ procurement were collected in the first 17 months after the introduction of the law, we do not yet have a clear answer. Between 1985 and 1986, the number of organ donors was rising. In 1987, the number of donors dropped. The number of organs procured changed in ways that were not entirely consistent. For example, the number of hearts went down, the number of livers went up, and the number of kidneys seemed to be fairly static. That suggests a different pattern of harvesting from the donors who become available. It does not suggest an increased number of donors. In this country, that is one of the things that we should be keen to get at. The increase in organ donors in 1986 was not maintained in the first months of 1987.

It follows that required request might not have been an unqualified success. Again, personal communications from New York show that the variation, which seems to be diverse across the different centres in New York, seems to be a function of the personalities and attitudes at different hospitals. Part of the problem in places such as New York are rising worries about AIDS and that in the past a large proportion—as much as 20 per cent.—of the programme has been based on living donors. New York is trying to shift that emphasis.

A report to the governor and the legislature in 1987 from the New York state Department of Health contains a sentence that struck me:

> "It was frequently observed by surveyors that success in organ and tissue retrieval was largely the result of a strong commitment by key medical staff, supported by clear direction from administration and programme co-ordinators."

We are after exactly the same thing. We are convinced that, by the implementation of the Hoffenberg report, we can have the essential ingredients of the success that seems to have been developed through the required request legislation. But perhaps we can make it much more consistent across this country, which already has such a strong record and history in organ donation.

I give my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Cardiff, North and everyone in the House this firm pledge. I have given it on television and it is probably appropriate that I give it in the House now. If the Hoffenberg system does not work and does not produce what we want, we shall consider it again, but I suspect that among the other things that it will produce will be a lot of evidence about what actually happens in our hospitals, which will assist us if we feel obliged to persuade the House in future that legislation is required.

Ms. Harman: Will the hon. Lady set a particular period within which she expects the Hoffenberg proposals to work? Although she is refusing required request, those of us who favour it would be much reassured if she said that the Government would give the proposals four years to work and that, if they did not, we should have required request. Will she give us that guarantee, even if she does not accept required request now, as we should like her to?

Mrs. Currie: I am sure that the hon. Lady will understand that I cannot give absolute views on that, because a successor of mine might have to act on the results. Our present view is this. We expect that the circular will be out before the end of the year. I hope that we can get everybody started on it—I should prefer a fixed date, such as 1 January. We are considering and taking advice on that. I hope that the bulk of the hospitals that might be involved in the programme will be by the beginning of next year—in other words, by this time next year. It will be at least 12 months before we have any consistent figures.

Apart from anything else, the accident patterns in this country have seasonable fluctuations. I think that it would be wise at least to give the system another year after that before any firm conclusions were drawn. In other words, we are talking about around 1990 before it would be wise to draw up any strong conclusions about whether the programme has worked. It seems sensible to do so.

Meanwhile—let me make this point once more—as the system is introduced, the essential ingredients of what the Department of Health in New York state feels to be the working in parts, the effective parts, of its system will be brought in this country. We hope that, by voluntary means, as several of my hon. Friends have said, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne, we can achieve the success rates that are anticipated and hoped for by everybody concerned.

No one would expect me to stand at the Dispatch Box without saying something about prevention. One of the things that struck me as I went back through 30 years of debates was that nobody asked questions about how we prevent end-stage kidney failure, which leads people to need the donations in the first place. Therefore, I asked for some professional advice and I should like to offer the House this information.

I am told that the commonest cause of end-stage kidney failure, which is glomerulonephritis, cannot be prevented, but control of hypertension, which often accompanies that disease, can slow the progression to give the failure. I am advised that the role of raised blood pressure in the development of kidney damage is twofold. First, high blood pressure per se, particularly in its most severe forms, can cause kidney damage and renal failure. Hypertension by itself accounts for some 10 per cent. of all cases of end-stage renal failure. Control of hypertension has already succeeded in halving the number of cases proceeding to kidney failure. It is therefore absolutely essential for anyone who is interested in the organ donation programme, particularly kidney donation, to take into account the fact that high blood pressure is a key factor.

That is one of the items that we are taking into account as we develop our reforms of primary care. We are particularly keen that general practitioners should know and be able to take cognisance of the fact that kidney failure and high blood pressure are associated, particularly in ethnic minority populations, in which hypertension is more severe and damaging. There is also concern about certain drugs and the effect that they can have on kidneys. Those matters are kept under constant review by the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

I am also aware that many children suffer from kidney failure. I understand that the role of urinary tract infections causing kidney failure has been greatly clarified in recent years. All the research points to the fact that damage to the kidneys is done in young children when infection and vesicureteric reflux — otherwise known as VUR — coexists. VUR is a condition in which the urine goes the wrong way — it goes up to the kidney. It is usually due to an inborn malformation, which can be detected by ultrasound screening. The value of such ultrasound screening in the prevention of kidney scarring is now being studied in Cardiff, thanks to the generous support of the Laura Ashley Foundation. That also suggests that infections should be controlled in children, or they can cause permanent damage, particularly later.

The principal inherited disorder often found in children is polycystic disease of the kidneys. It is now possible to detect that condition in utero. But there is a certain amount of difficulty in recommending therapeutic termination, for many patients with polycystic disease live to a ripe old age, particularly if a rise in blood pressure is detected and controlled. Strict control of diet is also an important and valuable factor, particularly in the postponement of end-stage renal failure, when the kidneys are weakening. Research is being done on that in various centres.

I should like to conclude by making two important points. We must have the support of the public in this area of work. We cannot go faster than public opinion, but I am reassured by the remarkable interest and the remarkably consistent support that they have demonstrated through opinion polls and in other ways. We must have the support and understanding of the medical profession and all the staff concerned, for that work will always demand the highest standards of technique, which is why we limit the number of centres where we can do the work, because nothing succeeds like success, particularly with the medical profession.

It is also a matter of ethics. The programme is based ultimately on trust. Those are the absolute necessities. We believe that the cautious, methodical and detailed approach recommended by the Hoffenberg committee will achieve those results and thus help us to secure the programme in future. I have taken careful note of all the points made and I am glad to repeat my pledge that if we do not make progress this way, we will give the matter further consideration.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: We have had a worthwhile debate on this important subject. Friday is not the easiest day for debates. As the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) said, right hon. and hon. Members who would have wished to be here have been unable to take part because of the commitments that we all try to juggle, and because Friday is a popular day to be in our constituencies.

The debate has focused attention on this subject, and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Peckham, to my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney), who was kind enough to be one of the sponsors of my Transplant Notification Bill, and to my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby), who has had to leave for a constituency engagement, as has my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe, who has an obvious constituency interest in the form of Harefield hospital.

As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State said, we were all most moved by the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire), whose personal experience is most apposite to this emotional subject. I cannot applaud highly enough his speaking out. We need his contribution to this subject. He takes a slightly different approach from me, but it is clear that we all want to achieve the same objective. There is plenty of opportunity for constructive debate about how we reach that objective.

I join my hon. Friend the Minister in applauding the BBC television programme "That's Life" on "Gift of Life", which was shown on the first Sunday in January. All the publicity has been rewarded by a doubling in the number of transplants performed. We had an excellent response from my hon. Friend the Minister. One of the greatest values of these debates is hearing a ministerial contribution. My hon. Friend has done a valuable service to the future consideration of this subject with her well-considered speech. What she said will be considered widely. I was pleased to learn that there is a draft circular on the word processor, and I hope that it will be in place by 1 January.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will continue to consider cost and the recommendations of the Hoffenberg report — reimbursing district health authorities for the cost of removing organs. My hon. Friend talked about the required request experience in the United States. She said that much of what is said to have happened as a result of it might have happened anyway. The other approach is that the success of medical advance breeds demand. The more successful transplants are, the more people will be encouraged to add their names to the waiting list. There is no point in queuing for operations that are not available, but many techniques have been devised only recently. We shall have to run faster merely to stand still. My hon. Friend mentioned a waiting list of 1,200 some years ago. That could now be dealt with by eight months of operations.

I regret that my hon. Friend the Minister is not in full agreement with me, but I know that she will continue to give the matter deep consideration. I appreciate the pledge that she gave on the "Gift of Life" television programme, which she has now repeated in the Chamber. I have hopes of the consideration that she will give the matter and of the progress that we shall make.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes recent advances in transplant technology and in the availability of transplant operations through the National Health Service; especially welcomes the Government's commitment to secure further progress in this vital area; notes that the recently published Hoffenberg Report recommends steps to improve the supply of donor organs; recognises that it is the shortage of suitable organs satisfactory for donation that limits people's opportunities to enjoy a greatly enhanced quality of life; and calls for action to be taken to achieve further improvements by more effective procedures which, whilst being sensitive to the needs of patients, relatives, the bereaved, doctors and other health professionals, effectively identify potential donors and increase the availability of donor organs.

[Mr. Gwilym Jones]

Property Services Agency

11.25 am

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I beg to move,

That this House urges the Government to convert the Property Services Agency as rapidly as possible into a fully commercial organisation whose future would depend upon successful performance at the market place.

I have noted that the second report from the Environment Select Committee on the Property Services Agency, Session 1986-87, and the Government's observation thereon, are relevant.

I am delighted to have the opportunity to move the motion. I do not win many raffles — unlike my wife, who is forever drawing her own tickets out of the tombola drum — and I still await any significant win on the football pools, but this is the second time since I was elected in 1983 that I have had the second motion on the Order Paper.

The first occasion was on 22 March 1985, but the preceeding debate finished at 2.20 pm, leaving me just 10 minutes in which to give my reasons for choosing the subject of my debate. As the Chancellor had that very week yielded to most of my demands in his Budget—my motion appeared on the Order Paper just six hours before the Budget was delivered—I did not need to labour my point. Today I am more fortunate, thanks to the comparative brevity of my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones), who has presented a worthy motion to the House.

I have plenty of time—about three hours—in which to explain why I have chosen the future of the PSA as the subject of my motion and to try to develop the argument why I think that it should be converted as soon as possible into a fully commercial organisation.

When my name came up in the ballot for today's debate, I thought, "Good. It will give me another opportunity to expose the iniquity of the PSA in relation to the sale of land declared redundant to the Ministry of Defence's needs in my consituency". Upon considered reflection, it seemed that a narrow and parochial subject would be more appropriate to an Adjournment debate, and that it would be unlikely to attract much vocal support from my hon. Friends.

Thus I decided to chose the somewhat broader subject of the PSA's future. The announcement on 3 February by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State that the Crown Suppliers is to be privatised — with my unequivocal support—encouraged me to think that the time is ripe for the PSA to take the first steps towards whole or partial privatisation by being set up as a Government trading fund.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): My hon. Friend whetted my appetite. He mentioned the sale of land in his constituency by the Ministry of Defence, that sale being the responsibility of the PSA. Perhaps my hon. Friend could satisfy my keen interest and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) the chairman of the Select Committee on the Environment with just a few sentences on this topic.

Mr. Couchman: I can hardly wait to satisfy my hon. Friend's desire for knowledge on this subject. He need have no fear—I shall tell him and the House about it.

During Question Time on 3 February, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary was careful not to underrate the difficulties of privatising the PSA. He did not encourage me or my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), who I am delighted to see present, or my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), who cannot be with us today, to believe that such privatisation was just around the corner. Indeed, he stressed that the PSA does not yet have proper commercial accounts.

At Question Time on 17 February, my hon. Friend the Minister encouraged my hon. Friend the Member for Wells to believe that he is willing to cosider seriously the recommendation in the report by Deloitte Haskins and Sells that the PSA should be set up as a trading fund, but discouraged notions of early privatisation.

On Thursday 18 February, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made a most important statement about the future management of certain Civil Service functions, and announced that the Government have accepted major recommendations in the efficency unit's report "Improving Management in Government: The Next Steps". In particular, my right hon. Friend paved the way for certain important executive functions to be established as agencies — some to be retained within the Civil Service but some to be placed outside it.

The PSA is already an agency headed by a chief executive, whom I am delighted to see in the Chamber. It seemed to me that this should not preclude the placing of the PSA outside the Civil Service. I suggested to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister that, presumably, those Government activities that were wholly or mainly commercial would lend themselves to being set up as agencies.

Furthermore, I suggested that my right hon. Friend might consider existing agencies such as the PSA as suitable candidates to be placed outside the Civil Service. My right hon. Friend agreed that functions of Government that are essentially commercial services would lend themselves to being set up as agencies outside the Civil Service. She also reminded me that the Government are considering and reviewing the PSA and how best to reform its activities. I hope that today's debate will prove to be one more modest step towards that reform.

To initiate on blind prejudice a debate on a subject as important as the future of a £3 billion turnover Government agency employing more than 22,000 people would be foolhardy indeed, not to say monumentally impudent. Therefore, I have spent a good deal of time reading about the PSA to augment the limited but not encouraging knowledge gleaned through dealings with the PSA in my constituency. I have been much helped in my research by the second report of the Select Committee on the Environment for 1986-87, which deals with the PSA. I have read volume I most carefully and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi)—who I am delighted to see in his place—on the concise distillation of so much evidence into just 28 pages. I must confess that my reading of the evidence in volume II was more selective. My research has also been helped by the Library and its splendid staff.

I do not want to repeat in detail what I said during Adjournment debates about the PSA's estate agency activities in the Medway towns. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne has requested information and it was my constituency experience that led me to my unease about the present operations of the PSA. Therefore, it is as well to offer a brief resumé to illustrate my case. On talking to other hon. Members who represent garrison towns and constituencies, I find that my experience is reflected in theirs. Perhaps my prejudice is not so blind after all.

The 1981 Defence review recommended the closure of the Royal Navy base and dockyard at Chatham, which was mostly in my constituency and about which I have spoken on many occasions. Aside from the cataclysmic loss of employment in the area, that closure, which was confirmed and ultimately carried out in March 1984 — the Falklands campaign notwithstanding — posed the problem of what to do with 500 acres of land and several hundred old and outdated naval dockyard buildings that have not been available for upwards of 400 years.

The PSA's response to the challenge that such a disposal potential offered was twofold. The largest, and arguably the finest, collection of scheduled monuments in the country, would be mothballed — closed up, made wind and weather proof and left. The historic Georgian dockyard would simply be abandoned to the ravages of time and weather. The PSA's solution for the so-called modern — that is Victorian — or commercial dockyard was to dispose of each of many dozens of buildings and areas of land piecemeal to the highest bidder — indeed, to any bidder, as most of the buildings had long outlived their useful lives and were in poor condition.

It was only as a result of local indignation and shock at the proposal of such a shoddy solution to what the PSA saw as an inconvenient problem that Gillingham council and Kent county council prevailed upon the then Secretary of State for the Environment, Patrick Jenkin, who is now Lord Jenkin of Roding, and a more far-sighted and productive solution emerged.

A commercial dock operation was set up by the Medway ports authority in one of the basins to augment that body's operations at Sheerness. A trust was set up under the chairmanship of Lieutenant-General Sir Steuart Pringle to manage and develop the historic dockyard as a living museum. It must be said that much of the trust's funding was already committed by the PSA to substantial and long overdue maintenance work on the fine Georgian buildings.

The central and largest part of the yard, including the huge naval barracks known as HMS Pembroke was handed to English Industrial Estates Corporation, now English Estates, to undertake an integrated development. That redevelopment is now going ahead under a most imaginative scheme, but I stress that it was local pressure that brought about a worthy solution to this difficult problem.

The PSA's answer would have led to fragmented and partial occupation of the best of the outdated buildings. The rest would have fallen into dereliction, so replicating all the problems of London's docklands from the 1960s to the 1980s. It was simply too big a challenge for the PSA to comprehend and, in any case, as the land was to cease to be occupied by the Crown, the PSA was not really interested. As it was, we were left with some difficult problems in the form of unwanted tenants let into the dockyard on short leases or licences by the PSA in the twilight months of the base.

That insensitivity to the legitimate aspirations of the local community has been repeated by the PSA in its handling of the disposal of Ministry of Defence land declared redundant to the Army's needs in 1985. My hon.

[Mr. Couchman]

Friend the Minister will know that I refer to the land known as the Great Lines, Lower Lines and East Camp and Garrison No. 2 sports ground in my constituency.

Inevitably, in a garrison and Navy-based town, much land finds its way into the Crown's hands over the centuries—I stress "over the centuries". Some of it, such as the dockyard, is intensively used, and when such a facility is closed the land cries out for imaginative redevelopment. Other parts, acquired perhaps as fortification land or as a safety cordon around a great establishment, remain undeveloped open land. In time, such open space is used, courtesy of the services, as open recreation land to be enjoyed by the local people as a green lung in what is usually a tightly developed and urban area around the military establishment. That was the case in my constituency. It comes as a shock to local people suddenly to have their open space threatened by the Ministry of Defence declaring the land redundant and the PSA being commissioned to dispose of it.

When that happens, would it not be sensible for the PSA to sit down with leaders of the local community to discuss sensible development where that is appropriate and the conservation of open land where that is the responsible disposal? Such a sensible and sensitive course of action has not commended itself to the PSA. Its response to the task has been to file a series of predatory and highly-provocative planning applications.

When thwarted by local council refusal the PSA has appealed under planning law—as it is entitled to do—to the Secretary of State for the Environment. As such appeals are sent to the PSA's Secretary of State, I believe that people have a right to feel a certain amount of cynicism about natural justice. There is public disquiet about what is considered to be an incestuous relationship. The PSA has conducted its affairs in this regard in a most obtuse and awkward way. It has refused even to prove title to the land to the local council.

I do not wish to labour the particular when my motion is about the general.

Mr. Gow: Before my hon. Friend leaves this part of his fascinating speech, will he explain to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) and myself what has happened so far with the land? Has the Secretary of State appointed an inspector to determine the appeal, and is it to be determined by written representation or by public inquiry?

Mr. Couchman: There have been three applications, two of them for highly contentious land. I understand that the first application is under appeal to the Secretary of State. I am not yet aware whether an inspector has been appointed or whether that inquiry will be determined by written representation or public inquiry. I suspect that, because of the vast interest and disquiet in my constituency, it will need to be determined by a public inquiry. One of the other applications has also been rejected, but I am not aware, that an appeal has been lodged.

The third application concerns less controversial land. Indeed, development on that land would be welcome to the local council and it has prepared a planning brief. I suspect that, in due course, planning permission for development of that land will be given. There are, of course, the usual matters to be ironed out between the applicant and the local council.

I have tried to illustrate a certain ineptitude in the PSA's role as the Government's estate agent. In the case of the dockyard disposal, its approach was flabby, lazy, unimaginative and uninterested. In the case of open space land, the PSA has proved unwilling to consult and insensitive to local aspirations. Another unsatisfactory feature of its role as the Government's estate agent is what I consider to be the dichotomy of responsibility. If one challenges the PSA about its disposal of land it states that it is just acting as the estate agent. If one challenges the holding Department — the MOD in this case — one is referred back to the PSA because it is claimed that the PSA is responsible for the disposal of the land. It is a sophisticated version of pass the parcel, and it is extremely frustrating.

I understand that there is a growing feeling wihin the MOD that it would like to regain control of its land management affairs from the PSA. That would certainly eradicate the problem of split responsibility. Indeed, when the MOD is rearranging its land holdings, but staying in a given area — the great military establishment, the Royal College of Military Engineering has remained in my constituency at Brompton barracks — it will wish to maintain its good relationship with the local community.

I understand from paragraphs 65-71 and 83 of the Select Committee's report—as well as comments in the more general paragraphs—that there is good reason for concern about the PSA's handling of the MOD estate. Attention was especially drawn to the "built heritage"—the handling of some 500 historic buildings gives cause for grave concern. With 270,000 hectares on some 4,500 sites in the United Kingdom and abroad the MOD needs, as the Select Committee succinctly put it in recommendation (g), sharper focus of the strategic control of the defence estate and the gradual untying of its management and capital works programme from the PSA. The prospect of losing its monopoly with regard to defence estates should be sufficient to concentrate the minds of those charged with PSA management.

Hon. Members have only a limited contact with the Civil Service and few of us have an opportunity to see the PSA in operation. We tend to encounter the work of the PSA only when there has been a particularly glaring failure or shortcoming — perhaps an unusually serious time or cost over run that excites interest of the Public Accounts Committee or the Environment Select Committee. The Derby Crown court or the Hanslope park scheme for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office mentioned in the debate on Estimates on 24 June 1986 — column 249 in Hansard — by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) spring to mind.

We also hear of the PSA when there has been a serious fraud such as that perpetrated by the PSA staff at Hampton court — recently successfully prosecuted — or indeed the series of frauds investigated by Sir Geoffrey Wardale during the early 1980s. It is inevitable that such scandals jaundice the views of hon. Members about the PSA. They overshadow some of the best work done or supervised by PSA.

Tribute is due to the PSA. My hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, in his foreword to the PSA's report for 1986-87, said:

"The Property Services Agency at its best is outstanding and has a deserved reputation for its achievements."

I understand that the fabled Durbar court of the Foreign Office is a magnificent example of refurbishment. However, paragraph 40 of the Select Committee's report expresses concern about the conservation of historic buildings and states:

"More energetic central supervision of historic buildings to prevent their deterioration or damage by insensitive treatment, must be operated by PSA."

The Committee also offers robust criticism regarding general maintenance and refurbishment. In particular it is extremely critical about the unacceptable level of backlog of maintenance, regularly running at £100 million.

When speaking of the achievements of the PSA, I must pay tribute to those who were responsible for the remarkable civil engineering project in the Falkland Islands, the Mount Pleasant complex. I have seen that considerable military establishment. I visited the islands, courtesy of the MOD, in 1985 and was grateful for that magnificent runway that allowed us to travel in a wide-bodied jet instead of the more spartan circumstances of a Hercules. In paying tribute to the PSA personnel involved in one of the great civil engineering projects of the 20th century, I also applaud the consortia of our great civil engineering companies that carried out the construction. That immediately highlights another question about the PSA's operation.

In a briefing paper distributed recently by Sir Gordon Manzie, the PSA's chief executive, much was made of the fact that almost 90 per cent. of PSA's activities — measured in expenditure terms — are carried out by the private sector. I applaud that. The key components of such private sector work include 100 per cent. of new construction, although under PSA management, and 85 per cent. of maintenance. The directly-employed labour force of about 9,500 now carries out only 15 per cent. of the maintenance work. Some 65 per cent. of design work on major projects is also contracted out, with PSA in-house teams now responsible for only 35 per cent. of such work. I applaud such contracting-out, but it again begs the question of the PSA's role.

I understand that Government land and property must be vested with some definable entity. For the time being, the PSA is a suitable holder of the 8,000-plus freeholds and leaseholds of the civil estate and the 4,500 establishments that comprise the vast defence estate. However, that is by no means an immutable situation.

The National Health Service owns many hundreds of properties. It designs and builds new hospitals and it upgrades and maintains its hospitals and clinics. It does that without the influence or help of the PSA.

Paragraph 57 of the Select Committee's report points out that the performance of the Health Service in managing its capital programme — £1 billion for this year — governed as it is by the capital procedures code, Capricode, compares very favourably with the PSA's performance, particularly in relation to the important aspects of cost and time overrun.

Tens of thousands of schools are built, maintained and owned by local education authorities. There should be little difficulty in vesting property ownership, construction and maintenance functions in individual Departments. Already, the somewhat bureaucratic property repayments services system represents a first step towards making Departments more conscious of and more accountable for their property costs.

The Select Committee clearly expressed reservations about whether the PRS system represents the best way forward to commercialisation, but at least it is a step in the right direction.

I have tried, without mimicry of the Select Committee, to touch on the important responsibilities of the PSA — estate ownership, management and agency, its duties in regard to design, construction and maintenance and its supervision of the increasing private sector contracting.

I have said little about the Crown Suppliers because my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, in his statement of 3 February, has already cast the die about the future of that part of the organisation. He has set in train a process which should be followed in respect of the PSA.

Those who are worried about the PSA feel that the problem lies with its management. It is frequently said that the National Health Service suffers from a superfluity of administration but a lack of management. That perception of stifling bureaucracy pervades when one reads the Select Committee report on the PSA or when one has contact with a local PSA office. It would be an interesting experiment to contract-out the duties of one of the PSA's district works offices to the private sector. I cannot help feeling that such an experiment would focus sharply on the difference between a commercial contractor's or consultant's office and the present bureaucratised and over-regulated operation that pertains in the DWO. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will conduct such a scheme when he is searching for more commercial accountability. Perhaps he will comment on that idea when he replies to the debate.

Paragraph 72 of the Select Committee's report concisely sums up the failure of the original concept of creating an all-embracing agency providing a "total" service to client Departments. It points out that the PRS system has given Departments a taste for increasing control of their accommodation matters. That applies to Departments other than the Ministry of Defence, to which I have referred. It is clear that the PRS system of assessed rents and delegated works and maintenance gives Departments a greater sense of responsibility, although I understand from the Select Committee's report that the accompanying bureaucracy tends to dilute that benefit.

The Select Committee recognised the problems of Departments competing for accommodation if the estate were to be fragmented. The PSA has had only modest success in rationalising its highly valuable office and storage accommodation, particularly in central London. There still appears to be an unacceptable amount of vacant space, and when the Select Committee took evidence, the PSA admitted, in its supplementary note dated 3 February, that it had about 3·5 million sq ft of accommodation "surplus for disposal" or unallocated on the civil estate in September 1986. While 3·6 per cent. appears to be a relatively modest figure, it equates to the area of about 140 superstores. I should be interested to hear my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary give the relevant figure for 1987 to see what progress has been made.

If the level of voids is a performance indicator, the performance of the PSA in disposing of unwanted space still has some way to go. The initiative and impetus for that disposal must surely come from central management. The success or failure of the disposal of that vacant capacity is a measurement of the senior management's determination in this important matter.

The findings of Sir Geoffrey Wardale on financial control and management were strongly critical and are worth repeating. In section 4.2 he said:

"The fundamental problem which we have identified relates to management's reluctance to acknowledge that problems exist and its lack of vigour in handling them when they are identified. We believe that this indicates a degree of complacency on the part of management, which is reflected in its attitude towards dishonesty and fraud."

Section 4.3 says:

"This problem has resulted in a failure by management to recognise that there are shortcomings in respect of a number of important matters."

Section 4.5 says:

"The concept of financial control is not sufficiently understood. Management control techniques are inadequate either to prevent or to detect cases or irregularity."

Section 4.6 says:

"The policy for disciplinary action against both staff and third parties is unsatisfactory."

Section 4.4 says:

"Furthermore where management has identified that a problem exists, for example that the existing management information system is defective, prompt action has not been taken to ensure that the deficiency has been rectified."

I freely admit that those words were written almost five years ago. What worries me is that succeeding reports from Select Committees and the Comptroller and Auditor General during 1984 and 1985 reinforced the Wardale findings. More sinister is the Select Committee report, which in paragraph 6 sets out what the Committee called the,

"PSA's weakness of attitudes and organisation" and enumerates them as follows:

"Lack of energetic central management of the Government Estate. Lost opportunities in the property market and inadequate use of 'spend to save' schemes because of the inflexibilityof 'annuality' accounting; serious neglect of maintenance because of inadequate funding; cost and time over-runs in project control; lack of responsiveness to clients; defective performance measurement."

I said "more sinister" because four years separate the Wardale report and the Select Committee report, but there seems to have been precious little improvement in those intervening years. The Select Committee was clearly impressed by criticisms levelled by the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, the Federation of Civil Engineering Contractors and the Royal Institute of British Architects, which is mentioned in paragraph 5.4. The perception of problems in the management structure and process of PSA is clearly general. Furthermore, the views of the institutions were reinforced by individual firms of surveyors and contractors.

I have spoken at length about the symptoms of a deep malaise and weakness in the way in which the PSA performs its duties and responsibilities. There have clearly been improvements since the darkest days. The present management has introduced changes that have gone some way to untying the strings between the PSA and its client departments. The PRS scheme has made those Departments more aware of their accommodation costs and information technology strategy is in an advanced stage of preparation. Sir Robin Ibbs's efficiency unit has proposed far-reaching changes in project management. Resource-cost budgeting and examination of overhead costs are now playing their part in ensuring tighter financial controls. The next major change will happen in 1988 when Departments will become directly responsible for meeting from their Votes the cost of major civil building projects funded from their expenditure programmes. They will be able to commission outside agents rather than the PSA. That will be a good test of client satisfaction. That major change was announced by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 23 July 1987.

I fear that although those changes may improve the situation, the PSA will still be an overblown bureaucracy, insensitive to the aspirations of its client Departments from which it will become progressively decoupled. Apart from holding the Government's Crown freeholds and leaseholds, it is difficult to identify any of the PSA's responsibilities or functions that could not be performed equally well or better by the private sector. I respect the skills of many individual personnel in the PSA, but the corporate performance leaves much room for improvement. I do not wonder at that. I suspect that professionals in land management choosing between a career in which they can exercise entrepreneurial skill in the private sector or the comparative safety of the job security in the Civil Service will choose the PSA only if they are lacking in ambition.

What is to be done? I am forced to conclude that only the disciplines of the market will bring about a sea change in the PSA's philosophy, enabling it to compete successfully for its own client Departments' business and —who knows—other private and public sector business. Furthermore, from all that I have read and heard I am forced to conclude that the Government have been tardy in accepting the Deloitte, Haskins and Sells report recommendations. Conventional Vote-accounting arrangements should give way to full commercial accounts as soon as possible or as soon as the new information technology systems allow. The PSA should be converted to a trading fund under the Government Trading Funds Act 1973. Thereafter, it should be possible to determine whether the PSA is performing well or badly. Sir Gordon Manzie admitted to the Select Committee that that could not presently be done. That statement is contained in paragraph 7 of volume 1 of the Committee's report.

Once the PSA is established as a trading fund producing a proper profit and loss account and balance sheet and given a three or four-year track record, serious consideration should be given to full privatisation by way of a management buy-out. The Crown's land holdings would not be part of such a flotation or sale. Professional and trading functions and possible special refurbishment activity would represent the core of a new public limited company.

I have spoken at length and critically about the PSA. I have not done so out of malice, although I confess that the unhappy relationship between my borough council and the PSA was the catalyst that galvanised my choice of motion. I hope that some of what I have said has been positive and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be equally positive. I certainly hope that his response is more positive than the Government's response to the Select Committee report published on 20 January 1988, to which I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green will wish to refer in some detail. It remains only for me to say how grateful I am to have the opportunity to move my motion.

12.3 pm

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): I do not intend to paint the gloomy picture painted by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman). Sadly, because of a constituency duty, I shall be unable to hear all the debate, and for that I apologise to the House now.

I shall describe the PSA as I see it. The issue is not black and white: there are varying shades of grey. The PSA has good and bad points, as would be expected but, above all, it must try harder in order to succeed.

The Order Paper says that the second report from the Select Committee on the Environment and the Government's observations thereon are relevant. Those I have read. Indeed, they are so relevant that I looked at the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi). On page 125 of the report of 14 January there is a lovely little phrase that bears repetition. He was talking to my hon. Friend the Minister and he said:

"there is at present no objective way of assessing the success . . . of the PSA in the round. Now, as the responsible Minister, does that give you any cause for concern, and if it does is there any solution you see to the problem of not being able to assess the efficiency or success . . . of the PSA?"

My hon. Friend the Minister, a politician to the end, said:

"It does cause me concern."

That is an understatement. On page 126 he said:

"At the moment they cannot really prove that they are as efficient as the private sector. They can say it and I have no doubt that in many areas they are just as efficient as the private sector, but at the moment there is no way in which they can demonstrate that; but I think that a trading account or commercial accounts would move towards enabling them to demonstrate that."

It is against that background that I continue the story.

Since 1986, the senior management of the PSA have been boosted — I could say strengthened — to include from the private sector three non-executive members, each with a separate skill. One is skilled in construction, one in finance and the other in property. It is interesting to look at the PSA's main business. I bow to the superior knowledge of my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham, who has obviously looked at the matter through not only a microscope but a micro-microscope.

If we exclude Crown supplies, I see the PSA's main business as the management of all the Government's civil and defence estates, the management of Government maintenance, and the design and project management of all new work. The total package of work is valued at just under £2·8 billion. That is a lot of money, and is not a sum to be sneezed at.

The staffing level of the PSA was 24,000 as at December 1987. That includes 14,500 professional, technical and administrative grades. I assume that that is what they are called. Since coming to the House I have learnt of many new things. The staff of the PSA includes a glorified direct labour organisation; directly employed labour. I imagine that there must have been teams of people sitting there coming up with that phrase. The directly employed labour totals 9,500 people. The total staffing level has been slimmed down from the fat cat days of 1979, when it was 36,000.

It is interesting to examine the way in which the slimdown was achieved. It is due to a major shift of work to private sector contractors, but further changes have also been made. During my education in the House, I have also discovered the acronym FMI, which stands for financial management initiative. The House of Commons is a place where one learns a lot. I am sure that my education must have been sadly neglected before coming here. Believe it or not, the FMI was Government-inspired. It has given Departments greater responsibility, including responsibility for their own accommodation. That must be progress.

How is the £2·8 billion spent and where does it go? I discovered that 90 per cent. of it goes to the private sector and I have no worry about that. All construction work goes to the private sector. A total of 85 per cent. of the maintenance work goes to the private sector and consultants from the private sector will be executing over 66 per cent. of all design and management on new work.

I appreciate that some of the Government's building, design and construction has not been the responsibility of the PSA. However, a further part of my education has been the examination of Government buildings. I was surprised to read that PSA projects won 14 national and international awards in 1986-87 and have so far won 31 such awards for 1987-88.

Some of those that I have seen in London would not win any awards for beauty or being pleasing to the eye. Some buildings can best be described as functional, with limited—if any—architectural merit.

I have been looking at some of the buildings that the Government own. The DES building is what I would call typical 1960s. The Department of the Environment's building is like three sore bandaged fingers sticking up into the air, and looks as rude as the image that that conveys. The building must have been designed as a sick joke, housing as it does the people responsible for the environment. If one walks from Victoria Station, one will see that they have put up some beautiful concrete walls, of which I would have been ashamed in my time as a building contractor. They are covering those walls with a creeper, which is growing at about half an inch every ten years. The crack in the wall has been there for a long time, and whenever I examine the creeper as I walk past, I see that it has still not yet crept over the crack. It might have been easier to face the structure with some of that imitation stone that they stick on the outside of decent buildings and then wonder why they are damp inside.

The modern building that houses the Home Office is a classic concrete construction; it is pretty, well done and pleasing to the eye. The new DHSS building not far from here is also good, and the Treasury building is, I suppose, the best that money can buy. In Sheffield, we have a building that is the headquarters of the Manpower Services Commission. It brings employment to the city, but it is not aesthetically pleasing. It is a crenellated structure, a mixture of Legoland and a pyramid on which a giant has stomped, squashing it to the ground. Lest anyone should think that other Government buildings, with the employment that they create, would not be welcome in Sheffield, I assure the House that they would. But taste, style and architectural merit would make them even more welcome.

I have given these examples because I appreciate that some standards need to be set and kept for Government buildings to set an example. A cadre of professional skills is needed, from architects to stonemasons, to do work, to supervise, execute and co-ordinate. They need to be London-based, but the PSA does not need to be London-based—it could be a vehicle or shelter for such work.

To continue with some of the PSA's other duties, but not exhaustively, I may say that I learned quite a lot from my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham. Rents and service charges are a key component of the PSA. In the United Kingdom, defence work estates and overseas estates amounted to 18 per cent. of the PSA's turnover in the private sector. My education in the House has also been improved, while I have been up in London, as they say, by learning that the Government-inspired charging system has been implemented for all Government Departments and all accommodation has been subjected to internal checks for efficient usage. But the PSA is still big business, as I said earlier, despite having 1,000 civil estate holdings fewer — that is another expression that means it has a great deal of property — than in 1980 when it had just under 1 billion sq m—0·926 million sq m of space — it still holds 1,000 holdings with 11·4 million sq m of space. Some holding; some property.

The PSA is also responsible for the disposal of surplus property; this year's yield from the sale of property will be £120 million.

The location of the PSA's staff is also interesting. Two thirds of them are outside London, with offices in Scotland, Wales, London and seven other regions; it is responsible for 143 district offices, together with Ministry of Defence work overseas, mainly in Germany. That is the size of the PSA empire.

Meanwhile, Ministers may be considering a report mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham recommending that the agency become a trading unit and be put on a commercial footing. But the time scale must be one of the key points for consideration, as the Environment Select Committee report said in paragraph 85. Paragraphs 85 and 86 are worthy of the House's attention. Paragraph 85 states:

"While we are convinced of the need to open up the PSA to competition, we are equally certain that a substantial core of skills needs retaining as one unit, even if this may be on a reduced scale; and that, if central management of the estate as a property resource needs strengthening, as we believe then PSA is the only candidate for this role. But in carrying out this important strategic task, the PSA will need to have its influence strengthened."

Three more points will serve to illustrate the route that the PSA needs to follow:

"(a) new financial arrangements should be established for the PSA based on commercial accounts and a Trading Fund and the Government Trading Funds Act 1983;

(b) in any future system, a central body of PSA expertise should be retained as one unit, as a source of specialist expertise to Departments and other clients . . .

(c) in the light of (a) and (b), the PSA should be restructured to create a leaner, fitter and more professional organisation with reduced overheads, eliminating the wasteful overlap between professional and administrative work identified in paragraphs 54 and 55, so that the PSA can compete effectively and provide an efficient service in all its traditional areas of work."

12.18 pm

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): Over the years, the PSA has been the subject of much criticism, ranging from accusations of inefficiency to corruption. All is not well with the PSA — that was the impression gained by the Environment Select Committee as a result of our yearly examination of the PSA main estimates. So we embarked on an inquiry into the PSA and published our report last March, to which the Government responded in January. This is the first opportunity the House has had to discuss the report and the reply to it, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) for making this possible and for the terms of his motion, which he so ably introduced and which I firmly endorse. I am also grateful to him for his kind remarks about my Committee's work and report, which he found a useful source of reference.

The general view of the PSA formed by my Committee as a consequence of our inquiry is encapsulated in the evidence given by Sir Nigel Mobbs and Mr. Idris Pearce, who were brought in from the outside property world to act as chairman and member respectively of the advisory board of the PSA between 1980 and 1986. We begin our report with the following quotation from their evidence:

"The PSA contains much that is good and much that is unjustly maligned. Its weakess lies in its attitudes and its organisations, rather than in its people. To rectify this the Government and the Treasury should redefine the role and purpose of the agency, give it proper authority and delegated powers and start to assess it by results rather than by its adherence to procedures."

My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) reflected those conclusions in his speech.

I am somewhat disappointed that the PSA does not appear to be a possible candidate for treatment as a free-standing agency, under the recent report to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, entitled "Improving Management in Government: The Next Steps". Perhaps it is because the PSA has such a large budget that the Treasury does not wish to release it from its stranglehold. But it is precisely because of the dead hand of the Treasury upon it that the PSA has not been able to perform as it should.

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend underestimates his own powers of persuasion and his eloquence. He should put his faith in the Minister. I am sure that, following my hon. Friend's unanswerable arguments, that which he wishes to happen will happen.

Sir Hugh Rossi: I wish I had such confidence in myself as my hon. Friend appears to have. Nevertheless, as a result of his encouragement, I shall return to the argument with even greater enthusiasm and force.

In giving evidence to my Committee, Sir John Cuckney, the chief executive of the PSA from its inception until 1974, told us that, when he was first asked to accept that position, he was led to understand that the PSA would be "a free-standing departmental agency", but that, in the end, it was established as part of the Department of the Environment. He considers that that decision was "a very great pity", and missed an opportunity to move towards a trading fund with greater freedom from vote accounting.

As our inquiry proceeded, it became more and more apparent to the Committee how great a pity that was, and how important it was that serious moves were taken to redress the initial mistake of not creating a free-standing agency along the lines of the Crown Suppliers, which have shown the value of the trading fund route and commercial accounting.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham enumerated the six weaknesses of attitudes of organisation listed in paragraph 6 of our report, and I shall not repeat them. However, I draw attention to the fact that three main interlinked themes emerge from the Select Committee's inquiry and report.

The first theme I term "investment and annuality". That as much as anything else, exemplifies the effects of too strong Treasury control and, consequently, the rigid application of time-honoured Treasury conventions. The property market is not one in which strict annuality is appropriate. The existence of so-called annuality is understandable. The Chancellor of the Exchequer raises income for the Government and the various Departments in his yearly Budget. Therefore, expenditure is calculated also on a yearly basis. However, within that annual expenditure little, if any, distinction is made between capital investment and ordinary current running costs, so opportunities to acquire good properties at reasonable cost are missed.

The PSA has recently laid a supplementary estimate to cover the cost of some favourable purchases. That may be a sign of greater commercial realism, but the system that we examined is too slow and unresponsive to market opportunities, and good buys are snapped up by somebody else.

Also, annuality forces the acquisition of leaseholds rather than freeholds. The price of a good freehold may be prohibitive within the annual budget. Therefore, a lease is taken at a lower sum within the budget. In modern days, such a lease is subject to regular rent reviews which, in the long run, cost the taxpayer a great deal more for what is essentially a wasting asset. That cannot make financial sense for a continuing organisation such as the Government.

The next main theme of the report is the maintenance of property in Government ownership. Maintenance suffers from the same problem of annuality. There was a strong tendency to look for savings in a current year, at the expense of, probably, higher costs later. An example is the roof at Sandhurst. In 1972, repairs were estimated at £300,000, but they were deferred for 10 successive years. Finally, the cost was £3 million—partly, it is true, as a result of inflation, but mainly because of the effects of the neglect of essential maintenance work over the 10 years.

Another matter of concern was the evidence of inadequate maintenance of historic buildings in the defence estate. My hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham has addressed the House in some detail on that matter. It is probably understandable that the Department of Defence is more concerned to spend available money on modern military hardware than on historic royal arsenals such as that at Woolwich, which have been shamefully neglected.

Therefore, the Committee felt that the PSA should operate a more energetic system of inspection and supervision and have a landlord-and-tenant relationship with Departments on the basis of strict tenant repairing covenants. In that respect, we welcomed the increased delegation to Departments of maintenance and minor new works which, when they have acquired the necessary skills in-house, will be able to operate much more efficiently and cost-effectively than has been the case until recently.

The third theme, which recurs throughout the report, is the need for current accounting on a commercial basis. It affects not only matters of investment and maintenance to which I have referred but such things as responsiveness to clients and management performance. In their evidence, Sir John Cuckney and Sir Gordon Manzie, the present chief executive, stressed the importance of that. Evidence from other witnesses revealed continuing cost and time overruns on construction work. Much of that was due to clients making changes to their briefs, over which a stricter regime must be exercised.

Witnesses in design and construction complained of over-long lines of communication within the Department and the PSA, too much administrative cross-checking, slow decision-making, and a high staff turnover during the contract. It was difficult for the contractors to deal sensibly when the manager in the PSA would be a different person in successive months. Tendering and contracting difficulties also came in for heavy criticism.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): When my hon. Friend refers to high staff turnover, could he tell us whether that is a function of people being promoted or moved within the organisation, or moving out of the organisation altogether?

Sir Hugh Rossi: It is a mixture of both. Natural promotion within the PSA means that the manager in charge of a contract is moved away and that somebody else comes in, who has to start all over again and who possibly has different ideas about the way in which a contract should be run. People trying to carry out their obligations under a contract find it impossible to accept that situation recurring over a period.

Another aspect of that was criticism from, for example, consulting engineers, that the manager with whom they had to deal was an administrator, and somebody who did not have the scientific knowledge to assess the advice that they were giving—often their advice was not accepted for bad reasons, and certainly not for professional reasons. Therefore, the management of contracts is an area of difficulty. We felt that those criticisms are real and cannot simply be ignored.

On construction and design a matter not before the Committee, but of which I have subsequently heard is that Richmond terrace, which was praised just now by my hon. Friend the Member for Hallam and which looks a most attractive building from the outside, nevertheless required the intervention of the Minister for Social Security and the Disabled at a late stage, asking why there was no real provision for access for the disabled to that building. I believe that about 30 variations had to be made to the architects' plans so that the Minister could ensure that he would be able to see some of his clients, who would naturally want to visit him in their wheelchairs. I also understand that not long after occupation, the temperature in that building was running at about 90 deg F. Therefore, questions need to be asked and answered.

We came to the conclusion as a Committee that the commercial approach to the PSA operations was the only way in which the necessary internal structural changes, which have been subject to constant morale-lowering tinkering over the years, could be achieved. It was at that point that we noted the success of the Crown Suppliers' trading fund arrangements and its commercial approach.

As has already been said, it is doubtful whether the PSA system as presently constituted earns its keep. It is costly to administer, and the benefits are not easily quantified, as was admitted to us in evidence. Untying is a step in the right direction but, by itself, it is not enough.

The Committee came to the conclusion that the original concept of an all-embracing agency has failed the test of experience. The property repayment service, introduced in 1985 to bring home to Departments the cost of the accommodation that they occupy, gives a confused message, which is rapidly becoming more confused as new modifications and extra categories are introduced. We believe that the office estate must be treated as a central unit, and that the PSA should continue to have a landlord-and-tenant relationship with its clients. Our principal conclusion was that the PSA should remain the central agency, but operating on a commercial basis as a trading fund.

After we had published our report in March last year, the Government received a report that the Department of the Environment had commissioned from the consultants Deloitte, Haskins and Sells. The consultants confirmed my Committee's findings. They certainly endorsed our view that the PSA adopt commercial accounts as a prelude to establishing a trading fund. If one took the Committee's recommendations seriatim they would show that, to the extent to which Deloitte's were briefed to consider the same areas looked at by the Committee, they have come to broadly similar conclusions.

What I find most disappointing is that, although the Department has had the Committee's report since March 1987, and the Deloitte report since last summer, it has not reached a decision. Certainly it had not declared a decision on those matters in its response, published but a month ago. I hope that, in the intervening few weeks, Ministers' minds will be concentrated on this subject somewhat more than they were a month ago, especially in view of this debate. I hope that I shall hear a more positive response from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State than was made in the Government's observations on last month's report.

For the purposes of the debate, I have addressed my remarks to those aspects of the Select Committee's report that were raised directly by the wording of the motion, but it might be valuable for hon. Members to look at the report as a whole if they have time, because other important aspects are worthy of consideration.

Having criticised my hon. Friend the Minister for those parts of the report to which the Government have not responded, may I say that I am grateful for those positive responses that have been made to some of our other recommendations—the fact that the defence estate is to be untied from the PSA, although no time scale has been announced; the fact that staff are to be trained in Departments to be able to deal with property, management and maintenance matters; and the fact that greater resources will be made available for maintenance purposes so that there is not a rerun of the Sandhurst situation or a continuing backlog of about £100 million a year.

This has been a helpful and useful debate for ventilating a Committee report, although I should have preferred it to take place in prime time, when more hon. Members could have considered our findings. The Opposition have fielded only one lone Front-Bench spokesman, totally unsupported throughout the debate. If they expect to form a Government and to deal with administrative matters, they should consider these matters. One can think only that they do not expect to have to deal with these problems in the foreseeable future, and therefore administrative matters are of little interest to them.

If hon. Members wish to help the Environment Select Committee and feel that is reports are of some value to the House, I point out that there are two other reports—"The Planning Appeals System", in which we deal with major inquiries such as Sizewell, and "Historic Buildings and Ancient Monuments", which has attracted great attention outside the House. I should welcome any hon. Member who is lucky in the ballot choosing those as subjects, because I fear that the Government may not find themselves able to give us time to consider them. While dealing with the Government, may I ask my hon. Friend the Minister when I shall have a response to our report on water pollution, which we published last May? The Government are well out of time.

Once again, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham for raising this subject.

12.38 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) on his fascinating speech. Like him, I have a considerable defence interest in my constituency, having both Regular and Territorial units there. I should like to focus in the next few minutes exclusively on defence, principally the PSA's role within the Ministry of Defence and as it relates to district headquarters, and then refer to the relationship with the Territorial and Army Volunteer Reserve Associations.

Last year the level of defence spending through the PSA was about £1·5 billion. About £800 million was spent on new projects and rather more than £600 million on maintentance. The dissatisfaction within the armed forces of their treatment by the PSA is running high. Buildings which desperately need repairs are left unrepaired and the state of many of the quarters is one cause of the present high wastage which is primarily among officer grades and, to a lesser extent, in other ranks. Projects are running behind. It is not just a case of insufficient funding and, indeed, it is not primarily to do with the funding level; it is the enormous amount of waste resulting from mismanagement.

I shall give the House just one example of that. When I was living in Germany a friend of mine, who was a dependant of an army officer, took a temporary painting job during the summer with the PSA, which has a large labour force of German civilians. During his first week he completed his week's allocation by Tuesday night and was immediately told that he had offended the German union by doing his work so quickly. Most of us would agree that Germans are not normally known as an idle nation, and it takes a remarkable degree of mismanagement for the level of productivity to be so low. Anybody who has lived in Germany with BAOR will relate how the productivity of those who come to repair quarters is so low as to be almost unbelievable.

The worst aspect of the PSA as the armed forces see it—my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham touched briefly on this—is its complete and utter failure to provide anything like a cheerful and responsive service to its customers. Its attitude is one of bureaucratic muddle.

The district headquarters under the Government's financial management initiative are supposed to have much greater control over the funding of operations in their area, but on the property side progress has been absolutely minimal. There is now a small sum that can be spent directly by district commanders, but the PSA is still on one side and is not in any sense under the control of the district commander.

At every level in individual garrisons there is no real relationship with the PSA. There is neither a customer-supplier relationship, because the garrisons cannot go to anybody but the PSA, nor is there a direct command relationship. The PSA is in the cosy position of being the only body allowed to organise the supply of services, yet it is not under the direct control of those whom it is supplying.

What is the solution? My hon. Friend made a good speech about the Select Committee's recommendations, and I am delighted that part of the report suggested detaching the MOD operations of the PSA—nearly half the total—from the other operations. I firmly believe that at the macro level the PSA's MOD operations should be handed over to the MOD. The Select Committee is absolutely right on that. I may mention by the by that contacts in central staffs in the MOD inform me that even for something as basic as placing their bid for the long-term costings, the PSA is always the last to get its bid in and always the most difficult to get any accurate forecast from. It would be thoroughly healthy if the entire operation were taken over by the MOD itself.

I want an end to the remaining direct labour force employed by the PSA. The Government have made much progress in this area, but about 15 per cent. of maintenance staff are still directly employed, and the figure is higher overseas. There is no need for direct labour. All the work should be put out to contract.

To move from the macro to the micro level, the maintenance side, which accounts for almost half the total budget—more than £600 million—should be handled at district level instead of centrally from Whitehall. It would be much more efficient if district commanders had substantial powers to control maintenance in their areas and, in turn, to delegate powers to garrison commanders. It would be more efficient if the manager responsible at district level and his counterparts at garrison level were made directly responsible to the district commander, instead of being part of a framework reporting directly to Whitehall. He should not only be geographically located in the district headquarters, but the district commander should be able to hire and fire the individual. Once all the work is contracted out, at least at garrison level and possibly at district level, too, we should put retired officers into those posts. They understand the frustrations of the armed forces in relation to maintenance problems. They are also trained, at least in the case of the Royal Engineers, who used to do all this work overseas, in project management in civil engineering and works.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham will forgive me for mentioning the Territorial and Army Volunteer Reserve Associations because this is on the edge of his motion. A further complication is caused by the fact that Ministry of Defence works that apply to territorial units are handled by the TAVRAs. They are at least equal in incompetence to the PSA. Furthermore, those completely unnecessary bureaucratic bodies — I have never discovered anything useful that they did—are not even conterminous geographically with district headquarters. A unit that deals with one district headquarters whose companies are dispersed to separate locations may have to deal with two different TAVRAs. Paperwork is the bane of all units' life, especially territorial units where the small permanent staff are overstretched, so they have to deal with two more bureaucratic organisations to get their drill halls repaired.

Severing the Ministry of Defence work from the PSA would give the Secretary of State for Defence an excellent opportunity to reopen the debate on whether we need the TAVRAs, especially in the light of the structure that I propose for bringing the work much closer to the user.

If the Government carried out the Select Committee's recommendation to hand over the work to the Ministry of Defence, it would make an enormous difference to morale in the armed forces. Within the same budget, a much larger proportion of quarters and barracks would be brought up to standard, which would do much for our soldiers' morale.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) on the subject that he has chosen for the debate. It was chosen wisely, and my hon. Friend's speech matched its importance. You have had the misfortune, Madam Deputy Speaker, to miss not only the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham but the speech by the Chairman of the Select Committee on Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi). He made a speech filled with a deep knowledge of the Property Services Agency, which he gained throughout the years of his distinguished chairmanship of that Committee. Our debate has been enriched by those two speeches.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green saw fit to rebuke the Labour party because at no stage today has there been more than one member of that party in the Chamber. However, I do not know why my hon. Friend reserved his rebuke for only the Labour party. Ought not that rebuke to have been applied even more severely to the Liberal party, not one single member of which has seen fit to attend this most important debate? Is not the absence of the Liberal party even more astonishing when it claims, rather spuriously you may think, Madam Deputy Speaker, to be the party that cares passionately about the environment and about the buildings entrusted to the care of the PSA?

I wish to make only one other preliminary observation, and that is to express my respectful disagreement with my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham about security of tenure being one of the characteristics of those who are employed by the PSA. It is within your recollection, Madam Deputy Speaker, that not so long ago a former chief executive of the PSA, following an appearance before the Public Accounts Committee, of which I have the honour to be a member, left office on account of the most unsatisfactory replies that he had given to a Select Committee of this House. So my hon. Friend was wrong to say that security of tenure is one of the characteristics of those who work for the PSA.

Before I come to the main part of my speech, I want to address a serious question to my hon. Friend the Minister, which arises out of two answers that I received from our hon. Friend the Parliamentary-Under Secretary of State for the Armed Forces. Those replies were given six weeks ago today, on 15 January 1988. They revealed a deeply disturbing state of affairs. My hon. Friend told me:

"As at 30 November 1987 . . . the total number of service houses and flats"— that is to say, houses and flats owned by the Ministry of Defence—

"vacant was 15,801." —[Official Report, 15 January 1988; Vol. 125, c. 412.]

[Mr. Ian Gow]

Of those 15,801 empty houses, the Ministry of Defence had decided that 2,397 were surplus to its requirements. Even if one deducts 2,397 from 15,801, there are still more than 13,000 empty houses and flats owned by the Ministry of Defence. Of course, the House understands that there have to be empty houses and flats owned by any landlord. Time has to be allowed for a changeover. Sometimes there is an incoming tenant who has to be decided upon.

I should like to ask my hon. Friend who, although not the Minister responsible for housing, is an Under-Secretary of State in the Department of the Environment, whether he is quite certain that none of those 13,000-plus empty houses and flats, none of which were surplus to the requirements of the Ministry of Defence, could have provided a home for the homeless in any part of the kingdom.

Does my hon. Friend understand how absurd it would be for a house or flat owned by the Ministry of Defence, and not in a sensitive area where there might be security implications which made it impossible to use it, not to be available? Will he please consider that question? The PSA may manage those houses and flats, which is why the matter is relevant to the debate.

Will my hon. Friend inquire whether we could, under the short-hold system introduced by the Housing Act 1980, make some of those houses and flats available even on a short-term basis to house the homeless or to provide mobility, thus enabling the unemployed to move from one part of the country where they cannot get a job to another area where they may be able to get one?

The other part of the answer given on 15 January was:

"2,397 houses and flats had been declared surplus to MOD's requirements and were still owned by the Ministry of Defence. Of these, PSA had been instructed to sell 844".

I put it to my hon. Friend the Minister that I have little doubt—perhaps he has no doubt—that all, or virtually all, those 844 houses and flats are empty. My hon. Friend knows what happens to empty property. It gets vandalised. Local authorities tend to receive no rates and, most appalling of all, an empty house is unable to provide accommodation either for those who seek it or for those who would seek it if they knew that it was available.

Sir Hugh Rossi: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way and for his kind remarks about me. Does he agree that if the PSA were established as a free-standing trading fund, it would have an incentive to realise its assets more readily and put the money in the bank so that it could be used for what the PSA wants to use it for?

Mr. Gow: I agree with my hon. Friend. I shall return to that matter.

I remind my hon. Friend the Minister that, at 15 January, the PSA had been instructed to sell 844 houses and flats. I am urging him, when he gets back to 2, Marsham street, the building whose architectural features my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) had occasion to mention, to ask his private secretary to get an answer to these questions: how long have the 844 houses and flats which the Ministry of Defence has asked the PSA to sell been empty, and how long is it since instructions to sell were received? I put that question because the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces did not answer a key part of the question that I asked him last month. I asked:

"how many houses and flats owned by his Department are surplus to requirement; in how many cases the Property Services Agency has been instructed to sell such properties, and how many properties remain unsold (a) more than four months, (b) more than 8 months and (c) more than 12 months after the Property Services Agency was instructed to sell them."

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary replied:

"I regret that the information required to identify the number of the properties remaining unsold after four, eight and 12 months is not available to the PSA". —[Official Report, 15 January 1988; Vol. 125, c. 411.]

I am making a grave charge against my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces. However, although the charge is levelled against him, it is, I am afraid, also a charge against my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, for whom I have a great regard. When Ministers give answers that involve more than one Department—something that happens frequently—the other Departments concerned are always consulted. Therefore, I think that my hon. Friend the Minister will have told my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces that the information was not available to the PSA.

Mr. Couchman: My hon. Friend makes an extremely telling point. I am sure that he will be interested in the question that I asked my hon. Friend the Minister earlier this week. I asked him how many outstanding planning applications the PSA had and for some detail on that. The Under-Secretary replied:

"The information is not available centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost."—[Official Report, 22 February; Vol. 128, c. 60.]

Does my hon. Friend agree that that suggests a certain lack of central control of the Property Services Agency?

Mr. Gow: Yes, I agree with every word that my hon. Friend says. His intervention reinforces my point to the Minister. The PSA knows how many houses and flats remain unsold four, eight and 12 months after instructions to sell have been received. It is deeply regrettable that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces should have given a parliamentary answer which, to my knowledge, is untrue.

I have read most carefully the report of the Select Committee on Environment. I believe that that report has done a great service to Parliament and to Ministers.

My hon. Friends will note with satisfaction that the hon. baronet, my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) is now seated in his rightful place on the Treasury Bench—a Bench from which I deeply regretted his departure some years ago. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to contribute to the debate, because, in common with my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green, he has a profound knowledge and understanding of the PSA.

I have read most carefully the report of the Committee of which my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green is Chairman. I believe that the most telling paragraph is paragraph 72. Of all the paragraphs—there are many—this was the one that most caught my attention. I wish to remind the House what that paragraph said:

"The original concept of an all-embracing Agency has failed the test of experience. PSA was established to provide a 'total' service to Departments, but its functions are gradually being chipped away by its client Departments. It has been found to be too impotent, and too cumbersome, with lines of communication that are far too long."

The concluding sentence of that paragraph — the last which I wish to read—states:

"As a result, PSA is facing a consumer revolt. Its clients have acquired some direct responsibility under the PRS delegations, enjoy the freedom it gives them and some at least are wanting more."

I am sure that they are the words of my hon. Friend. They display the kind of clarity and precision that we have come to expect from my hon. Friend who is a distinguished lawyer as well as a distinguished author.

The House will note that we have been joined by my hon. Friend the Vice-Chamberlain of Her Majesty's Household. He is here in weekend attire to listen to this important debate, initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham. There may be military establishments managed by the PSA in the Vice-Chamberlain's constituency — it is almost certain that there is something in his constituency managed by the PSA. If the PSA has been invited to sell something my hon. Friend should not be too anxious because I do not suppose that it will have been sold yet. However, I do not wish to be led astray, even by the most welcome presence of the Vice-Chamberlain.

I had just quoted and paid tribute to the report of the Select Committee. I wish to contrast that report, which pointed out the deficiences of the PSA, with the words of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment in the annual report of the PSA for 1986-87 —the latest available report.

Those words have already been quoted, quite rightly, by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham. If, for the second time in the debate, those words are quoted from the Conservative Benches, it is because they are words of my right hon. Friend, and, above all people, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State should heed the words of the head of his Department. Indeed, from time to time, the Secretary of State will be making reports on the progress of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, and therefore I commend his words to my hon. Friend. It may be that I shall make a report to my right hon. Friend on the speech of the Parliamentay Under-Secretary when he comes to reply. One of the joys of being out of office is that one does not have reports written about oneself by Ministers.

The Vice-Chamberlain of the Household (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones): They are written by the Whips.

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend says that reports about us are written by the Whips. I will have a discussion with the Vice-Chamberlain about that on another occasion because otherwise you, Madam Deputy Speaker, might rule me out of order.

In the PSA's annual report, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said:

"The Property Services Agency at its best is outstanding and has a deserved reputation for its achievements."

I find myself in respectful agreement with those words.

Until two and a half years ago I had, by one of those accidents of events, ministerial responsibility for the PSA. The remainder of my speech will not be a criticism of the PSA. On the contrary, it will be directed at the sheer impossibility of the tasks that Ministers have asked it to perform.

I underline the tribute that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State paid in the PSA's annual report. Ministers are to blame for the PSA's shortcomings, which were inevitable given the tasks that we asked it to carry out. I include in my rebuke to Ministers a rebuke to myself. I must accept my share of the responsibility for the failure of the PSA, or its diminished successor, to carry out the role that we asked it to perform.

There is a devastating sentence later in the PSA report. It was overlooked by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham, although he reminded the House of what appears on page 11. My hon. Friend reminded us that 85 per cent. of the maintenance work for which the PSA is responsible is carried out by private contractors. He said that all new construction work is done by private contractors. That comes as no surprise to me. If all new construction work is not done by the PSA but by private contractors, and if 85 per cent. of maintenance work is done not by the PSA but by private contractors, do we need the PSA to be involved in new construction or maintenance work?

If a Government Department wants a new building, why is it necessary to involve the PSA? If a Government Department believes that rain is coming in through its roof, would it not be sensible for it to obtain, from a builder or roofer, quotations for its repair? Do we need the PSA?

My hon. Friend the Vice-Chamberlain, who is clad in his weekend attire, may be about to make a journey to his constituency. There he may see roofs that were damaged during the storm of 15 October 1987. Will he be saying to his constituents, some of whose roofs may not have been repaired, "You must go to the PSA. It will be able to arrange for your roof to be repaired"? That advice will not be given by my hon. Friend.

If asked by his constituents about repairs to their roofs or leaking taps or about repainting a factory, warehouse or office he would not say, "Go to the Property Services Agency and have it done." On the contrary, he would suggest tht his constituents went to a builder if they wanted a new roof or a painter if they wanted their property painted. Even if one of his constituents said that he needed a new warehouse, he would tell him to go to an architect who may be able to design the new warehouse.

Do you, Madam Deputy Speaker, see why the chief executive of the Property Services Agency agrees with that? The sentence in the PSA annual report, which was overlooked by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham, made a deep impression on my mind. As I have said, the PSA annual report was published after my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green had written his outstanding report. My hon. Friend the Vice-Chamberlain has only been able to rush in to the Chamber from his other activities. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green made a telling point — not within hearing of the Vice-Chamberlain—that his report had been produced by the Select Committee on 23 March 1987. Have I got that right?

Sir Hugh Rossi: Yes.

Mr. Gow: By common consent, today is 26 February 1988. My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green reminded the House that his report was produced in March last year and that it was not until January this year that he received a response. I am glad that the Vice-Chamberlain is present. There are now three Ministers on the Treasury Bench. We do not always have three, so we are greatly honoured. My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton was also on the Treasury Bench a moment ago but he is no longer a member of the Administration.

[Mr. Gow]

We can remind those three Ministers of the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green. The Government have many resources, the Department of the Environment has many Ministers and the Property Services Agency has 25,000 employees. My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green asked why it took from March 1987 to January 1988 to produce a reply to the report.

I have news for you, Madam Deputy Speaker. If you and I got together to prepare a reply to the report we could have completed it within 24 hours. The report is so clear and lucid. Why did it take the Government so long? How many Ministers are there in the Department of the Environment? I believe that there are six or seven. There are also some Ministers in the House of Lords.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton has just returned to the Chamber. That is good news. I remind hon. Members that my hon. Friend held the same position in the Department of the Environment as my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green once held. If I have that wrong I hope that I will be corrected. Therefore, two former Under-Secretaries of State for the Environment are in the Chamber. If my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton was in the Department of the Environment and in charge — as he was — of the PSA and had received a report dated 23 March from the chairman of the Select Committee — one of the most senior and respected figures in the House—when does he think that he would have replied?

Sir George Young (Ealing, Acton): I am glad to have this unexpected opportunity to intervene so early in the debate. I recall receiving several reports from the Select Committee. On one occasion, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) even threatened to deduct my salary because of the PSA's performance.

I have no doubt that he would have received some response and I am sure that when my hon. Friend the Minister replies he will give a full account and a proper answer to the questions that my hon. Friend has posed, a number of which I was not in a position to listen to.

Mr. Gow: I do not want to be guilty of tedious repetition by making my speech again. That would be testing the patience of the Chair——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): I am listening carefully.

Mr. Gow: I do not want to be led astray because I want to get to the key passage that was overlooked by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham. I wanted to call in my support — one may think this strange — the chief executive of the Property Services Agency and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. On page 2 of the report there is a picture of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. The report is available to all my hon. Friends. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary keeps a copy of it by his bedside—we all know that. It is an excellent photograph. I do not know whether it was taken by a photographer employed by the Property Services Agency, but we let that pass.

On page 3 there is a picture of the chief executive of the PSA—again, an excellent photograph. I pay tribute to the photographer; again, he could have been from the Property Services Agency.

Mr. Rowe: Does my hon. Friend have any views on the possibility that the excellence of the photographs reflects the excellence of the people being photographed, and that that excellence may well depend on the fact that they are both maintained by the Property Services Agency?

Mr. Gow: I agree with my hon. Friend. A number of properties in his constituency are managed by the agency. I am paying tribute not only to the quality of the photographs but to that of the people. Who appointed my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State? My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister did. Who appointed the chief executive? My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment did. I agree that both of them are of the highest quality, just as one would expect from appointments made by the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State.

I do not want to be led astray any more, because I want to come to the important sentence that supports what I am saying, which is that the Property Services Agency is being asked to do something that it should not be asked to do. My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green could not have taken it into account because it was published after he wrote his excellent report. I hope that the hon. baronet, my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton will give me his attention. I see that my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury is now in his place. I give him a special welcome because he occupies the Treasury Chambers in Great George street. That building is not a monument to brilliant management by the Property Services Agency. Alas, I was a Minister there only for 10 weeks. I add that I did not leave it because it was such a ghastly building, but I must say that it is not well maintained. I can well understand the PSA trying to get its own back on the Treasury by deciding not to treat it particularly kindly. The PSA report says:

"Work for the biggest customer — US forces in this country — has been increasing considerably in volume in recent years."

Mr. Garel Jones: It is on page 9.

Mr. Gow: The Vice-Chamberlain is closely following the debate. It is on page 9. If the Financial Secretary would like a copy, I am sure that we could get one for him. It says:

"Work for the biggest customer — US forces in this country — has been increasing considerably in volume in recent years."

It goes on:

"That for British Telecom, formerly a very large customer, is running down and will cease altogether in the next few years as the privatised British Telecom make their own arrangements for work."

Just so. British Telecom was a captive customer. It has moved sensibly, wisely and to the advantge of all into the private sector. It currently employs PSA for a great deal of its work. In the annual report, we read that in the next few years it will make its own arrangements for work. That is work currently done by the PSA. The Vice-Chamberlain will read the words "will cease altogether".

That is the theme of the debate. It was also the theme of the response that was given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary in his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn), the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister of State, Department of Energy:

"From the same date"—

That is, 1 April this year—

"Departments will be able to test the market, and to use agents other than the PSA for design and project management".

Later in my right hon. Friend's reply—I shall make a copy available to the Vice-Chamberlain — the word "untying" is used on two occasions. Again, that is of the greatest importance. My right hon. Friend said:

"The introduction of competition, by untying Departments from PSA, will provide an opportunity for Departments to test other sources of supply as well as an incentive for further improvement of the efficiency of services provided by PSA."

That is what we must do. We find the word "untying" in the next paragraph. It states:

"Under untying"—

My hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham may think that that is not a felicitous choice of language—

"Departments will not necessarily be expected to test the market from the outset or to use agents other than the PSA."
—[Official Report, 23 July 1987; Vol. 120, c. 433.]

That does not go nearly far enough. I wish that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary had gone further.

In the foreword to the annual report, the Secretary of State said:

"1986-87 was a year of preparation for change as individual Government Departments have been getting ready to accept greater responsibility for managing their own operations, including their accommodation requirements."

That should happen. Government Departments should be free to decide whether to engage the Property Services Agency or another agency. To this day, I have not understood why the Ministry of Defence does not instruct an estate agent to sell the houses, flats, land or buildings that are surplus to its requirements. Earlier, the Vice-Chamberlain nodded his assent when I invited him to agree to the proposition that if one wants to build a new building in Watford, one would instruct an architect to design it and a builder to build it.

If my hon. Friends wished to sell a house, they would not go not to the Property Services Agency, but to an estate agent. I put this point to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green. If he had a house or flat in this country that he wished to sell would he go to the Property Services Agency? Would he put a telephone call through to the chief executive or to his hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment asking whether he would be able to arrange for that house or flat to be sold? I do not think that my hon. Friend would do that, but I shall give way to him if I have misunderstood his intentions.

I ask myself the grave question, "Why do we still have so much tying?" I know that I have said that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury used the word "untying" twice in that telling parliamentary answer, but there is still too much that is tied between the Property Services Agency and Government Departments. The more we can allow Departments to choose who should carry out the functions that are at present too frequently still carried out on a monopolistic basis, the more we can allow freedom and competition, which will help the Property Services Agency to become a better organisation, more responsive to the needs of Departments and able to render a better service.

I hope that when my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary replies to the debate, he will explain that the Government intend to liberalise the Property Services Agency still further and that Departments will be able to choose who they wish to carry out the services that are presently carried out by the PSA. As the House knows, I look forward to the day when the Property Services Agency will be entirely in the private sector.

1.32 pm

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): When I entered the Chamber this morning, it was a lovely day. I do not know what it is like now outside in the big wide world. As I walked through St. James's park, I became increasingly aware of the pleasure that was being derived by a number of Londoners with nothing to do but exercise their dogs; by a number of tourists who were enjoying the view; and by the large number of people such as myself, who were using the paths in St. James's park to get from their home to their place of work directly through one of the more pleasant parts of this great city.

I could not help reflecting that the park would make a wonderful site for a large number of private houses. Why should a relatively small number of people enjoying themselves prevent the exploitation of that central space for private housing? We know that the royal parks are run at a loss. Indeed, if one looks at the scandalous way in which their landscape is being allowed to age, one realises that the loss at which they are run should, for the purposes of environmental conservation, perhaps be increased.

I wondered why we do not have applications for private housing in St. James's Park, Hyde Park or Richmond Park. Of course, there are two reasons. The first is that, by a happy accident of history, the royal parks are protected by a Act of Parliament and if planning applications were received they would have to be dealt with through an Act of Parliament in this place. The second reason why the threat to the London parks is not great — not yet — is that among the people who walk those paths and enjoy the sunshine are Ministers of the Crown and senior civil servants. That is why London's inhabitants enjoy this large and beautiful environment.

When one gets out to some insignificant provincial centre, such as the Medway towns, there are no senior civil servants to walk their dogs and enjoy the sunshine. Ministers come only occasionally usually under pressure from hon. Members — such as my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman), whose debate this so aptly is — and, as soon as they have been, they are whisked away in their ministerial cars, another troublesome assignment duly done.

As a consequence of this London-based introversion, what happens to green spaces in places such as the Medway towns is of no importance. It takes a poor second place to the need of the Property Services Agency in this respect alone — as this debate has so well demonstrated — to act precipitately. In nothing else, as far as one can tell from this debate, does the PSA exert itself to act with any dispatch, but when it comes to putting in planning applications on the Great Lines at Gillingham, of course the PSA tries to act with such dispatch that it does not even have the courtesy to sit down with local authorities to work out the best way of dealing with their conflicting needs.

Mr. Couchman: I am especially pleased to see my hon. Friend here, because he shares this problem with me in the

[Mr. Couchman]

Medway towns. In view of the answer to my question on Monday 22 February, this week, it may not be known to central management of the PSA that any planning applications have been made for development in the Medway towns.

Mr. Rowe: That is a possibility, but one diminished by the activity of my hon. Friend, who has at least told Ministers on several occasions—on some of which I had the honour of helping him, I hope—about the threat under which the Great Lines lie.

In case you do not have this piece of knowledge, Madam Deputy Speaker, the Great Lines are a large area of green space which has remained a green space because, for defence purposes, no buildings were allowed to be erected on it. Given that this land has been insulated from any development or planning by local councils, the local councils have made shift to place their houses, shops and other buildings in other places, leaving this as a guaranteed green lung for the people of the Medway towns.

There it stands on a great hillside overlooking the Medway towns, easily the most prominent natural feature for many miles, in an area that has been sacrificed to allow the people of south London to move out into the countryside. The whole of the rest of the Medway towns is now a network of housing estates, built densely, partly because the local authorities have been able to say, "There is this large area of green space for the recreation of the people of the Medway towns."

Now we find that the Ministry of Defence no longer has a need for this open space. The Ministry hands it over, as it is bound to do, to the PSA. The PSA is under an obligation to maximise the profitability of the land it holds, although, as we have heard in the debate, its performance in that task is curiously patchy.

Without any consultation with the district councils and the people most directly concerned, the PSA submits ad hoc, haphazard planning applications in a way which will cause maximum damage to the environment. As we have heard, parts of that space could properly be developed, but oh no, we do not have any consultation with a Government agency about that. We must simply accept planning applications thrown in by the PSA as it suits it. Were it not that this debate has demonstrated that the idea of a Machiavelli lurking in the PSA is absurd, I would wonder whether these applications are as haphazard as they appear. Perhaps they have been worked out on some amazing plan, so that by developing these parts other parts will become less easy to defend. That is unacceptable, and I urge the Minister at least to give us an undertaking that the PSA will consult the people of the Medway towns about the disposition of the whole of this area.

Within my constituency there is a large farming estate which, after a great deal of searching by the MOD, was chosen as the ideal site for a training area. Everybody in my constituency welcomed the MOD application to use this area as a training area, but it will not happen—for one simple reason. The PSA was outsmarted by a neighbouring farmer simply because its procedures are so cumbersome, and, as the Select Committee report pointed out, its lines of communication so long that it was unable to respond at anything like the pace needed to conduct a simple commercial transaction in the market place.

If that is the case, what possible defence can there be for the PSA acting as the Government's estate agent? It is perfectly clear both from this example and those adduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) this morning that the PSA is incapable of acting in the commercial market as an estate agent, and that that function should be taken from it.

If, as we have heard today, Ministers are unable to answer questions of simple fact and to comment on matters of detail in the Select Committee report, does that not suggest that my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) is right and that both the task to which the PSA addresses itself, as well as the agency, are too large, too amorphous and too confused to be effective?

I had intended to restrict my remarks simply to examples from my local area, but this debate has demonstrated to me beyond peradventure the paramount need for an overhaul and a grand redistribution of functions. The PSA seems to be constitutionally incapable of performing the many functions which it is expected to perform. Most of them should be handed to other people, and the expertise which it has acquired in design and certain other areas should be concentrated on a small area and made available to anyone who chooses to use them.

One of the most interesting pieces of information that I have gleaned recently is that the local authority in Nottingham has carried out a useful experiment in using schools as joint property. As rolls fell, the authority found ways of keeping open schools by using some of the buildings as community centres for old people and as day bed centres for minor operations. Provided that people can act directly with other Departments, such joint use of buildings will occur more frequently, but it will happen rarely, if ever, if everyone must go through a third party.

For that reason, too, I believe that the role and function of the PSA should be diminished and that responsibility for making management decisions should be devolved to those who are directly concerned with the outcome.

1.45 pm

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): I shall speak briefly to give the Minister ample time to reply. I shall be asking him some questions, and if he cannot answer them immediately, I shall be happy if he writes to me.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) on his success in the ballot and on choosing an important subject for discussion. He said that it was the second occasion on which he had been successful, but today he is more fortunate in having adequate time for his motion to be fully discussed. He said that he did not have as much luck with the football pools, but that is shared by all of us.

Although I did not agree with everything the hon. Gentleman said—he would not expect me to—I thought that his speech was interesting and well-argued. It will certainly please his constituents. But it was no surprise to me that he made such a logical speech. The hon. Gentleman's higher education was at Newcastle university and some of his political education was gained in the north-east when he attempted to win the seat of Chester-le-Street. I believe that it was his first attempt to gain a parliamentary seat. He probably did not go there with much hope of success, but his experience there helped him to get a seat where people welcomed his views. It is unfortunate that many of the important aspects of his education in the north-east have been thrown overboard during the past few years, but from his speech today I believe that there is plenty of potential for recovery.

The fate of the Property Services Agency has been much discussed recently, and the debate is opportune. I regret that the Government have not provided time for a full debate, but have relied on a Back-Bench motion debated on a Friday when hon. Members on both sides of the House have busy schedules in their constituencies. But, as the hon. Member for Gillingham said, it requires luck for the second motion to be reached. If the first motion had been so important that many people wanted to speak on it, we should not have had even this short debate.

For too long, the future of the PSA has been dogged by uncertainty, with its fate hanging in the balance. In whatever direction the Government steer the PSA, the present position causes uncertainty and much loss of morale among the staff. There would be many advantages in retaining the PSA in the public sector. The opportunity for it to demonstrate its viability and ability is affected by the Government's constant interference. It appears to many, both inside and outside the PSA, that the Government are deliberately attempting to demonstrate that the PSA cannot work, by creating an air of uncertainty. To Opposition Members, that calculated destruction is abhorrent.

There has been a continuing reduction in the number of staff from some 39,000 to about 24,000 a cut of about 36 per cent. The maintenance arrears come to over £100 million on the civil side and over £100 million on the defence side. Although the Under-Secretary announced an expanded budget for that work in the next financial year, the PSA no longer has adequate staff to tackle the problem. It is ludicrous that the Government's policies have undermined the PSA's work in that way. If the PSA is to become a more commercially minded organisation, it must be allowed to do so without continuing and continuous ministerial interference.

It is Ministers who have decided that two thirds of PSA design work must be handled by private consultants, as a matter of policy, irrespective of whether in-house design is better and cheaper for the taxpayer. It has been demonstrated that it is about two and a half times more expensive to undertake externally the PSA's works programmes. Not only that, but the use of private consultants jeopardises the integrity of the PSA's work.

The Public Accounts Committee was recently told that the PSA had blacklisted 31 firms for fraud or performance. Many comments have been made about the staff in the PSA, but only 34 PSA staff out of over 25,000 or 30,000—the figure could be as many as 50,000 if one takes into account the turnover of staff—have been prosecuted for fraud since 1981. I believe that only 29 were found guilty of an offence. Do the Government accept that the policy of forcing the PSA to use private consultants for Government contracts is now giving rise to serious public concern?

It is ridiculous and naive for Conservative Members to suggest that the PSA should be privatised. If that happened, what arrangements would be introduced to ensure accountability for the expenditure of huge amounts of public money? The PSA's expenditure in 1986-87 was about £2 billion. The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), who has now left the Chamber, made much of that. From 1 April 1988, Departments will be "untied" from using the PSA for major projects worth more than £150,000. If Government Departments still choose to use the PSA because it offers good value for money, will the Minister accept that as a good enough reason not to privatise it? That should and will be an important indicator to the Minister when he is determining the PSA's future. It is vital that the Government, like most big commercial companies, retain an in-house works, estate and design organisation. The Government must not bow to pressure from inside and outside Parliament to privatise the PSA.

The PSA has a good track record in protecting taxpayers' interests. Its good name must not be jeopardised by gratuitous privatisation mania. Yesterday during the statement about electricity privatisation my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) said that it represented

"a triumph of ideology over common sense". [Official Report, 25 February 1988; Vol. 128, c. 456.]

I have to say that if the Minister is considering privatising the PSA, I must echo that comment.

The Government have so far failed to give the PSA any assurance that it will be retained in the public sector. In the Southwark district works office, an experiment in privatisation is going on against the advice of senior permanent officials. Will any assurance be given that the office will not be privatised if it proves cheaper to keep the work in-house? If political prejudice forces the PSA to take non-commercial decisions, how will it be successful in the market place, as the motion demands?

It would be helpful if the Minister would stop prevaricating and announce publicly his decision about the PSA's future, following the Environment Select Committee's report. Perhaps he is under pressure from Conservative Members. This is one matter on which I hope the Minister can give us some information. It is nearly a year since the Environment Select Committee report was published on 23 March 1987. I accept that the Government's observations were printed on 20 January 1988, but it is about time that the Minister made a full statement on the Government's attitude to the report.

Will the Minister comment on what is to happen to the 65 per cent. of the PSA's work that is undertaken for the Ministry of Defence? Will he acknowledge that the PSA has an unparalleled record of securing good value for money in MOD building work? There has been much conjecture and discussion about the relationship between the PSA and the Ministry of Defence and between the Secretaries of State for Defence and for the Environment. It would be useful, if the Minister could comment on that.

When will the Minister release the report prepared by Deloitte, Haskins and Sells? Will he release it? I understand that there are matters of commercial confidence in it. Does the Minister accept that several reports that contain confidential information have, nevertheless, been published with the relevant chunks removed or blocked out? It would be useful if the report was released so that the public could have the advantage of knowing what it says. The prevarication is appalling, considering the implications for a 24,000-strong work force. There are tremendous implications for them and they want to know the Minister's intentions.

If the PSA is to be more commercially viable, it must be free to take decisions based on commercial considerations rather than the ideological prejudices of Ministers. This is not the time for a full-scale debate on the PSA. Although I welcome this opportunity to discuss the future of the PSA, we must discuss the Minister's proposals for its future. He knows from private and public statements made by the Opposition that we will oppose privatisation of the PSA should such a measure be brought before the House.

I hope that the Minister will give the work force and trade unions—not just us politicians—some idea about his plans for the PSA. We are anxious to know what they are. I hope that he can make a positive statement in the next 30 minutes.

1.59 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Christopher Chope): We have had an excellent debate and some formidable contributions, not least from my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) who introduced the debate with a detailed and strong analysis of the problems and difficulties to ensure that we started off on a sound footing. Certainly, his criticisms of the Property Services Agency — we have heard many such criticisms — were constructive and without rancour. That is the spirit that has typified our debate.

We also had a formidable contribution from my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), whose chairmanship of the Select Committee on the Environment, which reported on the PSA last year, has been referred to frequently. We have all looked at that report and thought about it seriously.

We heard a typically strong contribution from my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), who has great knowledge and experience of the Property Services Agency. We have heard other contributions—all from Conservative Members—drawing attention to particular constituency issues. My hon. Friends the Members for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) and for Gillingham referred to the Great Lines. My hon. Friends the Members for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) and for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) made useful contributions, and apologised that, because of constituency engagements, they would not be here for the end of the debate.

This is our first debate for a long time on the Property Services Agency. Although it has been on a Friday, it has been a full half-day debate and it is disappointing that the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) has been alone on the Labour Benches, while the Liberals and the SDP have not been represented at all. As was pointed out in the debate, that shows Opposition Members' lack of interest in the administration of the Government. They lack interest because they do not expect to have the opportunity to participate in it again.

Mr. Boyes: Might it not show that a number of hon. Members are engaged in other activities and that it is remiss of the Minister to have allowed this debate only because one of his hon. Friends was lucky enough to win the opportunity to raise this subject in a raffle? It is not becoming of the Minister to comment on the number of hon. Members present on a Friday. There were very few Conservative Members present when I spoke, but I did not find it necessary to lower the tone of the debate by commenting on that fact. This has been a cool, calm, well-argued debate, and I hope that the Minister will not be reduced to such remarks in his speech again.

Mr. Rowe rose

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It is for the Minister to reply.

Mr. Chope: It is a matter of priorities. It was my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green who first noted that, with the exception of the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington, this debate has very low priority for Opposition Members.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) spends much of his time and energy tabling motions relating to my constituency and other Kent constituencies; yet, when a motion is tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman), he cannot find the time to turn up.

Mr. Chope: I understand what my hon. Friend says about that.

Shortly, I shall discuss the particular issues that have been raised, including Great Lines and other pieces of land within Gillingham. In the meantime, the Government are happy to accept the terms of the motion, and I welcome the opportunity that my hon. Friend has provided of taking stock of the PSA and the way in which it is evolving.

The PSA has existed in its present form since 1972. It was established as a separate agency within the Department of the Environment to carry out many of the functions previously discharged by the former Ministry of Public Building and Works. PSA's activities cover both the civil estate, where ownership of property is vested in my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, and the defence estate, which is vested in my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Apart from the Crown Suppliers, the PSA's responsibilities, as ordered at present, fall into three main areas. It acquires, leases and manages Government property and disposes of it once it is no longer needed. It manages the design and construction of new works, and it maintains Government property. The expenditure involved is, as we have heard, considerable. The PSA's total annual turnover amounts to £2·8 billion, with almost £550 million attributable to estate management, more than £1,300 million to design and management of new works, and more than £900 million to maintenance.

The PSA now is different from the PSA that we inherited in 1979. We have initiated sweeping changes in the management of Departments across Government under the umbrella of the financial management initiative. For PSA, that radical thinking challenged the previous conventional wisdom that all accommodation matters should be funded, organised and implemented centrally. We have also fostered, and the PSA has responded to, a policy of using the private sector where it offers better value for money than doing work in-house. We have also had to deal with particular problems affecting the PSA alone, rather than the Government as a whole. I should like to outline what we have achieved under each of those headings.

First, as a direct consequence of the financial management initiative, we have introduced for the civil estate a charging system — the property repayment services system. That acknowledges that individual civil Departments should decide what they require by the way of accommodation, and pay, annually, a charge assessed by the PSA for their occupation. Improvements to the system are still needed to ensure that it reflects more accurately the prevailing property market. But the basic principle of applying market forces through financial pressures promises a more rational and more economic use of property.

A further feature of the PRS system is the transfer of the more routine works responsibilities to Departments. Under standard rules, civil Departments now take charge, within their own vote allocations and without recourse to PSA, of jobs up to £5,000 in value and all internal decorations. The Departments of Employment and of Health and Social Security are experimenting with a more radical option, whereby they take on maintenance up to £100,000 per job and minor new works of up to £150,000 per job.

We are, as I shall explain later, still exploring the question of how departmental and PSA responsibilities for the civil estate are best divided. We can, however, justly claim that we successfully challenged the idea that all accommodation issues should be handled separately, and in isolation from other operational requirements.

On the defence estate, the position is somewhat different in that the Ministry of Defence decides. In the light of its operational requirements, on the accommodation it needs. Here also, however, responsibilities have been transferred from PSA in a number of establishments where local service commanders operate local works maintenance budgets. Under those schemes the commanders are responsible for jobs up to £1,000 in value.

Secondly, on use of the private sector—I am not sure whether the extent to which we use the private sector is generally recognised—100 per cent. of new construction is carried out by private sector contractors. More significantly, 65 per cent. of design and management of major new works is now done by private consultants, with the remaining 35 per cent. or so being done in-house by PSA. This is the exact reverse of the position in 1979, when the vast majority of work was in-house. Moreover, we have now reached the stage where 85 per cent. of maintenance of Government property is carried out by private sector contractors, with the PSA's directly employed labour force carrying out the remaining 15 per cent. That compares with 70 per cent. of maintenance carried out by private contractors and 30 per cent. by the directly employed labour force in 1979.

The switch of work to the private sector has been accompanied by a reduction of the directly employed labour force. Within an overall staff reduction in PSA of 34 per cent. since 1979—from about 36,500 to about 24,000 — DEL has reduced by 50 per cent. — from approximately 19,500 to the present figure of about 9,500.

During the course of the debate a number of concerns about the PSA have been expressed. My hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham and others raised the issue of fraud and corruption. I must say that there is no sense of complacency about fraud and corruption in the PSA. The Wardale report of 1983 alerted us to the inadequacy of the PSA's defences against fraud and corruption. That was given substance in 1984 when the News of the World published allegations about malpractices in certain London local offices, and police inquiries were set in train. The trials that are currently taking place at the Old Bailey give fresh publicity to fraud and corruption. However, all the events that are being referred to in court took place in 1984, or earlier. The current trials are the culmination of a long and difficult police investigation.

Since 1984, the PSA has reorganised and substantially strengthened the management of its district works offices. Improved monitoring and control procedures have been introduced and regular inspections of local offices vet not only the results of their works but the procedural and technical routes that were followed in carrying them out. Detailed contract audits have been held across the organisation and computerised records of all tenders have been set up in key areas so that monitoring for unusual contractual patterns can take place on a continuously updated basis.

A special unit has been set up to help management to undertake investigations of possible irregularities and random inspections of individual offices. That unit has the task of ensuring that lessons learnt in one part of the organisation are applied everywhere else. Ministers and senior management accept that eradication and prevention of recurrence will require continued vigilance and a regular review of the defence mechanisms.

It is worth emphasising that those who are employed by the PSA are probably more concerned than hon. Members about the publicity that has been given to some of those trials and about the lack of emphasis that has been put on the fact that the irregularities date back to 1984 and before. Certainly there is a stain on the character of the PSA as a result of that fraud and corruption. I hope that, without being complacent about the matter, the House will accept that we have taken action to ensure that, so far as possible, there is no repetition of those events.

With regard to disposals, we were not satisfied that the procedures and practices of the PSA met our objective of keeping Government holdings to a minimum. Therefore, we have placed increasing emphasis over the past three years on speeding up the disposal process carried out by the PSA. Disposal receipts, which totalled £43 million in 1984-85, are likely to amount to almost £120 million this year.

Sir Hugh Rossi: Will my hon. Friend confirm whether those proceeds go back to the Treasury or whether they can be used by the PSA for necessary maintenance and other works that may be required?

Mr. Chope: The funds that come from the Ministry of Defence belong to the Ministry of Defence, but the funds that are raised on the civil estate belong to the PSA. The expected amount of receipts is taken into account when the budget is set at the beginning of the year. Therefore, it would not be fair to say that all the receipts can be used by the PSA on maintenance of its stock.

Sir Hugh Rossi: Does that not mean that there is a lack of incentive for the PSA to dispose of properties?

Mr. Chope: Perhaps there is, to some extent, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, in arguing the case for more money to be given for the maintenance budget for the next financial year, was able to secure substantial increases. The Treasury — the Chief Secretary to the Treasury in particular — expects that there will be increased income from the sale of surplus properties. It would not be right to say that the issue of selling properties is completely isolated from the need to find as much money as possible for maintenance. If my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had not been able to satisfy my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury that the PSA will be able to increase its receipts from disposals, he might not have been so successful in securing the increased level of funding for maintenance for the coming year—up from £90 million to £105 million—which is a significant improvement over the current year.

My hon. Friends the Members for Gillingham and for Mid-Kent mentioned the Great Lines. As my hon. Friends know, I have been to Gillingham to look at the situation, as has my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for the Armed Forces. We are aware of the concern expressed by local people, the council and our hon. Friends. As a result, we hope that we will be able to convene a meeting soon between representatives of Gillingham borough council, the Ministry of Defence and PSA officials to consider how best to proceed with the disposal of all the MOD's local land holdings, which have been or are expected to be declared surplus. Those arrangements will be set in hand shortly.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent seemed to suggest that there was a conspiracy to bring forward individual items of surplus land, secure planning permission on them and then bring forward some more. In order to allay his concerns, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces and I agree that it is important that surplus MOD land holdings in the area should be considered as a whole with the local council. I hope that the discussions I have mentioned will enable that to happen.

I know that one particular planning application that has caused a lot of concern is the disposal of No. 2 Garrison sports ground. I understand that the planning application on that sports ground was rejected by the local council. As with all matters relating to surplus MOD property, the PSA acts under the instructions of the MOD. I am able to tell my hon. Friends that the instruction from the Ministry of Defence is that no appeal should be lodged against the refusal of planning permission in respect of that sports ground.

Mr. Couchman: That is good news and will be well received in the Medway towns.

Mr. Chope: I am pleased with the response. If we can look at all the other outstanding planning applications and the possibility of surplus pieces of land coming from the Ministry of Defence, there will be scope for resolving the matter once and for all, so that the balance between the needs of the local community and the objectives of the Ministry of Defence and the Government of selling the land for the best price can be achieved.
